“Alright, I think. We went for a walk."

Peter raised a brow. “Did he try to drown you in the lake?"

“No, we just walked,” Sirius said, dropping his boots by the door with a thud. He paused for a moment, before dissolving into a fit of overtired sniggering. “Shit, all we did was argue! About the house, our parents, school—all of it.”

“But it was still good, yeah?” Remus asked gently.

Sirius nodded. “I think we might understand each other a bit better now. Neither of us is gonna win ‘best brother of year award’, but… It was something at least.”

"Well, he didn't murder you, I call that a win." Peter flopped back into his pillows, comic book hanging low over his nose. Then he perked up; "Oh and James, you owe me five pounds."

* * *

Tuesday 28th February 1978 – One week later…

Sirius and Regulus had a lot more meetings after that. Some days Sirius would return elated and high off life, others grumbling and irritated, but he always went. It meant they were trying, which was all anyone could hope for really.

“He’s pretty smart, that Regulus,” Sirius would sometimes say; “I mean I always knew he was smart, but he’s like—actually clever. Proper funny too, when he’s not in one of his little moods.”

“You are related,” Remus would say back. Early on he'd gotten the feeling that it was the first time Sirius had been happy about anything regarding his family. They weren't kidding themselves—the two still fought like scrapping rhinos—but if Regulus had chosen to rebel against their parents by seeing his brother, then Sirius wasn't likely to complain.

“I think he’s got potential. Who knows, maybe he’ll make a good roadie someday.”

“I’d keep that comment to myself if I were you, Padfoot.”

“Heh. You’re probably right.”

Sirius wasn’t the only one happy about Regulus’ return either. That morning, while Remus was on his way to the elementary campus to teach his bi-weekly music class, Trish skived off her chemistry class to join him. Now normally Remus did his best to stay out of other people’s romantic business (whether that worked or not was generally not up to him) but Trish’s interest had become so obvious that it hurt. She walked alongside him, chattering happily away about Regulus’ first week back and how he ‘already seemed so much better’.

“And it’s partly cheers to you too,” she beamed. “You’re the one wha' got through to him first.”

“We were just prefect partners.”

“But Reginald talked to you! And he never talked tae anyone save Crouch, not really.”

“He’s talking to Sirius now.”

“I heard. Sorta thought the two of them were a lost cause, what wi'h the way they were always going after each other. But well, I’m just glad he came back. Er—glad for him, I mean.”

Remus couldn’t help teasing her; “Sure, Trish. Whatever you say.”

They stopped outside the elementary building and Trish nailed him in the arm. “You watch your mouth or I’ll feed you your guitar or something."

Remus quickly pulled Sirius’ acoustic out of her reach, but Trish only sighed happily.

“You know, Remington, you should have a bit more confidence in yourself. You’re really very good.”

“Good at what?”

“At whatever you want to be.” Then, without another word, Trish spun around and drifted back up the lane, humming loudly to herself. Remus watched her go, before turning back to the door. He’d just gotten it open when someone rounded the far side of the building, carrying a violin case.

"Regulus?"

Regulus raised a brow, marching straight up to him. “Aren't you going inside?” He asked, completely blasé.

“Are you going inside?”

“We have a music lesson to teach, don’t we?”

Remus just about started. “I—I just assumed that you weren’t doing prefect stuff anymore.”

“Does that mean you're going to tell my parents?"

"No," Remus said, before a smile took over his entire face. "Wow! This is great. The kids totally missed you, you know.”

“I doubt that.”

“No, they did. Really!”

Puckering a bit, Regulus looked away shyly. “Fine, but can we go in already? I'd like to get this over with.”

Remus yanked the door open. "After you."

They made their way down the familiar hallway, passing row after row of colourful cubbies and racks filled with tiny boots. The closer they got to the classroom, the happier Remus began to feel. Maybe Trish was right after all.

“Wait!" Remus called when Regulus stopped outside the correct door. "Don't move!"

"What is it now?"

“Please, let me just do this one thing.”

With a vexed look, Regulus gestured for him to go on and Remus stuck his head inside the classroom. There he found twenty kids all pittering around, blowing their flutes and banging their drums. The sight had once made him sick to his stomach with nerves, but not anymore. Now he looked forward to those few precious hours a week he spent teaching music, and clearly Regulus did too.

“Hey everyone!” Remus called. “I've got a surprise for you!”

There was an instant chorus of 'WHAT?' and 'SURPRISE?!', but when Remus stepped aside to reveal their second teacher, looking rather embarrassed himself, the kids began to shriek in delight. They rushed the door, and Remus had to tug Regulus inside to avoid letting him bolt. He might've still tried, if one of the girls—Charlotte—hadn't caught him around the waist in a great hug.

“I thought you were never coming back!” She wailed. “You promised to teach me the violin!”

“I-I didn’t...”

“See?" Remus grinned. "Told you they missed you."

“Shut up, Lupin.”

"MR. BLACK SAID A BAD WORD!"

More shrieking, and Regulus had freed himself from Charlotte's clutches. "Yes!" He cried. "And I'll say more unless you all get back to your seats!"

“You heard him!” Remus ordered straight away; “Back to our seats so we can show Mr. Black what we’ve been practising.”

The kids needed no further encouragement. Charlotte rushed back to the tiny strings section, taking up her violin and practically vibrating out of excitement. They all knew what was happening—Remus had planned it in case Regulus ever returned. A big surprise.

“Everyone find your songs! Come on, you know the one."

There was a flurry of paper shuffling, and Regulus stepped up to his side, almost suspicious. “What have you planned now, Lupin?”

“Oh, it’s just a little something we’ve been working on. Now stand back and prepare to be amazed.” He ushered him off, and Regulus reluctantly obeyed while Remus took up his spot at the front of the class, hands extended to lead them. “Alright. On my count—and a one, and a two—!”

The clamour started instantly, several instruments just pounding right over one another with little regard for real rhythm or beat. The notes were nearly correct, but everything else was terrible. The violins squeaked enough to make one cringe, and the trumpets sounded like balloons losing their air. Already appalled, Regulus watched from the front of the room and when the piece finally came to a staggering end (they really only knew about six bars), the kids all lowered their instruments and turned to him gladly.

"Well?" Remus asked. "What'd you think?"

“Was that… supposed to be ‘Für Elise’?”

“Oh, good you got it!"

Regulus gaped at them. “Holy shit.”

“YOU SAID A BAD WORD!" Came the entire class. "BAD WORD! BAD WORD!"

“Oi, enough of that!” Remus called, trying not to sound too amused. “Let the man think! We just rattled him to his core, didn’t we? You alright there, Mr. Black?”

“That was, uhm… it... Well, it was terrible really.”

For a second the room was deadly quiet. Remus had just begun to wonder how he was supposed to comfort twenty sobbing nine year-olds when, quite inexplicably, Regulus began to laugh.

"Terrible!" He crowed. "Oh my god, my ears! What have you been teaching them while I was gone, Lupin?"

The kids shrieked in delight, all giggling and pointing fingers at Remus while Regulus practically split himself at the seams.

“What? I taught them ‘Für Elise’!” Remus shot back, while every kid giggled horrendously. “I thought we sounded quite good! Didn’t you guys?”

“NOOOO!” The kids all bellowed.

“Looks like I have my work cut out for me,” Regulus said, wiping the tears from the corners of his eyes. “Starting with strings, you guys were just—yeesh. I mean really, Lupin.”

“They need a teacher! They need you.”

That seemed to do it. Regulus peered down thoughtfully, before opening his violin case. “You’ll take the brass section, then?”

Remus winked. “You got it.”

They weren't exactly the London Philharmonic Orchestra by the time the lesson was done, but Remus was sure he’d never seen Regulus smile so much. After he’d assured them that they'd both be returning next class, they sent the fifth years on to lunch and went about the room, collecting chairs and sheet music.

“This one wrote ‘Beethoven sucks’," Regulus said, picking the page up off the music stand; "Only they mispelt ‘Beethoven’. And ‘sucks’.”

Remus set down a stack of chairs with a grunt. “They’re kids, what can you expect?”

Regulus tucked the stack of music sheets under one arm and carried a chair over to add to Remus’ pile. “You did good with them these last couple months. They sound better, truly.”

“I must be hearing things. Did Regulus Black just give me a compliment?”

“Don’t get used to it.”

Remus shrugged, stopping to return Sirius' guitar to its case. "I'm glad you're back. It was shit to have to teach them on my own... and I'm even more glad that you and Sirius have made up."

"We haven't made up," Regulus said quickly.

"Right, sorry. I'm glad you're talking to one another."

"Mostly we just talk about you, actually."

"You do?"

"Don't get excited, it's all Sirius. He really likes you. No idea why, of course."

Remus chuckled. "Regulus, can I ask, how long have you known about us?"

Regulus shifted uncomfortably. "Since last year..."

"But Sirius and I weren't together last year."

"Are you sure about that?"

"Uh..."

Regulus smirked very briefly. "Well, whatever. Like I said, I'm not gonna tell anyone. It's your business, as long as you don't go flaunting it in everyone's faces."

Unsure of how to feel, Remus slowly closed the case's lid and let the clasps snap shut. He recalled his list and began counting the names off in his head. They'd probably have to tell Peter soon, only seemed fair. Fair... oh christ.

"Lupin? ... Lupin!"

"Yes!" Remus spun around, back snapping straight up. He'd expected more questions, maybe even some teasing, but Regulus had crawled in on himself too, it seemed. He was white-knuckling his violin case.

"How do you do it?" Regulus asked quietly.

"Do what?"

"Talk to people, make them see you... I mean, really see you."

This made Remus soften. He stopped wringing out his fingers and relaxed, letting out a long breath. “Do you think people don’t see you, Regulus?”

“I don’t mean it literally. I mean… Well, I’m not what other people think I am.”

“I know that. And Sirius knows that. Others might too, if you took the time to actually see them back."

Clearly it wasn't the answer Regulus was looking for. He seemed to pout, but Remus kept pushing.

"People aren’t just going to be able to know you right away, Regulus," he told him. "You have to talk to them, try to understand them, and tell them things.”

“Like what?”

“Like anything. Like what you like, and don’t like. What you think about things and how they make you feel. Not what others expect you to say, but how you actually feel.”

“And what if I’m not sure how I feel?”

“Then you tell them that too.” Remus licked his lips. “I’ve spent way too much time worrying about what others think of me—I was doing it just now. But like you said, Sirius likes me, and I like him too. That’s what’s important.”

Regulus regarded him for a moment longer, before nodding his head. “He’s kinda stupid, you know. My brother... He really is a bit of an idiot.”

"Funny though, right?"

Regulus smiled faintly. "Sometimes."

Just then, the classroom door opened and James stuck his head in. “Oi, Moony, let’s get a move on! Remember, we said we'd all practice for that quiz in music tomorrow—oh hey, Reg!”

Regulus averted his gaze, mumbling; "Hey, Potter."

"Good music class?"

"Terrible, actually."

"Right..." James gave Remus an uneasy smile, and Remus nodded.

“Be right out, Prongs.”

"Kay!"

Before James could shut the door, a thought suddenly occurred to Remus.

“Oi, James!"

“Mm?”

“One more thing, Regulus doesn’t like to be called ‘Reg’.”

“Oh.” James paused to consider. “Well alright, my bad. See you later then, Regulus.”

Nearly speechless, Regulus sputtered a moment before finally managing a; “Y-You too, Potter.”

Smiling at him, James bobbed his head genially and slipped out. Remus paused, before picking up his guitar case and glancing back at Regulus, who was—if he wasn’t mistaken—blushing.

“See?” He grinned. “It’s that easy, mate.”

Chapter End Notes

A 'kip' is sleep/a nap.

This whole term is going to be 'up-down-back-around', so hope you're ready. Very fun times ahead!
As per the new weekly schedule, next chapter on Sunday x

Chapter 89: Eighteen

Chapter Summary

Haven't we all wanted to date Remus Lupin once or twice?

Chapter Notes

No CW's for this chapter, apart from some general cringe-worthy embarrassment. Edit: There are some intrusive thoughts toward the very end of the chapter that could be read as upsetting.

& btw, THAT scene with Sirius and James (you'll know it when you see it) is 100% inspired by THAT scene from Gilmore Girls, lmfao.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Hello, I love you, won't you tell me your name?
Hello, I love you, let me jump in your game,
Hello, I love you, won't you tell me your name?
Hello, I love you, let me jump in your game...

- "Hello, I Love You" The Doors, 1968

When it came to rock and roll, chaos was pretty much a given. An occupational hazard, the less creative writers might call it. A de facto dream-state one regrets come morning only to crave desperately at night, so say the more clever ones. And say they did! The people needed answers after all—what car does he drive, which obnoxious radio DJ can't he stand, what was he thinking when he wrote that one specific line in that one specific song?! ... It was miracle work, it was. A reputation pieced together until there was enough he said, she said to make it worth reading. Rock and roll was life written on the backs of cigarette foils and train tickets, petrol receipts and takeaway menus—anything one happened to have on them when he began talking about one specific line in that one specific song! ... And he never made things easy either; for a breed that made their living off of such rhetoric, rock stars sure seemed to hate microphones. Or maybe they just hated reporters.

We know what he's doing now, they'd say; We wanna know what he did before!

Easier said than done. The subject in question was locked up tighter than a nun's legs on Sunday, hadn't gone on record in years. Anything before 1980 was a mystery.

“I’ve got a source that says he was seeing some girl named Wendy back then,” one would say.

“Nah, the girl’s name was Cathy,” another would chime in.

"I heard it was Tannice. Tannice Wiggs."

"The one from Wimbledon?"

"No, Bermondsey. Wimbledon was the twin sisters."

“Bleeding Christ, someone call Rita bloody Skeeter already. We need the real scoop!”

Those poor sods, they’d never get it right. It was too messy and there were far too many different accounts. By that time daughters would be discovering their mothers’ old diaries in the attic and wondering why the name ‘Remus Lupin’ sounded so familiar. Eventually they’d connect the dots when an old song came on the radio, or Pops showed a throw-back special from the early 80s. He looked better then—shinier and brimming with hope and promise. Handsome even, in a ‘he snogged my mum’ sort of way.

“Mum, you really dated a rock star?” They’d ask.

“For a day,” she’d reply, if she felt like being honest.

* * *

Thursday 9th March 1978

The problem started with an innocent trip to the library. He was just one day shy of turning eighteen, but seemed to be doing a well enough job of dissuading his friends from any and all birthday celebrations. Sirius acquiesced only after Remus threatened to end all mid-morning snogging sessions for the foreseeable future, and James and Peter couldn't very well continue with only two-fourths a marauder. This left the girls, though luckily they were still jaded from their failed attempt the year before and didn't seem all that interested in forcing Remus into another party he did not want. In fact, since the fiasco on Valentine's, no one seemed to have 'Remus' on the brain at all, and so when he'd agreed to meet Amelia Hodgkins in front of the library that morning, the last thing he'd been expecting was a love confession.

"But I don't understand," Amelia whined, "Mary said you weren't dating anyone."

"I'm not, but... Look, Amelia, I'm really sorry."

The girl looked up at him with glassy eyes, her face flushed with embarrassment. If there was one thing he had to give the Hawkings girls credit for, they were certainly bold. It'd taken him months to pluck up the courage to say anything to Sirius—though that was a slightly more fearsome beast to tackle—and try as he might, Remus couldn't recall how he'd ended up in such a mess. He and Amelia had been paired off in history, and for the last three weeks the two of them had been meeting up during whatever free periods to work on the project. They'd presented it in class the day before and everything had gone off without a hitch. Afterwards Remus had assumed that would be the end of it. Stupid fool...

"There is someone else, isn't there?" Amelia whimpered, reading him the way a woman only could.

"No, really. I'm just not looking for a relationship right now. And besides, I think you'll find you'd be disappointed with me."

"Oh, Remus… You are so thick!"

She fled back in the direction of the dorms, leaving him to dawdle awkwardly by the front doors of the library. He knew he'd lingered a moment too long when none other than Severus Snape slipped out behind him.

"Lupin. I'd wondered how the school's biggest basket case was doing these days. Now I see you're breaking hearts as well as mirrors."

"Figures you'd be eavesdropping," Remus snarled. "Don't you have some seventh year chemistry class to torture?"

"Why would I bother with them when you're so intent on airing your dirty laundry right where anyone could see?"

"Piss off." Remus turned to march away, already intent to drown his sorrows in leftover gin and whatever Sirius had on the turntable, when Snape skipped to catch up with him.

"Come now, Loony. Where are you off to in such a hurry?"

"I'm going to see my friends. Sorry you can't say the same."

"Suppose you'll be filling them in on your little fling with Hodgkins then."

"None of your fucking business."

"Oh, what's wrong? Don't tell me you're embarrassed. You're not the one who ran off with tears streaming down their face. Really, I almost feel sorry for the girl."

"A new experience for you, I'm sure."

Snape chuckled, and it struck Remus how cheery it sounded. Too cheery to mean anything good, surely. "I wouldn't worry too much about Hodgkins if I were you," he said. "She'll get over it. As I hear it, the girl's been around the block more times than the local trolley."

"No one asked what you've heard, you slimy git!" Remus bellowed. "Now you'll stop following me if you know what's good for you!"

It was enough to give Snape pause. He flinched when Remus rounded on him, and Remus felt that familiar twinge of satisfaction. He'd just stepped away again when Snape yelled after him; the nail in the coffin.

"Careful, Loony! Spend any more time with those friends of yours and people are gonna start wondering if you're a ponce!"

He could've just given him another detention, slap his wrists with a pink slip and be done with it. But as it was, Remus had never been much inclined to settle things the 'prefectly' way. Before Snape even had time to cackle, Remus had turned round and grabbed him by the front of his school coat. He thrust him against the side of the library, pressing on his chest hard enough to force out a pathetic little wheeze.

"This is your last warning, Snivelly. You leave me and my friends alone, or you're gonna be coughing up teeth for a week. Capeesh?"

He didn't nod in understanding, that would be too much satisfaction for a single interaction, but the look on Snape's face told Remus he'd spooked him well enough. With another sharp shove to the chest, Remus tossed the miserable boy aside and threw himself back down the pavement. This time, Snape knew better than to call after him.

"I can't believe it," Sirius said when he'd arrived on time for their music lesson and told him. "You actually said the word 'capeesh'? Oh god, Moony, that's so lame!"

"Snape didn't seem to think so when he was pissing his pants outside the library."

"I would've paid to see it."

As enthralled as Sirius was with the whole story, Remus remained uneasy. Snape may have just been looking for the easiest way to get under his skin, but if he'd noticed anything going on between them, then...

"You don't think he actually knows, do you?"

"That we're shagging under the covers? No, I don't. I think if he did the entire world would know by now. Snape's just being a git, per usual."

"Do you ever think what would happen if it got out?"

Sirius shrugged. "Can't be disowned twice. Might make our plan for world domination a bit harder though. Maybe if we went to a school of nobodies it wouldn't matter as much."

Remus bit his lip, thinking of his list. "A lot more people know about us now. You aren't worried they'll say something on accident?"

"Are you?"

Instantly Remus felt bad. They were his friends. And Regulus, though a part of him still held out hope there as well.

"Sorry," Sirius answered first, nudging him softly with his elbow. "Stupid question. We just won't tell anyone else then. Keep it contained, so we know who to put a hit on if it ever gets out."

"What about Peter?"

At that, Sirius looked uneasy. "Pete's never been able to keep a secret. Remember our first year together when he let slip to Snape about my birthday? He lets slip about this and we'll have a lot more than detention to worry about... 'Sides, doubt he'd appreciate knowing that he lives with a couple 'a poofters anyway."

He wasn't sure it was fair to Peter, but who was he to tell Sirius off for not coming out? He had been acting a bit odd ever since Valentine's, but no... Remus forced the idea away. Best not press their luck, not with Snape breathing down their necks anyway.

"Maybe we should plan a prank," Sirius said.

"What's this I hear about a prank?" James called, arriving just in time to take up the empty chair on Sirius' other side. Peter followed, a single drumstick already in hand. He sat on the stands next to Remus and pulled his bag strap over his shoulder with a giddy smile.

"Hey, Lupin! Look what I finally figured out how to do this morning!" He proceeded to demonstrate an impressive little manoeuvre, twirling the drumstick around multiple fingers like the blades of a propeller. It was a pretty nifty trick for a guy who couldn't tie his own shoes until he was thirteen, and Remus nodded appreciatively.

"Neat trick, Pete. Where's your other stick?"

Peter caught the drumstick out of the air. "Dr. Becker confiscated it. I was practising in maths."

"Ah."

"I'll just get another one from Buchanan. Oh, also I can do this now!"

"If you're quite finished," Sirius interjected, silencing Peter just as he was about to twirl the drumstick in his opposite hand; "I was trying to say, Moony doesn't want a birthday party, but we can't just do nothing. We should celebrate another way—a better way—with a prank."

"Who's getting pranked?" James asked.

"Snivellus. Stupid git deserves it, he tried coming after Moons this morning."

"It was nothing," Remus surmised. "Just a sorry loser talking out his arse."

"Can't have that," James mused, "imagine the stink."

There was no culling it after that. All through the lesson, every time Sheila had her back turned, one of them was whispering some inane idea to get back at the sworn enemy.

“Think he has a diary? Bet he has a diary… We could steal it and make copies to post all over school. Just like Reg did with your poem!”

“I’m not laughing, Sirius.”

“Maybe we should get Lily to ask him on a date,” Peter suggested. James looked at him, utterly appalled, and he blanched. “Not for real, obviously! As a joke.”

“Evans’ll never do it,” Sirius sniggered. "I think a part of her still holds out hope that Snivelly will magically turn out to be a good person."

“Or maybe Lily’s just a good person,” Remus added.

“S’a good idea though… Hm…”

“Boys, since you’re all so intent on gabbing through the lesson, how about we start this week’s listening quiz with you.”

“Aw. C’mon, Sheila…”

After they’d finished and the bell had rung, Sheila pulled him aside. Worried he’d somehow bollixed up his test, Remus followed her into the office only to be presented with a guitar case sitting atop her desk. He recognised it without question; it was the shiny Martin acoustic she’d let him play before Christmas.

“A little birdy told me it was your birthday tomorrow,” Sheila smiled. “Thought you should have something nice to celebrate.”

Remus’ mouth fell open.

“This?”

“I changed the strings yesterday,” Sheila said quickly, popping the case’s lid to reveal the pristine guitar lying within. “Personally, I love the timbre that comes with old strings, but she needed a good clean and I worried about what they would eventually do to the fretboard. I did keep them though, just in case you liked the sound.”

Remus was speechless, as he often was in the face of Sheila’s kindness. He’d felt terrible when Tomny bought the Teisco for him, but this—this was a work of art.

“I can’t take this,” he babbled. “I-It’s not even my birthday yet.”

“I know, but we don’t have class together tomorrow, and I wanted to make sure I got it to you before I left for the weekend. Call it an advance.”

“Oh.”

She smiled, guilty. “Not what you were expecting?”

He hadn’t been expecting anything at all, but saying that would’ve sounded ungrateful, surely.

“Are you sure you’re allowed to give away the school’s instruments?”

“Oh! You don’t have to worry about that, this one doesn’t belong to the school. It was mine actually, when I was your age. My parents gifted it to me for my eighteenth birthday as well. Now giving you a hand-me-down almost feels like a slight faux pas, but no one’s played it in so long. It saddened me to see her just collecting dust.”

A faux pas?! Remus looked down at the guitar again. It was beautiful, probably worth a pretty penny. And she was giving it to him?

“Mrs. Buchanan… I really can’t take this.” Couldn’t even touch it.

“Nonsense.” She bent down and pulled the instrument from its case, practically pressing it into his hands herself. Remus’ thumb brushed the strings and a rich sound rang out, perfectly tuned.

“It would make me happy to know you have it,” Sheila said. “A musician should have all the resources available to them, right?”

Remus’ hold tightened around the neck as he bit his lip. He couldn’t bring himself to admit it, but he wanted the guitar—badly.

“Do you do this for all of your students?”

The question seemed to catch her off guard. She blinked at him, chuckling once. “You’re not just my student, you’re my…”

“Your dead friend’s kid,” he finished for her.

She frowned, then smiled sadly, which was somehow even worse. “You don’t have to take it, but it’s yours if you want it.”

There was a bad feeling. Where's the catch? There's always a catch!

Remus looked down at the guitar. He imagined it were being held by David Gilmour of Pink Floyd and not some scrawny kid from south London and that made things a bit easier.

"Thank you, Mrs. Buchanan."

"You're welcome, Remus."

* * *

"Happy birthday to you! Happy birthday to you! Happy birthday to Remus, happy birthday to youuuuu!"

He blew out the candles, all two dozen of them, and Hope and Giles and the entire household staff clapped their hands together in celebration.

"I can't believe it, my little baby's already seven years-old!" Hope squealed, pulling him into an iron-clad hug. Behind them, Giles chuckled as he gripped the back of Remus' chair proudly. His hair was more red than white back then, but he still had the telltale lines on his forehead carved by eyebrows that raised up with every sardonic smile.

"Yes, sir. He'll be a man soon enough."

"No, I simply won't allow it!"

"Muuuuum, gerroff!"

Hope gave a great sigh and pulled back, pushing the hair out of her son's face. "You're growing up too fast. It's like I blink and you're suddenly an entire year older. I can still remember when you were small enough to fit in the palms of my hands."

"I was never that small," he protested, looking past her and eyeing the tiered cake greedily. Their head chef, Rosel, had made it specially for him, though she'd only let him put one finger in the icing bowl the night before.

"Of course you were," Hope cried; "ask Giles."

"Your mother's right. When you came home from the hospital you were no bigger than the teddy bear waiting for you."

Remus raised his arm, showing off the stuffed toy with floppy ears.

“Seabiscuit’s a dog.”

Giles ruffled his hair. “Dog, then.”

“Would you like to try your cake, darling?” Hope asked, while Rosel began plating up the dessert on expensive china plates. They set a slice down in front of him and Remus picked up his fork, getting ready to stab into it—then the other side of the table caught his eye. The chair was empty, without a place setting.

“Remus? Don’t you want to try your cake?”

“When’s daddy coming home?”

Hope blinked her pretty blue eyes. “I’m not sure, darling,” then; “Tomorrow.”

“You said that yesterday.”

“Your father had to head up to Manchester this week, son,” Giles said. “He’ll be back soon.”

Remus wasn’t satisfied. He was seven and nature demanded stubbornness. He wanted his father.

“I want him here now.”

“Mummy’s here,” Hope smiled, spreading her red lips. “Didn’t we agree that Mummy was enough?”

“I want Daddy. It’s my birthday.”

There was a passing beat, and Hope drew herself up with a deep breath. “Remus John Lupin, you’re going to hurt your friends’ feelings. They all gathered to celebrate your birthday.”

He looked around. The maid behind him had slapped his fingers that morning for mixing potions in the bathroom with all the nice smelling soaps. And that butler was new. He’d never said a word to Remus before.

“I want Daddy,” Remus said again. “Can I call him on the telephone?”

Hope balled up the napkin in her lap. “If you’re not going to eat the cake Rosel stayed up all night to make you, then you’ll have to go to your room. Ungrateful boys don’t get birthday parties.”

“I don’t want a birthday party. I want daddy.”

“Fine then.” She began pulling the plate away, and Remus grabbed her arm.

“No! I’ll eat it…”

“Apologise to Rosel first.”

“Sorry, Rosel.”

Hope let go and Remus pulled the plate back toward himself, quickly stuffing a bite of cake into his mouth. It was delicious, so sweet it stung his tongue.

His mother smiled again, leaning in close. She kissed his cheek and it hurt. She’d burned him with her kiss, and when she drew away again she’d changed. Her blue eyes had gone dark, her teeth had grown long and sharp. Red lipstick dripped from her chin.

“Shall we open your gifts afterwards, darling?”

“No!” He wailed. “No, stop! I want Daddy!”

“Darling, we agreed.” She raised a clawed hand. Behind her the maid was a devil with a snake’s tongue and the butler was engulfed in flames. He smiled as he set Giles alight, and no one seemed to notice the old man’s screams.

“I want Daddy!”

“MUMMY IS ENOUGH!”

Remus awoke with a start. There were no forked tongues or flame-clad men, just a dorm room with three snoring friends. It was his birthday today, he was eighteen, and yet all he could think was how long it’d been since he’d seen that stuffed dog.

* * *

Friday 10th March 1978

His friends may have relented to no parties, but that did not mean they weren’t going to let the entire world know that it was Remus’ birthday. That morning when they arrived for breakfast, Remus had to endure a full rendition of ‘Happy Birthday’ courtesy of half of Hawkings' student body. Even Barty joined in, though it was undoubtedly just so he could replace 'Remus' with 'Loony'. Remus was still embarrassed, and spent the remainder of breakfast pelting Sirius with bits of cereal, and when he really deserved it—entire slices of toast.

"Count your lucky stars, Moons!" James cheered. "You and Snivellus got out of an entire day of pranking."

"Only 'cause you guys couldn't come up with anything decent in time."

"Oh yeah? That's what you think…"

Remus nearly asked, but just then Sirius started up another round of 'Happy Birthday', this time in Italian. Or at least, he thought it was Italian. He found out later that it was really Pig Latin.

"This isn't even going to be the most embarrassing part of your day!" Sirius cackled, using his school bag as a shield while he made a beeline for the door. "See you in class, Moony!"

"Or before, you never know!" James added, following him out.

He let them go, telling himself he didn't care enough to worry about it. There was only two of them, how clever could they be?

"Pete, are you ready for English?"

Peter nodded, staunchly. He'd said very little apart from singing "Happy Birthday", and now appeared to be going slightly purple in the face.

"Pete?"

"He's not talking to you," Lottie explained from across the table. "Doesn't want to ruin the surprise."

"Christ."

"It isn't a party," Mary insisted. "But you're going to wish it was."

"When I told everyone that I didn't want a fuss, I meant it."

"Mm, yes. Too bad we don't believe you. In fact, I'm starting to wonder if it isn't just a vain attempt to get even more attention."

“I assure you, it’s not.”

She shrugged, looking coy. “Happy birthday, Remus.”

“Happy birthday, Remus!”

“Happy birthday, Lupin!”

“Lupin, it’s your birthday ain’t it?”

“Happy birthday, big man!”

They followed him everywhere. Kids he’d never even spoken to strode right up as if they’d been waiting in a queue. Every now and then he spotted what he thought could be a flash of dark hair and glasses, but every one of his well-wishers was adamant; no one had put them up to it at all.

On their way to English, Remus reamed into Peter.

“Do they think it’s funny? Does it look like I’m laughing?!”

Peter kept his lips clamped shut, and just as Remus considered reaching over and wrenching his mouth open himself, a foot appeared in his path and sent him sprawling. Barty and his cronies stood off to the side, laughing at him as he stumbled on the slick tile.

“Happy birthday, Loony!” Each of them chittered, making their escape before Remus could even consider retaliating.

It’s just one day, he told himself, just get through today.

“I heard it was your birthday today, Mr. Lupin,” Professor Flitwick said as he handed out that day’s assignment. “Good show!”

Remus languished. He’d never considered himself all that difficult to embarrass, but James and Sirius were turning it into a fool’s errand and it was only ten o’clock. If only he knew what was coming.

As Flitwick lectured, Remus kept his chin propped up on his arms, already zoning out on a crack in the chalkboard hovering just over the stubby professor’s head. Two seats ahead, Peter had spent the entire period with his head down into his lap. He seemed to be worrying about something, but Remus wasn’t close enough to enquire what it was without being overheard.

Halfway through class, Jodie, the girl who sat in front of him, turned around in her chair.

“Are you alright, Remus? You look as though you just watched a puppy get run over.”

Remus never got to answer. At the same moment the classroom’s door flew open—WHAM!—and none other than Sirius Black stood in its doorway. He looked distraught, distinctly un-Sirius-like as he slammed the door shut behind himself and tore into the classroom with frantic urgency.

“Excuse me! I’m sorry, Professor, but I’ll only need a moment.”

Professor Flitwick leaned over his podium, nearly toppling off the stepping stool he used to reach it. “Mr. Black, we are in the middle of a lesson—”

“Yeah, I know, Flitty. But this can’t wait!”

“M–Mr. Black!”

Sirius ignored the spluttering teacher, and instead began strutting straight between the rows of desks. Various kids wrenched their heads around to get a better look as he stopped before Remus’ desk and slammed his hands down on its surface, going as far as to topple Remus’ neat stack of books. Remus might’ve rebuffed him, were Sirius not already clearing his throat.

“Moony, my Moony, in vain I have struggled! These last few months have been a torture, and I can suppress my feelings no longer! I cannot tolerate these foul rumours being spread—I will not share you!”

Ahead of them, Jodie Gagnon’s mouth fell open. Peter looked mortified, but not entirely surprised, and Professor Flitwick had practically climbed across the top of his podium.

“S–Sirius Black, I cannot condone—”

“Doubt truth to be a liar,” Sirius wailed, “but never doubt, I love! You must, Moony! You must! I simply cannot take it if you won’t! And so I ask you now, how? How could you do this to me?!”

This is the part where I kill Sirius Black, Remus thought blithely. He was doing a stellar job of not breaking character, but whereas Sirius was going for tragic romance, the class was roaring like a comedy. Remus could see it now—Snape would be spreading his poncy agenda by midday, and then there'd be no use in hiding it.

"Sirius—"

"How could you do that to me?!"

"DO WHAT?!"

The class erupted back into laughter, and a shadow of a smirk fell across Sirius' lips. He recovered quickly though, and launched back into his undoubtedly well-rehearsed monologue.

"After everything we've been through!" He moaned, smacking the desk again. "You tell me all those things—those sweet, sweet things, and then you just leave? Don't even wait for me to wake up, you just sneak away like a coward out the back door?! Leave me out to dry like I'm some old sock that's finally got too many holes in it—but you're the one who wore the holes in me, Moony—you!"

"I'm going to wear a lot more into you if you don't bugger off!"

"You cold, heartless fiend!"

"That is quite enough, Mr. Black!"

Professor Flitwick had finally come down from his podium. He strode toward Remus' desk with purpose, flapping his stout arms about as though it might subdue the rollicking class.

"You'll have to leave this instant, else it'll be two weeks detention."

"But Professor, would you give in so easily had you'd been so terribly wounded by the object of your deepest affections?"

"Sirius, go!"

Sirius spun round. "I will not! Give me detention, I don't care. None of it's worth anything if you don't love me back! And I love you, you hear me, Moony? Dammit, just talk to me!"

"Mr. Black, OUT! Right now, before I have to call—"

"BLACK!"

It was James. He burst into the room with an even louder bang than Sirius had, and for a single foolish moment, Remus almost thought he was saved. Surely James, in all his emphatic pandering, would know exactly the sort of disaster this spelt. Surely he would solve all their—

"I told you already, Moony's with me now! All the bleeding poetry in the world won't save your fractured heart!"

A holler went up, mostly from the girls, and Sirius pointed a vicious finger at his best friend.

"You stay out of this, Potter! You've been jealous ever since you found out the truth, but I won't sit back as you try to steal away the only thing that's ever made me happy in this godforsaken world!"

"This is getting pathetic. Let it go, man! "

"I will not let it go!" Sirius rounded on Remus again and bent down until they were nearly nose-to-nose over the desk. "Moony, I can't keep going around pretending like nothing's happening between us, I have to say something! People have got to know that what we have between us is real! As real as this blood as it courses through my flesh!"

He grabbed Remus by the wrist and pressed his hand over his own heart, a move that shocked Remus so badly he wrenched his entire arm back and fell from his chair.

"Mr. Lupin!" Flitwick shrieked.

"Moony!"

"Now you've gone and done it!" James stalked forward, giving Sirius a sharp shove to the shoulder. "Give it up, Black! You knew it was never gonna work. I already told you, damn it—he doesn't want you, Remus is with me now!"

Remus whipped his head up. "Remus is what?!"

The laughter was rapturous, as loud and as delighted as the smile Sirius kept forcing from his face. James was no different.

"Hear that, Black? He doesn't love you, he doesn't even know you! You're a joke!"

"You've always been jealous of what we had! Lupin's the moon and I'm his stars—what are you? A bulky, ginger-worshipping arse!"

"Don't get petty just 'cause you know Lupin prefers my arse to yours."

Another kid hooted from across the room; Ow-ow! but Sirius remained undeterred.

“Potter! Everything was fine until you came along and started objectifying my Moony with that wanton gaze of yours. You think I’ll hand over Lupin’s heart so easily?”

“Hard to give something you never had in the first place.”

“Oooh! Keep it up, I’ll kill you.”

“I’d like to see you try!”

Sirius squared up instantly and James practically toppled poor Jodie’s desk as he leapt forward to get at him. As the two idiots collided in the middle of the aisle, mostly a rumple of limbs, Remus got to his feet and could only watch. All around them kids were gasping and shouting in glee.

“Pin him, Potter!”

“Go for the eyes, Black!”

“Right hook—right hook!”

“You and I are best mates no longer!” Sirius grunted, rolling James into another desk with a loud clatter. “I hate your guts, Potter!”

“The feeling’s—” James shoved him back; “MUTUAL!”

Boys pumped their arms, girls gathered together to shriek and yelp. A right hook from James, a jab to the jaw from Sirius. Poor Professor Flitwick looked about ready to pass out.

And then Peter stood up from his chair.

“Y–You’re all wrong! R–Remus’ heart is m–mine!”

Remus covered his face with his hands.

“Enough! That is enough!” Professor Flitwick howled. “Stop this nonsense this instant or I’ll have you both in detention for the rest of the year!”

No one listened, and Sirius delivered another spectacular blow to his friend’s abdomen. James retaliated by practically picking him up from the floor and throwing him over some poor girl’s desk in the second row, pumping his arms in victory until suddenly—a prefect's whistle cut through the air, and Jillian Stewart appeared in the doorway.

"I heard there was a fight going on! Professor McGonagall sent me to break it up!"

Professor Flitwick gestured desperately the boys, who were still rolling around on the ground with two stupid grins on their faces. Huffing, Jillian came forward and grabbed them both by the collars, hauling them to their feet and facing the class. "You great idiots," she sighed. "Now what's this all about?"

"I'm dating Remus Lupin!" Sirius shouted indignantly.

"No, I am!" James replied.

Jillian shook her head as though it were a lost cause. "Remus Lupin," she announced, turning every head in the room back Remus' way; "I told you to keep your personal problems in the bedroom."

"Fuck off."

"MR. LUPIN!"

Remus rolled his eyes at the scorned professor, but at least the laughs were his own this time. With a heavy shake of her head, Jillian turned a rather sorry-looking James and Sirius toward the door and marched them out.

"Really, it's pathetic!" She said, loudly enough to be heard from out in the hall. "You two—best friends—so obsessed with one person that you're fighting. I mean, come on, we all know who Remus is really going out with anyway."

At the last second, Jillian's face reappeared in the doorway and she blew a kiss and a wink in Remus' direction.

"I'll see you at dinner, darling. Kisses!"

"Stewart!" Sirius' voice wailed. "Not you too!"

A few people began to clap, while Remus just pressed his fingers deep into his eye sockets. He helped Jodie right her desk, and in return she gathered a few of his scattered books for him, only to pass them over with a wary look.

"You sure are popular, Remus."

Remus was about to spurn her—if this is popularity, please take it from me—when Flitwick appeared in the aisle between them, looking eerily calm despite the hairs that had come askew in his moustache.

“To be quite frank, I’m not entirely sure what just happened,” the Professor said; “but since you seem to be the common denominator, Mr. Lupin…”

Without another word, Flitwick placed a detention slip on the corner of his desk and returned to the front of the classroom. Remus couldn’t even object.

After class, he collected his things and spurned a very guilty-looking Peter before stalking out into the hall. Sniggers followed him the entire way; he figured he had about ten minutes of peace before word of James and Sirius’ passionate confessions made their way into common knowledge and the teasing became incessant, but of course he didn’t even get that. When he emerged Sirius was waiting for him, leaning back against a row of lockers with an unlit cigarette balanced between his lips. Fit bastard.

“Good lesson, Moons?”

With a huff, Remus walked straight up to him and snatched the cigarette from his mouth, tucking it behind his own ear. Then he smacked the detention slip against Sirius’ forehead.

“You got me detention, you git.”

Wincing, Sirius peeled the slip from his forehead and looked it over, completely chuffed. “Er… Happy birthday?”

Remus scoffed and kept on down the hall. Sirius followed, naturally, and got in front of him, so he was walking backwards. “Hey, don’t be mad. We had to do something for your birthday. It was either this or publicly ask out McGonagall on your behalf.”

“Why would it be between that and asking out the Headmistress?!”

“For the drama, duh.”

“You’re a cunt.”

“Aw, don’t tell me you’re mad? You’re all the school’s gonna be talking about for weeks!”

“ ‘Cause that’s been my goal from the very beginning.”

Sirius smirked wryly. “We were only trying to show you our love. And now Snape can’t say shit. We owned it. Now it’s our joke, not his.”

Remus laughed incredulously. “You wanted to keep Snape from calling us ponces so you do it for him?”

“Yes, that’s it exactly!” Sirius preened, closing the distance between them and pressing his fingertips against Remus’ chest. “Plain sight, Moony. If we hide out in the open, no one’ll suspect anything. And as a little added bonus… I finally get to tell the truth. I’m dating Remus Lupin.”

“Were you dropped on your head as a baby?”

“Probably. But at least I’m good-looking, right?”

Unimpressed, Remus made to go around him and Sirius grabbed him by the tie, pulling him back. “Moony, Moony, Moony… You’re not seeing the full picture here. Do you really think I’d just openly declare myself a poofter without a contingency plan? The day is young, and as far as anyone else is concerned, you’re Hawkings’ most eligible bachelor. Though, not for long I suspect.”

“Oh no—no more of this, I’ve had enough!”

“Don’t be such a wet blanket, love. You think everyone wants to sleep with you now, but if you can’t handle a few school-yard crushes, how are you doing to handle the masses when we’re rich and famous?”

“Sirius, what have you done?”

Instead of answering him, Sirius smirked and came forward, fixing Remus’ tie with long, meticulous fingers. “Figured I should make that incessant lovability of yours work for me for a change. But I should go… From what I’ve heard, you’ve got quite the busy schedule. See you later, birthday boy.”

He should’ve chased him down and beat the truth from him, or at least skived off the rest of the day. Either would’ve saved him from his friends’ carefully curated torture. In his second class, Professor Binns’ stirring lecture on Roman restoration was interrupted at least a dozen times when nearly every member of the Hawkings football team showed up with a rose with his name on it. They made no effort to introduce themselves, simply crashed into the room and threw the flower onto his desk, escaping with a great hoot. Some of the more bolder lads even opted to try for a cheeky snog, which had everyone in stitches. By the seventh rose, Mary and her other girlfriends were killing themselves in the last row, and Remus was picking petals from his hair.

After class he gave the flowers away to the girls, who were all much more keen on receiving them than he was. Apparently it earned him a few more points, as they started going around telling everyone that he was giving roses away to all of the prettiest girls, though this one got old rather quickly when others started realising that they had not received a rose themselves.

He would've assumed the Marauders' reach had ended with the football team, but he was proved wrong when the tenth year girls' choir met him outside of class and promptly launched into every annoying love song in their arsenal.

"I didn't know just what to do, so I whispered 'I love you'! And he said that he loved me too—and then he kissed meeeeee!"

Torture, actually. The girls followed him all the way to the library like a travelling band, by which time they'd mowed their way through most of Dusty Springfield's discrography as well as several agonising canticles. Thankfully Ms. Pince took one look at them and promptly chased the girls off for disturbing the peace. If he'd had a shred of patience left, Remus might've been impressed; whatever James and Sirius had told them, it'd certainly taken some serious coordination.

The library was supposed to be a safe haven. Remus secluded himself amongst the stacks as he so often did, but he should've known better. Sirius knew all of his hiding spots, and within the hour he'd suffered through no less than seven very public marriage proposals, three declarations that he was in fact a cheating bastard, and four offers to sneak away for a rather cheeky pint at the Three Broomsticks. Even Audriana made an appearance. She was flanked by two of her closest girlfriends, but at least she'd brought a present.

"I hope you like chocolate."

"No eating in the LIBRARY!" Ms. Pince screeched, before promptly ejecting all of them from the building.

By lunch, Remus was sure he'd lost ten years off his life. He took a seat at the table furthest from the dining hall's doors, but he was spotted anyway. First by Peter, then Lily and Lottie, all of whom didn't seem all that interested in the pranks. Well, almost. The girls couldn't help smirking at him and Peter was still clearly embarrassed in his delayed contribution to James and Sirius' row.

"Sirius told me to say it!" He insisted. "I thought it was rubbish."

"I heard it was hilarious," Lottie assured. "Remus, when you and your many, many, many lovers marry, can I be a bridesmaid?"

"Ooh! Ooh! Can I walk you down the aisle?" Lily giggled.

Remus dropped his head down on the table with a groan.

"Poor Remus," Lottie cooed. "Would a kiss make you feel better?"

"Oi, lips to yourself, Lot," Sirius said, arriving at the table with James in tow. "That's my man you're trying to snog."

"I'll fight you for him."

"Alright, but I warn you, I play dirty."

"Oh trust me, I know."

James and Sirius shared a matching grin. They sat down and Remus had to resist the urge to stab them both with his fork.

"Now that doesn't look like the face of the man who's just gotten engaged twelve times," James said, as he slid in between Lily and Peter at the table.

"Piss off," Remus grunted, before his curiosity got the better of him; "How'd you do it? How'd you get so many people to go along with this idiotic plan of yours?"

"Pure animal magnetism," Sirius declared, grabbing him by shoulders and rolling his tongue in his ear. Immediately, Remus seized up and shoved him away, grumbling.

"You're not funny."

Sirius stuck his tongue out.

"You should tone it down, Sirius," Peter said. "People are gonna get the wrong idea."

"What wrong idea?" Sirius sneered; "Really, I should be so humbled to think that anyone would actually believe Moony and I are dating. You hear that world? I'M DATING REMUS LUPIN!"

A cheer of camaraderie went up from several other tables. A wolf whistle, and several more declarations of love came rolling in.

"ME TOO!"

"HE'S MINE!"

"GET YOUR OWN!"

Sirius spun around, practically vibrating in his seat. "I'm dating Remus Lupin," he chittered. And for all the embarrassment and torture he'd been put through, Remus couldn't find it in him to be angry.

"I hate you," he mumbled, leaning his chin into his hand to hide his smile. Perfectly pleased, Sirius simply blew him a kiss.

There was a clatter as Mary and Marlene arrived at the table with their lunch trays, completing their group.

"Why are we sitting all the way back here?" Mary frowned, before flipping her hair over her shoulder. "Whatever. Helloooo, Remus, dear."

She slid into the table next to him, sidling up close enough that both their thighs and shoulders were touching. It might've been alright, had she not budged in front of Marlene to snag it. Marlene frowned as Mary shoved her lunch tray aside and replaced it with her own, and Remus looked between them, entirely bewildered. Surely they couldn't be back to fighting already?

"Mary, you took my seat."

"Go sit by Lily," Mary replied dismissively, batting her eyelashes at Remus while he stuffed several bites of sandwich into his mouth.

Marlene crossed her arms. "But I always sit by Remus."

"You don't always sit by Remus. What an absurd thing to say."

"What's absurd is your sudden fascination with him. You never cared about getting Remus' attention before. What's changed? Run out of boys with an IQ below eighty?"

"Don't be jealous, Marls," Mary replied. "It gives you wrinkles."

“And what does being a slag get you? Venereal diseases?”

Remus choked on his food. He might’ve thought it was more serious, had Mary not burst into laughter and stood up from the table.

“There!” She said, thrusting a finger toward Marlene’s brow. “I can see one forming right now. The Mariana Trench of foreheads!”

Marlene swatted her hand away. “Get out of my seat.”

“Make me.”

Sirius whistled. “Cat fight!”

It was like lighting a beacon fire. Kids were craning their heads immediately, ready for round two, and Mary was about to deliver.

“You're calling me a slag, Marls, but all I see is a frigid little church girl. Why don’t you go back to saving yourself for Jesus. Remus is a man, he deserves a woman.”

“And what you deserve is a good kick up the arse!”

Mary turned and shook her skirt at her. “Only if you kiss it first.”

Marlene raised her hands, clamping them over Mary’s head and shaking her vigorously. Mary screeched—“Not the hair!”—and the girls fell backwards, bowling straight into Remus and Sirius and shoving them down to the edge of the bench.

“Jesus Christ!” Remus grunted, crushed beneath Mary’s back. “Can’t you all just give it a rest already?!”

“All’s fair in love and war. Maybe you should just pick one of ‘em,” Sirius sniggered, before taking an elbow to the temple.

“Neither!” Remus wailed. “I pick neither, now get off!”

Mary and Marlene both gasped, shooting upright on the dinner bench.

“Remus, what are you saying?”

“I—”

“Are you breaking up with us?”

“We never dated!”

“Liar!” Mary moaned. “You told me I was your one and only! Right after I let you eat me out on the common room fl—”

Nearly screaming, Remus clamped a hand over Mary’s mouth himself. “Cut it out!” He wailed. “We. Are. In. PUBLIC!”

“I don’t care!” She declared, ripping his hand free. “I’m not afraid of my love. Even if you are a selfish lover. I can change you!”

“Eat yourself, Mary!” Remus hissed, at his utter wit’s end. He might’ve launched himself up from the table altogether had Sirius not pressed in on him from behind, pinning him in place.

“What’s ‘a matter, Moony? Wouldn’t that story only be embarrassing if it were true?”

Across from them, James slammed his fist on the tabletop. “Moony, you two-timer!”

“Technically he’s at least a four-timer,” Lottie pointed out, popping a grape into her mouth as though it were popcorn at the cinema.

Mary burst into tears.

“REEEMUS! YOU CHEATING BASTARD!”

There were whistles from at least two tables down, as well as jeering, shouting, and several rounds of “Lupin, you dog!” Mary continued to cry, putting on a spectacular show of it while Marlene stomped her foot like a scorned child.

“Mary, stop crying! You’re embarrassing my Remus!”

“Your Remus?” Sirius echoed.

“Yes! My Remus!”

“Oh look, there’s Moira,” Peter said, taking his tray and leaving the table.

“Peter, wait!” Remus begged, still locked between Mary and Sirius. If Sirius noticed his distress, he didn’t seem to care, instead he only thrust a nasty finger at Marlene.

“You had your shot, McKinnon, now back off! I’ll fight for my man if I have to!"

"Oh yeah? Square up then, pretty boy! You may be able to go toe-to-toe with Potter, but I think you'll find me a much nastier row."

Releasing hold of Remus, Sirius leapt up from the table and Marlene gave him several weak pops to the jaw with her closed fist, both of them grinning. Taking his opportunity, Remus went to flee, only to have Lily reach across the table and snatch his sleeve.

"Remus, are we still on for that date tomorrow?"

"Date?!" James demanded.

"You're not invited."

James sputtered indignantly.

"Hope everyone's hungry," Lottie observed calmly, " 'cause here comes cake."

Horror-stricken, Remus looked up to see a group of girls carrying a large sheet-cake across the dining hall, candles already lit. Across the middle, he could just make out the words 'We ♡ Remus' written in red icing. The stuff of nightmares.

Wrenching his arm back, Remus grabbed his bag and fled. He would've hopped the window if he could, but instead he ran around the outside of the dining hall to avoid the leering crowds, earning himself a spectacular round of whooping applause. Screw the rest of his lessons, there was only so much embarrassment one fool could take.

Fully prepared to return to his dorm room and never reemerge, Remus passed the first outdoor courtyard, busy with coming and going students, and instead made his way toward one of the dining hall's grassy quadrangles. He was surprised to find it empty save for a single person—even more surprised to find that that person was Regulus Black.

Ever since his return, Barty and the others had been surrounding their friend like a pack of antsy guard dogs, almost never letting Regulus out of their sight. Seeing him alone almost made Remus wonder if maybe something was wrong, but when he approached and asked if he could sit, Regulus squinted at him in distaste.

“No.”

“Would you let me sit if I said it was my birthday?”

Regulus glared at him.

“… If you’re quiet.”

Happily, Remus took up the spot opposite to him at the bench, and they sat in silence for a long while. Regulus didn’t so much as look at him; he had a book open in his lap and his lunch remained untouched on its tray. It made Remus’ stomach rumble a bit—he’d barely had time to touch his own—but there was no way he was going back inside. He’d starve first.

“You’re all by yourself today,” Remus said eventually.

“Keenly observed,” Regulus replied, not bothering to raise his head.

“Did you fight with your friends or something?”

“No, I just wanted a bit of peace. Got a bit rowdy inside.”

“Oh… heh… Heard some of that, did you?”

“Depends. Do you mean the part where my brother openly declared his love for you, or the bit where you and that Macdonald girl shagged in public?”

“So you heard all of it,” he snorted. “That’s funny. I didn’t think you knew what the word ‘shagged’ meant.”

“You don’t know a lot of things about me.”

A smile tugged at the corner of Remus’ mouth. “Touché.”

“Don’t think you can hang around and cause trouble. I’m not interested in watching your stupid friends lose their minds over you, and I’m not about to fight valiantly for your heart either so if that’s what you were expecting you can forget it.”

“You mean Regulus Black isn’t in love with me? How will I ever go on.”

Rolling his eyes, Regulus turned back to his book, and Remus mourned the fact that he hadn’t deigned to bring one for himself.

“Nice courtyard…” He murmured. “Not too chilly out today either… Hm… Good place to read, really.”

“Do you know what ‘quiet’ means, Lupin?”

“Yes, but you’re the only one I can count on to always be in a worse mood than I am. Makes me feel a bit better about myself.”

Another eye roll.

“What is it you’re reading?” Remus asked.

“ ‘The History of Jazz’.”

“Oh… Good read?”

“A bit dry actually.”

“So you wouldn’t recommend it?”

“Not to you.”

“Hey, I like jazz,” Remus insisted. “Rock was built on jazz.”

“Something tells me the members of Black Sabbath aren’t that familiar with scalar improvisation.”

Remus thought he must be hearing things.

“… You listen to Black Sabbath?”

“I wouldn’t go that far.”

“You do!” He exclaimed. “My god, what’s your favourite song?”

“I don’t have one.”

“Mine’s ‘N.I.B.’.”

“Mediocre, at best.”

“You did not just call their best song mediocre.”

“Everyone likes ‘N.I.B.’, it was their debut. They didn’t care if it was perfect, they just wanted to shock their hippy neighbours. ‘Paranoid’ blows the whole thing out of the water.”

Remus was flabbergasted. “How do you know all of this?”

At the question, Regulus grew flustered. “Sirius… may have misplaced a tape or two over the years.”

“You little thief.”

“I’ll deny it if you say anything. I’ll take your thumbs too.”

“Alright, alright, Mr. Dramatic,” Remus cooed. “It can stay our little secret if that’s what you want. But you should know that Sirius would go insane if he knew.”

“He’s already insane. Thought you would’ve figured it out by now, you’re the one dating him.”

Suddenly a bit shy, Remus glanced down at his lap and smiled to himself. Yeah. Yeah, I am.

“Does this mean we can teach the kids ‘War Pigs’ next?”

“Don’t push it.”

“We can censor the words!” Remus urged. “Call it ‘Party Pigs’, imagine them ripping into—oh hey, Trish.”

Regulus jumped, fumbling the heavy book. It landed with a thud next to the table and Trish stopped to pick it up, having arrived while they were having their little back and forth.

“Hello, you two,” she smiled. “Lupin, what’s this—date number seventeen today?”

Regulus’ eyes bulged. “It’s not a date! Just because Lupin’s insatiable doesn’t mean everyone wants to be the apple of his fucking eye.”

“Calm down, Reginald, I was only joking,” Trish sniggered. “But I was looking for you. Your parents called Professor McGonagall’s office. She sent me to fetch ye.”

“Got it. Thanks, MacDuff.”

She nodded and glanced between them expectantly when Regulus made no indication that he was going anywhere. “Did you… forget the way?”

“No, I just thought I’d make them wait a bit longer.”

Trish smiled and passed his book back over. “Well, guess I’ll be seeing ye then."

"Uh-huh."

Lingering a bit longer, Trish smiled and flashed Remus a quick wave before turning and skipping away with her hands clasped behind her back. Regulus watched her go, probably not even realising he was doing it.

"You're staaariiiing," Remus said, sing-song.

Regulus snapped to attention. "I am not!"

"Did something happen between you two?"

"No. There is absolutely nothing going on between me and MacDuff."

"Oh? Can I call you Reginald too then?"

"Shut it. I already told you, if you can't be quiet, you can't stay."

Throwing up his hands, Remus sat back on his bench and swallowed a smile as Regulus bitterly opened his book once more. He was considering his chances of survival should he try teasing him again when his stomach rumbled loudly and he clasped a hand over it. Regulus glanced up sharply, and Remus gave him a sheepish look.

"Sorry, just my stomach. I'll be quiet now, promise."

And he was, apart from the incessant rumbling in his gut. On the third growl, Regulus scoffed and slid his untouched lunch across the table.

"Just eat it."

"But it's your lunch."

"And your stomach's like listening to a chainsaw. It'll be a relief."

Remus smiled. He picked up the sandwich and ate.

"Mhm… Tea's gone cold."

"Thin ice, Lupin. Thin. Ice."

* * *

Later that day…

'—FINISHED WITH MY WOMAN 'CAUSE SHE COULDN'T HELP ME WITH MY MIND! PEOPLE THINK I'M INSANE BECAUSE I AM FROWNING ALL THE TIME!'

"Moony!"

'ALL DAY LONG I THINK OF THINGS—'

"Moony!"

'—BUT NOTHING SEEMS TO SATISFY! THINK I'LL LOSE MY MIND IF I DON'T FIND SOMETHING TO PACIFY!'

"MOOOOOONY!"

Remus turned the hi-fi down. "I'm sorry, did you say something?"

"Yeah, I said—"

'—OCCUPY MY BRAIN!'

"Sorry, what was that?"

"I was saying—"

'—OH YEAH!'

"Oh, real mature!"

Sirius stomped over, punching the red 'stop' button on the stereo and snatching out the tape to dangle it in front of his face. Remus tsked, tucking himself further onto James' bed with Sheila's guitar in his lap.

"I've been looking for you, you know," Sirius grumbled. "We had an entire interpretive dance planned for the middle of Classics but you skived off! We were gonna laugh at that little vein that bulges in Bilshin's forehead whenever he gets slightly irked!"

"Funnily enough, I'm not sorry."

Sirius smirked, and then finally noticed the guitar. "Holy shit, where'd you get that?"

Remus raised the guitar up from his lap meekly. "Birthday present."

“From who? From… From your dad?”

“Yeah, as if. It’s from Sheila actually. She gave it to me yesterday.”

“No shit? Told you she liked you best. Between her and Tomny, you’re on your way to a whole collection.”

“She said it was hers from when she was our age. I tried telling her it was too much.”

“Maybe for someone else, but not for you.” Sirius looked up at him, and leaned in to kiss him over the guitar.

“Nice try,” Remus scoffed, turning his face away. “I’m still mad at you.”

“You sure?” Sirius captured his chin. “What if I do this?” He left a gentle peck on his jaw. “And this?” On his neck. “And this…?”

Sirius kept on going down, leaving longer and longer kisses in each new spot. Remus, as weak as he was, couldn’t help but enjoy it. He let it go on for a little while longer before turning and biting Sirius on the earlobe.

“Ow!” Sirius clapped a hand over his ear. “I’m all for a bit of roughness here and there but you should probably warn a guy first.”

“Stupid.” Remus kissed him on the cheek. “Now gimme my tape back.”

“In a second. I have something for you too. It's a surprise. Was gonna save it for later, but I reckon now’s as good a time as any.”

“If it's another interpretive dance, can you at least save it for when I’m drunk?”

Sirius laughed, and slipped over to his own bedside table to rifle around within it. Figuring that there was no way he could fit an entire ‘We ♡ Remus’ cake in his drawer, Remus set the Martin aside and began sorting through his own pocket. He’d just pulled out a cigarette and set it between his teeth when Sirius turned around, hands hidden behind his back.

“Close your eyes.”

Remus did so.

“Now choose a hand.”

A sigh. “Your… left.”

"Ooh, good guess."

There was a wet feeling—Sirius had licked his finger and shoved it in his ear.

“EUGH!” Remus bat his hand away, eyes flying open. “Have you not had enough?! I mean, really—!”

“Happy birthday, Moons!”

Remus’ breath lodged itself in his throat. Sirius was crouched low beside the bed, a single silver ring pinched between two fingers. He bit his lip over a smile, and urged Remus to take it.

“Well…? Don’t you like it?”

A laugh slipped out, and the cigarette dropped into his lap. “Sirius, if you wanted to ask me to marry you, you picked the wrong day. I’ve already had about nine different proposals, and I think the charm’s worn off a bit.”

“This isn’t an engagement ring!” Sirius yelped. “It’s a posey ring.”

“What the hell is a posey ring?”

“You’d know if you hadn’t spent all Christmas crying into Tomny’s couch.”

Remus scowled, and Sirius shook his head very quickly.

“It was Evans. She dragged us to this museum while you were gone, made us spend hours looking at old dead things, or things that used to belong to old dead things. Apparently lovers used to give each other these rings as a sort of promise, or something. They’d sometimes inscribe words or little messages on them too. I dunno, I guess I just saw it and thought… Well… Anyway, go on. Check it out.”

Sirius held the ring closer, and after tucking the cigarette back into his mouth, Remus slowly reached out to take it. It was thick in the band, not as round as a traditional wedding ring but rather more rough-hewn, like it’d been pulled directly from the fire and set on display. And right there on the inside he could make out the small engraving, clear as day; RJL.

Remus John Lupin.

“Moons, you’re not saying anything…”

“Oh!” Remus pulled the cigarette from his mouth again and cleared his throat “Sorry, I was just… Wow. It’s—uhm… It’s… beautiful.”

Sirius frowned. “You don’t like it.”

“No! No, I—I’m just shocked, is all. Ninth proposal, remember…”

“I told you, it’s not a proposal,” Sirius said. “I find those things reeking in heterosexual undertone. This is a promise.”

“A promise of what?”

“That we’ll always have each other. No matter what.”

“… No matter what.”

Sirius nodded. “But if you kiss Tomny again I’ll break your face.”

A warm feeling had suddenly burst across Remus’ chest. Quickly, he slid forward on James’ bed and took the ring from Sirius, slipping it over his fingertip. Tragically, the band never made it over his knuckle.

“Uh… Sirius, I’m sorry, but it doesn’t quite fit.”

Sirius’ face split into an audacious grin. “That’s ‘cause that one’s mine.”

“Huh?”

“You don’t think I’d give you a ring with your name on it, do you?”

Cheekily, Sirius pulled the band from his finger and slipped it onto the ring finger of his right hand. A perfect fit. Then he reached into his other pocket and withdrew a second ring, its twin in every way.

“Here, this one’s yours. We don’t have to wear them on our left hands or anything. It’d be enough if you just wore it at all.”

Remus bit his lip. He didn’t have to wonder what inscription he’d find on the inside of his ring. It could only be one thing; SOB.

Sirius Orion Black.

“You know your initials spell out ‘son of a bitch’, right?”

“No, tell me again.”

“Tsk… Son of a bitch.”

Sirius slipped the ring onto his finger and kissed his knuckles. “There. Now we match. I’m glad I got silver, the gold seemed a bit tacky.”

Remus looked down at them, and practically melted. He held his own hand up, pressing it to Sirius’ and letting their fingers slip together and intertwine. Somehow the metal of the bands were already warm. It felt so right; so Sirius. He wasn’t sure his heart had ever felt so full.

“Dunno what I did to deserve such expensive gifts,” Remus hummed.

“Who gives a shite about that, you’re priceless.”

Oh…

Sirius smirked. “I suppose this means you like the gift then?”

“Yes… Oh, yes.”

“Good. Now take off those trousers—your birthday ain’t over yet, rock star.”

* * *

What a drag it is getting old…

- “Mother’s Little Helper” The Rolling Stones, 1966

Tuesday 21st March 1978

Turns out, it was a good birthday. It was a good March, so far. It reminded Remus what they were looking forward to—what life together could be. Plans were being laid, universities applied to, songs written; it was all so good. He nearly forgot what it was to feel bad. Nearly. Apparently all of the professors had come together and decided that their workload that term had been far too light, and as a result, had piled on the assignments just as everyone was about to depart on holiday.

After an early supper, Remus and his friends congregated on the floor of the girls' bedroom, determined to finish the rest of their assignments, overdue or otherwise. The only ones who weren't drowning in homework were Sirius and Lily; Sirius because he didn't plan on finishing any of it in the first place, and Lily because she already had. While Sirius poured over a battered copy of last week's newspaper—paying special attention to the 'properties for rent' section—Lily had since moved on to one of her many university entrance essays, leaving them all in the dust. She'd may have been "conditional'ed" from Oxford, but that didn't mean she wasn't going to try for any other university that was worth its salt.

"Find anything in there yet?" Mary asked, sneaking over to Sirius and all but ignoring her unfinished essay. "You've been looking for ages."

Sirius rolled over so his head was resting against Remus' thigh. He straightened the paper and hummed lightly. "Dunno… There's this place in Lambeth that seems to have promise, but it's awfully close to the river, and I'm not sure how I'd feel waking up to the smell of rotting sushi every morning."

"The smell isn't that bad," Remus reasoned.

"Yes, but with our luck we'd move in one day and have a second coming of the Great Stink the next." Sirius shook his head, flapping his paper again. "I'm still looking."

"If you're so picky, then maybe you should just go see some of these places in person," Lottie suggested. "At least that way you could scope out the area."

Sirius glanced up at Remus. "You didn't tell them?"

"Tell us what?" Echoed Peter.

"Sirius and I are staying at school for Easter," Remus said, not looking up from his work.

James all but shot up from the floor. "You are?! Why?"

"Why not?" Sirius shot defensively. "Mary's going to Paris, you're both going to your girlfriends' houses. You think Moony and I like going home? No, might as well stay and have some peace from you lot."

“Ah, yes, peace from us,” Lily sneered.

“It doesn’t matter, he’s just gonna be catching up on the homework he’s refused to do before now,” Remus said.

“No, I’m not.”

“Yes, you are.”

Sirius made a displeased noise.

“I see, so it’ll just be the two of you?” Marlene pondered innocently.

Remus gave her a small smirk. “Leave it, Cherry.”

She appeared much less innocent after that.

“Right, I’ve had enough.” Sirius tossed the newspaper aside and sat up.

“You haven’t even done anything,” Lily blagged.

“I meant I’ve had enough of waiting on you people,” he huffed, before turning on James. “C’mon, you said we’d practise tonight. I want to show you that new riff.”

James frowned, looking down at all of his unfinished work. “Sorry, mate, don’t think I can swing it today. Got two days to finish this or Loughty’ll have my head.”

“Wormy?”

Peter sighed. “Can’t… got maths.”

“I’ll go with you, Pads,” Remus said, before Sirius could start pouting. They got up together and whilst they were slipping out the girls’ window, Mary whistled.

“Have fun, you two.”

“But not too much fun!” Marlene added.

“Bugger off,” Remus said, before noticing an odd look on Peter’s face; like he knew he was out on the joke but couldn’t quite figure out what it was. He nudged Lottie, and the two of them had one of their silent twin-telepathy moments. In the end all Lottie did was shake her head and feign indifference, but it was enough to make Remus regretful. He supposed that 'two of his best mates buggering each other' wasn't high on Peter's list of possibilities, but still, should probably say something.

Maybe after Easter…

Bidding Rowena House adieu, he and Sirius stopped by their own dorm to drop off and collect their things before heading on to the Bellchant building. It was dark, so Remus took Sirius' hand in a brief bout of boldness. Sirius squeezed back, and he felt their twin rings click together. Sometimes, on the days he was feeling most daring, Remus wore the ring on his left.

"Everyone's going home Thursday," Sirius said as they strolled. "Only two days until we've got this whole place to ourselves."

It was true. And Regulus was back, which meant there was no need to consider a cross-country trip or grand theft auto.

"There'll still be a few others around," Remus pointed out. "Lots are staying for exam prep."

"That's nothing. Those swots are gonna be locked up tight in the library. We'll be able to go wherever we want."

"Hm."

"We should fuck in the common room."

"Don't even think about it."

"Why not? Where's your sense of adventure?"

"It's up yours, actually."

"Was that meant to be a dirty euphemism?"

"Just walk on, idiot."

The music hall was still lit up by the time they reached it, and a group of students were piling out its front doors, all bundled up in their scarves and coats. Remus recognised them as several of the girls that'd followed him around singing choir songs on his birthday and was instantly embarrassed. Luckily the girls didn't do much more than giggle as they passed, and a single warning glance in Sirius' direction kept his mouth shut.

“The choir was actually James’ idea,” he sniggered, as they walked through the doors.

“Sure.”

“It was! … Bloody brilliant too.”

Remus knocked him in the legs with his guitar case. “What do you think, room two?”

“As if we ever go anywhere else,” Sirius drawled; “Here, gonna pop over to the loo first. Meet you there.”

He passed Remus his guitar before breaking off down another hallway. Music room #2 wasn’t much further, and when he reached it he found Sheila stacking chairs in the corner.

“Remus! You’re here late.”

“You too,” Remus said, setting the two guitars down on the stands.

“Yes, choir practice ran a bit long today. Are you wanting the room? I’ll step into my office and be out of your hair in just a tick.”

“It’s okay, Sirius and I just thought we’d mess around a bit.” He flipped the clips on his case, opening it up to reveal the Martin guitar sitting amongst its velvet lining.

“Having fun with her, are you?”

Sheila appeared at his shoulder, looking keen.

“I love it,” he said, honestly. “Practise on it every day.”

She smiled broadly and Remus suddenly felt stupid for boasting. He began thumbing the velvet lining, some of which was peeling along the edges.

“Will you humour me?” Sheila asked suddenly. “I’d love to hear you play something. Then I’ll go, promise.”

She held a finger to her lips like it were a secret, and Remus felt a giddy feeling rise in his chest. So far all he’d done was sit next to the stereo and attempt the chords to a few of his favourite songs, but Sirius had been helping a bit, and now he knew the entire intro section of “Going to California”. Steeling his nerves, he sat down on one of the music stands while Sheila drew a chair up to watch. It went well enough, until he fumbled the pick.

“Uh… sounds better with just fingers anyway… Still a bit new…”

“May I?” She held out her hands and took the guitar, laying it over her lap. “Try keeping your thumb on the top three strings. It’s called Travis picking, it’s what gives you that bluesy sort of sound. You let your thumb do all the work while your index finger just glides along.”

She demonstrated for him, and played the notes perfectly on her very first try. Remus felt positively envious.

“See? Now your turn.”

He played it as she had, and though it felt a bit wonky at first and he kept hitting the A string on accident, she praised him anyway.

“Wonderful! I should see if I can’t find you a thumb pick. Might make things a bit easier.”

Remus smiled, glancing back down at the strings. His second attempt was better, but it was interrupted when a phone rang out, spooking them both.

“Darn office line,” Sheila sighed. “Sorry, Remus, you keep working on that, I’ll be right back.”

She hurried away to catch it, and Remus could just hear her speaking over the sound of the chords.

“Oh… Maggie, yes… No, sorry, I haven’t been home yet tonight… What? What do you mean… I-I thought the surgery went well?”

She went quiet, and then a sagging noise like something had collapsed. Remus looked back to find Sheila slumped over in her office chair, a hand to her eyes. She was white-knuckling the phone, and after a staggered breath, raised it back to her ear.

“Yes… Yes, I’m here… Will you tell me, was he… No, course not... But was he in any pain?”

Remus felt his stomach drop. He whipped back around so she wouldn’t realise he’d overheard and began fumbling with the loose bits of lining inside the guitar case again. It was soft under his fingertips, worn and loved.

“Oh, Colin…”

He should leave. Every nerve in his body was screaming at him to make a mad dash for it, but it was as though he was frozen in place. He couldn't move—what if she saw him leaving? He wished Sirius were there—where the hell was Sirius?!

She's crying. He could hear her now, his teacher, struggling to breathe as she choked on her own despair. A clatter, and the phone had fallen from her hand.

"Colin…"

Remus shoved the Martin back into its case. He was no good with stuff like this, he didn't know how to comfort her, but in his hurry to escape, the guitar caught on the lining's edge and ripped away the last of the glue. He grunted, annoyed by the blunder, and went to pull the velvet back into place—only something jumped out and bit him.

It was a paper-cut, a clean slice up the side of his thumb. It'd come from a tiny sliver of paper, slipped secretly beneath the purple velvet. At first he thought it was a card, but then he pulled it out and realised that it was only a photograph. In it was a younger Sheila, captured beautifully on the front steps of a church. She was beaming, and in her arms she held a baby clad in long while lace. It was a christening photo, he realised, but what was it doing inside his guitar case?

He turned the photo over.

Remus John Lupin, christened April 25th 1960. Godparents Sheila Anne Buchanan

For a moment there was nothing. He could only stare, wondering if perhaps his mind were playing tricks on him. This wasn't… under the lining, it… the baby couldn't be… no…

I don't want this.

A roaring started in his ears.

Take it away.

All the sound came back at once. Crying. Buzzing radiator.

I don't want this!

Before he knew what was happening, he was standing outside her office door. Take it away, take it away, take it away!

Sheila's head snapped up. "Remus!"

You.

She began wiping beneath her eyes, desperately clearing her throat as though she could've hid it all. Hid, like the photograph she'd hid beneath the lining of the guitar she'd given him.

You knew.

"I'm sorry, Remus, but something's come up… Colin, he—"

"Are you my godmother?"

The words hit like a gong, and her eyes widened. Whatever she'd planned, whatever she'd wanted, it wasn't this.

"Remus... Oh, Remus… I am so sorry."

I don't want this. I don't want this.

"You're a liar."

"No."

He raised his fist, showing her the crumpled photograph. "You put this there to lie to me!"

"No, Remus."

"Then why did you do that? … WHY?!"

For a moment, neither of them breathed. Remus' ears actually popped, as though he'd changed elevations.

Whoosh! Then down, down, down, the voice taunted, but where's bottom, 'Remus, oh, Remus'?

Fuzz. Static. Greyness. Sheila was calling his name—pleading. For what, forgiveness? Remus heard nothing. He was suddenly very tired. He hadn't slept well the night before. He could remember thinking he'd have slept better if he just got up and snuck over to Sirius' bed, but he hadn't wanted to disturb him. A regret, now.

Sirius. Sirius. Sirius. Sirius. Sirius.

"Remus, please," Sheila begged. "I meant to tell you, but it wasn't that easy. I thought that maybe… but then you wouldn't—"

Your fault, your fault, your fault!

"I'm just… I'm so sorry, Remus!"

Sirius. Where was Sirius?

Remus turned around. And there he was. Standing by the music stands with his hands at his sides, his perfect mouth open in a perfect 'o'. He'd heard everything... All of it.

"Oh, Moons..."

There. There's bottom.

Chapter End Notes

Songs referenced are "And Then He Kissed Me" by the Crystals, 1963, and "Paranoid" by Black Sabbath, 1970.

I was getting the sense a few of you forgot about your Sheila suspicions. Oops, lol.

Note: I will be releasing another chapter this coming week on Sunday July 31st but after that I'll be taking a short hiatus as I'm going on holiday. Just a heads up :)

Chapter 90: Easter, 1978

Chapter Summary

Remus is still reeling from the news that he has a godmother, good thing Sirius Black was made to be his perfect distraction.

Chapter Notes

CW: For a tough father/son memory at the beginning. Some [semi-public] sexual content (blow job) so pay attention to the '> > >;' if you wish to skip over it. Also, I wouldn't consider it a trigger, but Mary briefly touches on her realisation that she may be aromantic. Like Remus' experiences, she doesn't have an exact word for it, but I do my best to maintain that sense of "she knows" but it's "indescribable". Hope this translates correctly.

One more note since some people were confused about it last chapter: The opening scene with the reporters and the girls was meant to link back to the prank James and Sirius plan for Remus' birthday. The girls are writing his name in their diaries to document that SPECIFIC day (March 10, 1078) NOT to document that they actually slept with/had children with Remus Lupin the ACTUAL ROCK STAR. (Pay attention to the line 'anything before 1980 was a mystery'.) Perhaps reread it with the prank in mind if you were confused. I know some people would've understood this but I've been seeing some wild things on twitter and tiktok.

And please for the love of god, stop sending me messages about Remus being a cheater/a possible cheater in the future. Frankly, it's biphobic and I delete them anyway. "Cadence" is a fan fic, please don't impress your own morals on characters that don't actually exist. Thank you.

See end notes for update on posting schedule.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Well maybe it is just the time of year,
Or maybe it's the time of man;
I don't know who I am,
But you know life is for learning;

We are stardust,
We are golden,

And we've got to get ourselves back to the garden…

- "Woodstock" Joni Mitchell, 1970

"I want to see her," he whined in his squeaky voice, as he clung to the back of his father's dark suit. He tried pulling him back, but it was impossible; Lyall was huge, and Remus was small. He reached down to pry his son's skinny fingers from his belt and there was nothing Remus could do to stop it.

"No, just stay in your room. Giles will come get you after the ceremony."

"She's my mum!" He screeched, his clinging fingers turning into tiny fists as he began pummelling his father's back. "She's my mum! She's my mum! SHE'S MY MUM!"

This is why he wasn't allowed at the funeral, he knew. Because he couldn't be trusted not to throw a fit. Giles had tried to explain it to him, about the open casket. Would it be strange to see her with a red flush to her cheeks? She'd been grey for so long.

"You won't like it. She's already gone, Remus."

"No! You're a bastard, you give her back! She's my mum!"

"Remus—"

"It's your fault! Your fault, your fault, your fault!"

"Enough!" Lyall roared. "Don't you understand, your mother is gone!"

The shouting had been enough to startle him into letting go. He staggered back, losing his footing and landing on his bum on his bedroom floor. He gaped up at his father, whose shoulders were heaving with his own grief.

"I hate you! I hate you and I hope I never see you again! I hope someone comes and takes me away!"

"You do, do you? And what a sad thing you would be, all alone."

"I don't need you!"

"Then tell me, who is it that's coming for you, Remus?"

His eyes burned. He didn't like crying, but he couldn't help it. He was eleven and heartbroken. And he wanted his mother.

Lyall knelt down, until he was nearly at his son's level. "You and me, we're all the other has left. I suggest you learn to live with it."

"It should've been you."

There was a long silence, punctuated only by their breathing. Finally Lyall stood again.

"Stay in your room."

* * *

Wednesday 22nd March 1978

Remus' friends watched him nervously all through breakfast the next day, as though he were a bomb just waiting to go off. He didn't have the energy to tell them that he didn't feel all that much like exploding, but rather felt more hollow, like he'd been cracked open and scooped out from the inside. He pushed his food around his plate with such little enthusiasm that even the girls began to catch on, though none of them attempted to pry. They'd all heard the whispers already anyway. Not about him, but about Sheila.

"Did you hear? Her husband died."

"Oh fuck."

"I heard he was terminally ill or something. A genetic thing, like a mutant. It's probably why Mrs. Buchanan never had any kids of her own."

"So that's where she was always going?"

"Yeah! McGonagall gave her leave to visit him in the hospital. Can you imagine the drive—every weekend? Blimey."

"But she's coming back right?"

"Who knows. When my grandpa died, my nan was a wreck. She had to come live with us full time. Rather annoying, actually. She's always snapping at me for putting my elbows on the table."

Remus tried to block it out, but the chittering only got louder as the day went by. After news of Colin's passing had come to light, Sheila had left school ahead of everyone else. It was too short notice to call a teacher in to cover her classes, and as a result other secondary professors took turns supervising. Unfortunately for them it was mere days until everyone was set to return home for the holidays, making for a rather disruptive forms classroom, so much so that Professor Bilshin had just about stuffed Barty into a tuba within the first twenty minutes of the day. Remus just minded his own.

After lessons got out things were still stiff. Peter waited until they were all back at the dorm to suggest a round of cards, but none of them jumped on the offer and he quickly let the subject drop. Eventually a knock came on their bedroom door. It was James who answered.

"Moony," he said softly, "phone's for you."

Trying his best not to look put out, Remus got up from his bed and drifted out into the hall. It took longer than normal to make his way to the bottom floor, and along the way he imagined how he was going to hide his foul mood from Tomny. Even the four hundred miles between them didn't feel like enough. He supposed it could be Giles, but Remus had already called days ago to tell him of their plans to remain at school.

When he reached the phones it was already late, and other boys were shuffling out of the common room and heading up to bed. He waited until no one was around before picking up the receiver.

"Hello?"

"Hello, Remus."

"… Dad?"

"I apologise for the late hour," Lyall said coolly. "How are you getting on at school?"

"Holy shit," Remus swore, already on the verge of unbridled laughter; "Now you call? Fuck, the nerve of your timing. I mean really, man."

There was some silence, as though Lyall Lupin were choosing his next words carefully. "Giles told me of your plans to remain at school over the holiday."

"What of it?"

“I’d like you to reconsider. Sandra has expressed a desire to see you, and since Christmas was spent apart it feels only right that you come home now.”

Silently, Remus raged. His father kept talking, going on about ‘rightness’, and yet it only fell upon deaf ears.

“You’re a fucking liar."

“… Excuse me?”

“Why didn’t you ever tell me I had a godmother?”

“Godm—” Lyall stopped short, as though he’d only just remembered himself. “Remus, you don't have a godmother. You've clearly misunderstood—”

“Oh, I've misunderstood, have I? Misunderstand this then, you great arse—You. Are. A. Liar!”

“Come home. Come home so we might actually speak about this civilly.”

“Fuck you,” Remus breathed—whined. “You don’t get to act like the proper parent after being remade by some good woman... I had family! I had someone other than you, and you kept it from me! I know you knew, don’t deny it!”

“That woman isn’t—”

“She had my baby photo! Good people don’t lie about these things, but you do! You! The great Lyall-fucking-Lupin... You know, I wanted you to be my dad. I really did. And you did everything you could to push me away. Now all of sudden you have a good wife and you—what? Want the perfect family? We're not family, never have been.”

“Remus.”

“No. You can go fuck yourself, mate. I’m staying at school, and if you have a problem with it then I’ll tell Sandra who my real dad is. I’ll tell her mum was crazy and that you made her way! … See if that shatters her rose-tinted glasses.”

He slammed the phone down and wiped his forehead on his sleeve, having broken out into a cold sweat the moment Lyall first said his name. He was thankful the hallway was still empty so no one could see him tremble, but when he looked back toward the staircase, he caught the tail-end of three pairs of feet scrambling back up and out of sight.

Sighing, Remus covered his face with his hands.

“Fuck.”

When he finally dragged his sorry arse back upstairs, he found his friends going about their nightly routines, completely casual. None of them said anything, except to offer him the shower first. Remus was grateful. He didn’t think he could handle any more of their sympathy.

A half hour later, they’d all showered and readied themselves for bed. Remus had successfully secluded himself on his four-poster, curtains drawn and a book open in his lap. He wasn’t really reading, but rather using the dim light to study the photograph of Sheila and his parents as teenagers. Using the photo as a bookmark had been the only excuse he could come up with to keep them close, but now, as he gazed down at their youthful faces, he began to regret it. If Sheila was really his godmother and he hadn’t just screamed at his father for no reason, he supposed that made them related. It meant the photo was the only evidence of the most family he’d ever had in one place. He was eighteen now; older than they were when the photo was taken. Did they know then how they’d all disappoint him one day?

It was a horrible thought, so to avoid it, Remus jammed the photo back into the book and threw back his curtains to put it away. He just about jumped when he came face-to-face with Sirius, who was standing on the rug between his and Peter’s beds, looking nervous. He was wearing only his pyjama bottoms and a Sex Pistols t-shirt, which belonged to Remus; a gift from Marlene for his birthday.

“Sorry… Didn’t mean to frighten you.”

Remus set his book down. “I’m fine, you know. I’m not gonna fall to pieces.”

“I know,” Sirius reassured him. “And we don’t have to talk. Just… Can I stay with you?”

Another moment passed, and Remus glanced at James and Peter’s beds, but their curtains were already drawn as well. Wordlessly, he drew back the covers and Sirius climbed inside. It was dark, but as he laid down next to him, Remus could still smell the familiar scent of Sirius’ shampoo. It soothed him, though he wasn’t likely to sleep anytime soon.

A godmother. He had a godmother. And not just any godmother. He had Sheila. Beyond the disbelief—the shattered state of his heart—the part of him that was still twelve years-old wanted to jump for joy. Except he wasn't twelve anymore. He was eighteen, with a nasty smoking habit and a nastier attitude. No aspirations other than wanting to follow his friends into a master plan that had a one in a million chance of actually working out. There was also the queer thing, and though Remus loved Sirius more than he'd thought possible, he could hardly blame Sheila for that. If it were him, he wouldn't have been so quick to take responsibility either.

In the darkness of his bed, crowded with Sirius sleeping soundly beside him, Remus lifted his hands and pressed his palms into his eye sockets. He'd been so excited for the holiday; to spend a week with just the two of them. It was supposed to be like last summer, only better, but now Sirius was going to be walking on eggshells, treating him like a skittish cat. It was because he cared, he knew, but the idea still made his stomach turn.

So, as he glared up at the roof of his four-poster, Remus decided he would lock it away. He'd done it before, when his mother brought his world crashing down and then promptly bit the bullet. If he could do it then, he could do it now.

He turned over, so his forehead was just hovering over Sirius' on the pillow.

Sleep, he told himself. Just for once, you messed up lunatic. Go to fucking sleep.

And against all odds, he did.

* * *

Thursday 23rd March 1978 – First Day of Easter Holiday

"You're sure you're alright?"

"I told you, I'm fine, Sirius."

"It's okay if you aren't, you know."

“I know,” Remus said firmly. “I just want to enjoy the next week with you.”

Sirius’ brow furrowed, then relaxed all at once. An entire week alone, it was hard not to look forward to it.

All around them, kids and teachers had gathered, saying heartfelt goodbyes and acting just as eager for holidays of their own. Most had trunks and were rushing about the buses in a hurry to claim their seat, while others like Sirius and Remus had decided to remain in favour of studying and the like. Of their friends, James and Lily had already left on an earlier bus bound for Liverpool, and Peter had gone not long after them, off to visit with Moira and her family in Scarborough. All that was left were those heading to London and further south; Remus had never been so grateful to not be included among them.

“Oi, you there, Sirius Black!" Filch flapped his arms at them from his place at the end of the bus line. “This is still part of your detention, get over here and help me load these bags!”

“Detention, hah. Call it what it is, man. Slave labour."

Clicking his tongue in distaste, Sirius nudged Remus goodbye and began sauntering toward the buses. Remus was left alone, but only for a moment. As Sirius left, his place was taken by none other than his own brother.

“What’s he done now?” Regulus asked, jutting his head toward Sirius and Filch.

“Nothing much, just the usual lip in class,” He glanced at Regulus' empty hands. “No bags?”

“If you must know, I’m staying at school this holiday.”

“… Really?”

“Yes, I've managed to convince my parents that staying at school while everyone else has gone would be good for my studies.” Regulus eyed him. “And sanity.”

“We’re staying too, you know. Sirius and I.”

“Oh joy. There goes the sanity.”

“You could join us. It'll be fun."

Regulus shook his head. “I’m not a complete idiot, Lupin. I do intend to study.”

“Alright, fine. Catch you at breakfast though?”

“Maybe.”

“Hey, you two!” A voice called from behind. They both turned around to find Trish struggling along the path with her duffle bag. “Can I get a little help? It’s been murder dragging this thing all the way from the dorms and my da's waiting.”

Remus glanced at Regulus, who was merely staring at her with big eyes, and gently nudged him with his shoulder. Regulus stumbled forward and shot him a glare, before reluctantly trudging up the path to Trish. He grabbed the duffle’s handle and pulled, before dropping it again in shock.

“What do you have in here—rocks?”

“Yes!” She grinned. “... How'd you know?”

Remus smiled, just as an arm slid in around his shoulders. Marlene leaned against him fondly. “You know, I think I’m gonna really miss you this year. Our last Easter supper was so fun.”

“Bring it up again and I’ll vomit on your shoes."

She pat his arm affectionately. “You should know, Mary's decided to stay too."

“You mean at school? Thought she was going to Paris."

"Go easy on her, but I think she backed out last second when she heard the two of you were staying. They were supposed to go to visit Kara-Ann’s family over Easter, but she was getting really nervous. I don’t think they’re very kind to her.”

“Not kind how?”

Marlene frowned. “Mary’s never outrightly said it, but I think they have a problem with her being half black. They’ve made some comments.”

“What about her dad? Doesn't he say anything?”

“Her dad’s the half they don't have a problem with. Plus he's got a pretty young wife and a new baby. He pretends."

Remus turned his gaze across the berm, where Mary was standing next to the busses, hugging Lottie goodbye. She had her hair in twists that she'd done herself and her dark skin shone in the sun. She looked beautiful.

"Dad's are useless, rich or poor," he grumbled, remembering Tomny's words from last Christmas.

"Sorry if this ruins your and Sirius' romantic week alone."

"Sirius'll get over it," he shrugged. "I'll blow him when we get back to the dorm or something."

"Eugh... Too much information."

They shared a chuckle, and Marlene finally stepped away, picking up her bag. "Mary's pretty oblivious sometimes, but she means well. Take care of her for me?"

"Sure. Though… you're sure there's nothing going on between you two?"

"Mary's straight, Remus."

Ah. Marlene's expression was all he needed to know that he'd really stepped in it then.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean to pry."

Marlene shook her head, and rather than showing him a sad face, she smiled. Like the sun.

"Don't be sorry. I love Mary—I'll probably always love her—but I'm not gonna torture myself. It's enough to have her with me as my best friend. You understand, right?"

"Yeah."

"Good. And hey, take care of yourself too, okay?"

"Okay, Cherry."

She kissed him on the cheek, and because that was too soppy, punched him in the arm too. He didn't get the chance to retaliate before she was off again, skipping to join her girlfriends by the front of the buses. Mary hugged her goodbye, playing at a good cry, and Marlene rolled her eyes—fondly.

I'll probably always love her.

Was it sad? Possibly—Remus couldn't decide. But maybe it wasn't his place either way.

“Remind me to send Filch some more brownies,” Sirius huffed, returning to his side as the buses gave their final honks of warning. “This time with rat poison in ‘em.”

“You can bake them tonight. Mary'll help you. I'm sure between the two of you, you'll be able to come up with something deadly."

Sirius gave him a funny look, and Remus shrugged haplessly.

"She's staying too."

“You mean at school? ... With us?”

“Yeah. Marlene's just told me."

“Well, why didn’t you tell her no?”

“ 'No'? What, you think I tell those girls to do anything? As if."

"You could've tried. We were supposed to have a week alone."

"And what was I supposed to say—‘no, Mary, you have to go home to your family so Sirius and I can have hot animalistic sex across the common room floor’?”

“That’s exactly what you should’ve said.”

Remus sighed. "Mary's avoiding her family, same as us. Think we can make an exception?"

Sirius raised an eyebrow, before catching himself and quickly morphing into a pout. “Whatever,” he grumbled. “Guess the girl can stay. We can form a club.”

“Knew you weren’t entirely heartless. Bet she grows bored of us after a day.”

“Well, now that you’ve said it, it ain’t gonna come true.”

Remus chuckled and Sirius crowded in close, fingers tucked into his armpits to ward off the morning's chill. Across the berm, Mary had already started toward them, walking backward to blow Marlene's bus several kisses goodbye.

"Hey, Macdonald!" Sirius called. “Heard you’re staying."

“Oh, yes," Mary replied. "Someone had to stay behind to make sure you two didn't get too lonely."

Sirius kindly raised an arm, and she raced to him, letting herself be gathered into a hug as they turned for the dorms.

“So, boys, what shall we do first? Manicures?”

“Actually, Moony and I were gonna—”

“I’ll paint yours first, Sirius.”

“Well, in that case…”

By early evening, they'd found themselves camped out in Godric’s common room with the turntable playing quietly behind them. The dining hall was shut up save for drop ins, and so they'd brought their dinners back with them as well. They were even allowed telly privileges at all hours, but nothing good had been on and so the three of them had resorted to the usual sort of fun; cracking open a few bottles and getting well and truly smashed.

It was almost therapeutic, belonging to the small few that had remained at school. It made Remus think of Simeon, and all the chattering he and his friends had done about the future in their last year of school. Simeon was off at Oxford now. Was he still dating that girlfriend of his, Phaedra? Remus wasn't sure. He hoped he was happy though, and hadn’t already resigned himself to a life of the nine-to-five grind and fucking the mailman behind his wife’s back. If only Simeon could play an instrument, his ability to pull girls would have certainly been an asset.

“I dunno…” Remus mused thoughtfully. "Are we sure red's my colour?”

He turned his nails toward Sirius, who was busy getting a set of hot rollers applied to his hair—courtesy of Mary, of course. Sirius made a face, and Remus sniggered as he reached for the flask of whisky he'd left on the table beside him.

“Careful,” Mary warned, pointing a comb at him. “They’re probably still wet.”

“Right…” Remus reached for the whisky carefully.

Sirius tipped his head back to look at her, rollers and all. "Remind me why we agreed to this in the first place?"

“Don’t pretend you don’t love it. I’ve been waiting this entire time for your hair to grow out, you know.”

“I should be so honoured." Sirius began picking at his fresh manicure and Mary smacked his fingers automatically, making him grumble. “C’mon, they look cooler when they’re a little chipped.”

“You’re impossible.” She sighed and returned to rhythmically combing and curling his hair around another roller. “I suppose you’re both glad Regulus decided to stay at school.”

“Why do you sound so smug about it?” Asked Remus.

“Well, Sirius is his brother, and you’re his keeper so naturally—”

“I am not Regulus’ keeper!”

“But you kinda are, Moons,” Sirius agreed.

“See?” Mary tucked a clip between her teeth and began mumbling around it; “We shoo' get ‘im out wiff us one ‘uv these days. 'oo know, invite 'im over.”

“Five quid to the first one that can convince him,” Sirius snorted. “Ten to whoever can get a stiff joint between his boney fingers.”

“I’d take that bet.” Mary tucked the clip around the curler, just as Sirius whipped his head back a second time, ruining it.

“You think you could get Regulus—my brother, king of stingy farts—to hang out with you?”

“Well, he’s not blind, is he?” She smirked, smacking him atop the head. “He'd come, if I asked nicely."

"Don't you sound bold."

"Oh, let’s be honest, Sirius. Out of all of us you’re the one who’d have the most trouble.”

“She’s got a point,” Remus mocked.

Sirius spun back on him. “And you? You honestly think you could get Reg to agree to an actual smoke sesh?”

"Depends. Is this a real bet?"

"Oh-ho-ho," Sirius taunted. "I get it. You’re just interested because you’re still nursing your loss."

"No, I'm not."

"Then you’re afraid I’ll win again.”

“If you’re so sure, Padfoot, then take the bet.”

“Fine. Whoever can get Reg—”

“Regulus."

“—Whoever can get my brother to agree to hang out with us first, gets to give the other two a penalty game. Whatever they want.”

Remus almost hesitated then. The last time he’d lost to Sirius in an ‘anything goes’ bet, he’d been heavily coerced into some literal arse-kissing. Not that he’d really minded that much; Sirius had made sure it was fun for both of them, right after they’d run into Mary and Marlene on the stairs. At least now with Mary actually involved, the punishment was hopefully going to remain safe for all audiences. Hopefully...

“Whatever we want?” Mary echoed.

“Whatever you want."

“Within reason,” Remus added quickly.

“Alright then boys, let’s drink on it.” She raised her glass along with Sirius, and Remus leaned forward, knocking his flask against theirs with a clink. Sirius immediately downed his own, tossing the bottle aside with a smug flourish.

“You two are so going down."

“That’s what you think, Black."

Remus lifted the whisky to his mouth, then paused. “Ah. Fucked up a nail.”

An hour later, with plenty of shit-talk behind them and even more booze within them, the common room’s fire had died down to ashes and they were left to lounge, flattened over one another on the floor. Mary had already passed out on one of the sofas, but Sirius had been kind enough to throw a blanket over her so she wouldn't freeze. She snored softly—then LOUDLY all at once as though she were trying to start a lawnmower in her sleep. Sirius giggled every time it happened, his head wobbling where it lay against the curve of Remus' stomach.

"I'm just saying... if you crash a car on purpose, you can't really call it a 'car accident', can ya?"

Remus pulled the joint from his lips. "I mean... I guess not..."

"Yeah, it'd be more like a purposeful accident... A—heh... a calculated collision."

"A deliberate derailment."

"An intended incident!"

"Methodical misadventure."

"A—A... shite. You took all the good ones, Moons."

Remus smiled, passing the joint to Sirius as he curled up against him on the rug. The fire was still warm enough, but it was nothing compared to the soothing feeling of running his fingers through Sirius’ now severely-curly tresses. Sirius kept his other hand securely intertwined with his own, and as they listened to the music play they kept toying with each other, fingers knotting and unknotting over and over again.

“How d’ya do anythin’ with these?” Remus murmured, capturing Sirius’ hand in a single fist. “They’re like hands for a mouse. Mouse hands.”

“Oh, I’m sorry, did someone over the national average height say something just now? Why don’t ya come down ‘ere so the rest of us can hear you, ya giant.”

“Did you jus’ call yourself ‘average’? Now I’ve heard it all.”

Sirius rolled over, shimmying up the carpet to grab Remus’ by the collar. “Shut it, you,” he muttered, before pulling him in for a kiss.

They snogged for a while, until the common room fell quiet again and Sirius kindly pointed out that the Doors album they'd been playing had finished. Remus broke away immediately, flashing Sirius a cheeky look as he scooted over to the turntable to change the record. Sirius took a swipe at his arse for good measure, but only grazed his pockets.

“Wha’ d’ya think, Pads? Stones or Zeppelin next?”

“Stones? Nah, play me something romantic!”

“Romantic, huh?"

He knew just the thing.

After a quick search to find it amongst their messy pile, Remus pulled the vinyl from its sleeve and set it up. One strategic needle drop later, and the music was back. Behind them, Mary gave a little grunt but did not wake, which was a shame considering he was pretty sure they were listening to one of the most ardent love songs ever written.

'Love of my life, you've hurt me,
You've broken my heart;
And now you leave me,
Love of my life, can't you see?

'Bring it back, bring it back,
Don't take it away from me;
Because you don't know,
What it means to me...'

"Oh..."

Sirius appeared behind him with a little sigh, snaking his arms around Remus’ waist and tilting his head against his back. "I love this one," he murmured. "Mercury, you great sop."

"You said you wanted romantic."

"Oh, I know..." Sirius began to leave short, gentle kisses along the tip of Remus' spine, slowly making his way higher with each brush of the lip. He was humming too, following the graceful piano with every key. At first Remus allowed it, but then lips brushed his jaw, then his ear; the vibration alone was enough to leave him shivering, any more and he'd simply cease to exist.

“Sirius, cut it out. Mary’s right there.”

“Mmm… We were just snoggin’ anyway…”

“And is snogging the only thing you want to do?”

A little bite, right on the ear lobe. Remus clenched his jaw. Mercy—

'You will remember when this is blown over,
And everything's all by the way...'

"Sirius..."

'When I grow older,
I will be there at your side,
To remind you—'

"Yes, Moons?"

'How I still love you—
I still love you...'

More kissing. More humming. Sirius was—oh, he was done for.

"Uh... Never mind..."

Sirius chuckled knowingly. "Go on, Mary's a heavy sleeper," he purred, kissing it all better. Again. Again. "See for yourself."

Sceptical, Remus glanced over and watched as Mary gave a spectacular snort and turned over, one arm flattened across her forehead.

“I think she’s drooling.”

“Quick, Moons! We should take a photo...”

The song's piano jumped, soaring high on the back of the electric guitar. A perfect pair. Driven by it, Remus spun around and caught Sirius by the face, planting several clumsy kisses along his jaw.

“Oh, Padfoot, so easily distracted…”

Sirius chased his lips with his own. He failed only the last time and grinned up at him instead. "Shall I escort you upstairs, my love?"

“You sure you want to risk that many steps? Might be a bit daunting in your state."

“For you? Anything."

That morning Remus had woken up feeling like a part of himself had been ripped away all over again. Now he just felt silly, because how? How could he feel anything less than whole when his other half was standing right in front of him?

Just like that they were off. Remus caught up with him at the base of the stairs, snatching Sirius' wrist so he might pull him back in for another kiss—another!—and they laughed again. Their teeth knocked into one another. Sirius' eyes were grey-blue and his skin was hot and Remus loved, loved, loved him.

"Love you."

"You too. Always."

Back, hurry back,
Please bring it back home to me,
Because you don't know,
What it means to me...

Love of my life,
Love of my life...

* * *

Good Friday 1978

So far, Remus' ‘lock it away—don’t think about it’ plan seemed to be working swimmingly. The headache he woken up with on their second day of holiday made it impossible to consider anything other than his hangover, and by the time he and Sirius had managed to drag their butts downstairs, Mary was already long gone. They found her in the dining hall, calmly sipping her morning tea with a rather unimpressed expression on her face.

“You left me in the common room, you insufferable sods."

“I think you mean ‘insatiable’,” Sirius corrected.

“I at least hope it was worth it.”

"Oh, I assure you, it was." He began to roll his tongue, but Mary simply reached over and stuffed her napkin into his mouth, silencing all gloating.

“No hangover?” Remus grunted, stirring even more sugar into his tea than normal.

Suddenly Mary looked very smug. She looked at Sirius, who was busy picking bits of paper napkin from his tongue and drummed her nails on the tabletop.

“No, in fact I feel great. You should know though, that while you two were off making moves, I was here, making a few of my own.”

They both peered at her curiously, but their wonderment was answered automatically when Regulus appeared at the table and took a seat on Mary’s side.

“Finally woke up, did you?” He asked them, passing Mary a fresh cup of tea like it was the most ordinary thing in the world. Mary accepted it graciously, swirling the spoon and tapping it on the cup’s rim.

“Regulus has agreed to join us tonight,” she announced proudly.

“Just one night."

Remus and Sirius’ jaws dropped.

“So fast!” Sirius gasped. “What’d you promise him, Macdonald? A cheeky wank behind the football stands or something?”

“No,” Mary scoffed casually, at the same time as Regulus barked; “NO!”

"Then what?"

“She told me about your dumb bet,” Regulus growled.

Sirius slammed a fist down. “Snatchy, that’s cheating!”

“You never said we couldn’t tell him about the bet, shit-toes! This is what you get for ditching me to shag each other upstairs.”

Regulus clamped his hands over his ears. “I’m not listening. I’m not listening.”

“Have you already decided our punishments then?” Remus asked, suddenly not all that shocked that Regulus had agreed to throw in his lot with their scheming friend after all.

“As a matter of fact, I have."

Sirius clapped both hands over his eyebrows. "I'm not shaving anything!"

"What? No, no, no... You, Sirius, are to spend this entire week learning a choreographed dance to a song of my choosing.”

Regulus looked away to hide a smile, while Sirius continued to gape.

"You’re having me on."

“Don’t look so worried,” said Mary, “you won’t be alone in this endeavour—in fact, it’s a duet. But you should know, I always lead.”

"Who picks the song?"

"Me of course."

"Please tell me it isn't—"

"It's ABBA."

"NO!"

"It wouldn't be a punishment otherwise!"

Sirius dropped his head against the table with a great moan. “This isn't a punishment, this is torture! It's cruel and unusual and I—hold on.” He whipped his head back up. “What’s Moony’s penalty then?”

Mary grinned, looking as sly as a fox. “I think you’ll quite like it actually.”

They both looked at Remus then, who shook his head. “Just so you know, if you force me to dance, I’ll break your toes on accident.”

“No, Remus, it’s nothing of the sort.” She cupped a hand to the corner of her mouth, leaning in toward Sirius; “You can thank me later.”

Suddenly Remus' headache had returned.

“Right, well this was fun," Regulus said, getting up from the table. "Call me when Sirius starts to cut a rug or whatever.”

Before he could escape, Sirius’ hand shot across the table, latching onto his brother’s sleeve with an iron grip.

“Oh, no you don’t! As far as I’m concerned, if I’ve lost, you have too. You’re ours for a day, baby brother. And it just so happens that today’s band practice, and we need a drummer.”

“But we have Easter mass."

“Oh well. Best say your prayers now, little bro."

Regulus hung his head. If he didn’t already regret helping Mary, he sure did now.

Within the hour, Remus had the Fender’s strap around his shoulders and was squeezing tiny music notes into hastily scribbled staves while Mary sauntered up and down the orchestra risers, twirling a microphone around as though she were Diana Ross. With her on vocals it meant Sirius could work on James’ portion of the song, and he eagerly began tuning his guitar, strumming each string until he was satisfied with the sound. Remus just watched, trying to take his mind off of other things; like being back in the music room.

Don’t think, he silently pleaded. Don’t think. Don’t think. Don't think.

Luckily, there was plenty around to distract him. Remus wasn’t entirely sure how he did it, but somehow Sirius had managed to plant his brother down behind Peter’s set of drums with little kicking and screaming. Regulus still did his best to object—holding the drumsticks away from himself as though they were a pair of dead fish and not a means to music.

“Sirius, I can’t do this!” He complained, while Sirius went about plugging in his amp.

“Sure, you can! Macdonald’s gonna sing, and you’re gonna play. I know you can read the sheet music.”

“So I can read the bloody music—doesn’t mean I can actually play the drums!”

“C’mon bro, haven’t you always wanted to play more than just your violin? Just pretend you’re some jazz drummer, like Krupa or Buddy Rich. What's that they say—fake it 'til you make it?”

“I can’t. I don't know how to bullshit my way into this crap. I’m not as delusional as you are.”

“We’ll go slow,” Sirius offered, looking more amused than offended. “Just play the rhythm section and you’ll be fine. It’s basically just a one-two on snare.”

“Don’t forget the triple on bass,” Remus added.

“Sod off, Lupin.”

“Oooh, he's feisty,” Mary sniggered. “I vote we keep him.”

Chuckling, Remus set the Fender aside and strolled behind the drum set. “May I?” He asked, before reaching over Regulus and grabbing his hands by the wrists. Regulus sputtered, but the fight was mostly for show anyway and Remus ignored it, using his hands to show Regulus the motions of each beat.

“And-one-and-two, and-one-and-two. There, you got it! Then you add in that triple with your bass pedal.”

“Yeah, I bloody got it... Just let go of me.”

Remus did so, and spun away to pick up his bass. As he did, Sirius glanced between them. “Watch it, Reg, that's my man you were feeling up just now.”

“Oh, fuck oooooff!”

With a smug chuckle, Sirius set his fingers along the guitar’s strings and let loose an impressive riff. He kept on, sliding his hands up and down the fretboard until he had Regulus rolling his eyes and when he was finished showing off, turned to Mary.

“Macdonald, you got them lyrics down then?”

“ ‘It’s hard to be a teen, hooked up on downers and cheap nicotine’,” Mary quoted. “I've got it. Now when are you gonna start playing, backing band?”

“You hear that, Moons? Now we’re her backing band.”

“I’d call that a step up,” Remus said. “Let’s start by taking it from the bridge.”

Sirius counted them in, and just like that they were off to the races. Mary came in a bit early, and Regulus fumbled his sticks, but his impeccable sense of timing helped him hold things together. By their third go he was telling the rest of them off for missing their cues.

“It’s four-four time, not five-four. That means four quarter beats to a measure. Just four. Not five, not six—four.”

“I know,” Sirius blagged. "Christ, you're not a bloody human metronome."

“If you know it then why are you playing like someone’s lit a fire under your arse?”

“It’s practice! You’re supposed to mix things up… Figure out your groove.”

“Even when it sounds worse?”

“You can’t bully me in my own band!”

“I wouldn’t have to if you knew how to keep time.”

Remus couldn’t help but laugh, Mary too, but they kept at it and things eventually seemed to just fall into place. Remus forgot they were in the music room—forgot they weren't the only four people in the world. He simply played and played, letting Mary’s whisky-timber voice lulled him into a sense of security.

“I’ve been trying to figure out what your voice reminds me of, Macdonald,” Sirius said, while they took a break to pour over their music sheets. Mary lit up instantly, readying herself for a compliment.

“Well, I've been told I sound like if Whitney Houston and an angel had a baby."

Sirius thought for a moment, before shaking his head. “Nah, you just sound like Mary.”

“Mary… who?”

“Mary you. You don’t sound like anybody, Macdonald. Or I should say, no one sounds like you. It’s a good thing, of course.”

“Awe.” She pressed a hand to her heart and glanced at Regulus. “He can be romantic after all.”

Regulus made a face. “Eugh.”

"Maybe you should join a band of your own, Reg," Sirius said. "You'd whip a few nobodies into shape fast enough."

"Piss off."

"I'm being serious! Bet you'd do great in music if you transferred in. Just give it some thought, okay?"

Regulus said nothing at that, and Sirius turned on the music stands and meandered back over to Remus. “Was that good?" He asked. "Did I do good?”

“Yeah, that was nice.”

“Champ. I was channeling you. Thinking, 'what sappy shit would Moony say just now'?”

Remus scoffed. “Alright, you wanna know what you sound like then? If you were to put Mrs. Norris and a toaster in the bathtub together.”

“The bullying is rampant today, I see,” Sirius mused, before pointing at the sheet music in front of them. “I think we should change this bit here. Have the drums follow the guitar, not the bass. It’ll tighten up the sound.”

“We’re gonna have to wait until Pete gets back. See if he’ll be able to do it.”

“Oh, he will,” Sirius said firmly. “If Reg can do it, so can Pete.”

“Regulus, Sirius. Regulus.”

“Right.” He spun around to face the drum kit. “Sorry, Reg.”

Regulus flashed him the bird.

“Okay!” Sirius clapped his hands together. “I think we’ve got it sorted.

Shall we take it from the top again?”

“No way, I think my wrists are broken,” Regulus complained.

“Aw, afraid you won’t be able to whack one out tonight?”

“I’ll whack you.” Regulus raised the drumstick threateningly, but luckily, Mary got between them first.

“The kid-drummer’s right,” she said. “I’m starving and we’ve been at this for hours.”

Sirius sighed but lifted the Rickenbacker’s strap from his shoulder. “Yeah okay, it’s Easter dinner anyway. We can always come back tomorrow morning.”

"We're studying tomorrow," Remus said.

"Tomorrow night then, stingy."

“Ohhh no,” Mary objected quickly; “Did you forget about our bet? Tomorrow you two are all mine. And I do hope you remembered to bring your dancing shoes to school, Black, because I’m going to waltz you for all you’re worth.”

“What about Moony?” Sirius griped. “You still haven’t told us what his punishment is.”

“Why give us the best surprise? But I wouldn't worry none, Black, something tells me you'll like it even more than he will."

“Why does that sound so suspicious?” Remus grumbled.

“Because it is.”

Ba-dum-tss!

They all looked back, just as Regulus silenced the cymbal’s crash.

“What? That was the punchline, right?”

“Oh!” Sirius cried. “So now he can play the drums!?”

* * *

"Ow… ow! Fuck, no way, I can't do this. Mary, just choose something else."

"We've already cleaned the area! Don't be such a baby."

"Yeah, Moony, don't be such a wuss. Don't you want to match?"

"I want the two of you to get off of me—OW, MARY!"

"That was just my finger, honestly."

"You pinched me!"

"I have to feel you up before I just head straight in with it, don't I? God, I iced it already, it should be numb."

"Well, it isn't!"

"Yeah, I think I'm just gonna go…"

"Not a chance! I told you—you're ours for the day, little bro."

"That was yesterday!"

"Would you two shut up already? I have to concentrate… Now quick, one of you hand me that cloth in case he bleeds everywhere."

"BLEEDS?!"

"Go on, Macdonald, just stick it in already."

"Ow... OW—FUCK! This was such a bad idea!"

"Hold still... bit more... Okay, it's in. Sirius, pass me that little metal bit there."

"I think I'm gonna pass out…"

"Just take a deep breath, Moons. In and out, hee-hee-hoo."

"Sirius, I'm gonna kill you—augh! FUCK! What the hell, Mary?!"

"Did you miss the hole or something, Macdonald?"

"No! It'd be in already if he'd stop squirming. Hold his head down."

“Now don’t bite me, Moons.”

“Fucking christ!”

“Hold on, almost got it… There!”

Mary’s body weight left him all at once and Remus sat up on the common room sofa, his face flushed and sweating. “Oh my god,” he panted. “Am I bleeding?”

“Only a little,” Sirius said, leaning in to admire him. Remus flinched, and reached up to feel it.

“Don’t touch it!” Regulus winced, standing behind the sofa and looking distinctly out of place. "This is against school rules, you know. Lupin's a prefect."

"He was a rock star first," Sirius said, looking a bit too giddy. "And he's got a tattoo already, this is child's play in comparison."

"A tattoo?"

"Shut up, Sirius," Remus groaned, giving each of them a dirty look just as Mary held up a small mirror.

"So?" She preened. "What do you think?"

Leaning forward, Remus turned his head to the side to see the single golden hoop that now anointed his left ear. It looked cool, but his ear ached and he only felt like complaining.

“This is ridiculous. I look ridiculous!”

“Stop whining,” Mary scoffed, setting the mirror aside. “You were only ever in good hands. I did Sirius’ in eighth year and he barely flinched.”

Remus began to glower even harder, but stopped when Sirius reached over and grasped his chin, twisting his head so he could get a look at him. “You look hot,” he hummed happily.

"I look like you."

"Same difference." Smirking, Sirius leaned in for a kiss and Remus all but melted, momentarily forgetting any and all pain and discomfort. When they pulled apart they found the other two staring. Regulus blushed and looked away, but Mary only wiped her hands on a cloth with a self-satisfied look and jumped up from the ottoman she was sitting on.

“Told you, you’d be thanking me,” she said, before pushing the ottoman into the middle of the room, which she’d already cleared to make space for their dance number.

“I’m still not saying thank you,” Remus answered stubbornly. Turning back around, Mary shook her head as though he were hopeless, before pointing at Sirius instead.

“You,” she purred, beckoning him with one finger. “Now it’s your turn.”

“Lucky me,” Sirius sighed.

“Regulus, would you mind playing DJ? It’s the album just on top of the stereo there—side two, track three.”

Eager for the distraction that wasn’t his brother snogging his own best friend, Regulus hopped to it, and Sirius slumped languidly against the back of the couch. “C’mon Macdonald, you made Moony look hotter. You’re gonna make me look lame.”

“If you don’t get up there right now, you’re sleeping in the hallway tonight,” Remus threatened, the throbbing in his earlobe having since returned.

Taking a moment to stretch out her legs, Mary offered her hand. “You’re gonna love it. Lottie and I choreographed the whole thing ages ago. Oh, and don’t worry about tripping up, like I said yesterday, I always lead.”

Sirius moaned again, but obediently held out his hand and let Mary pull him from the couch to the ottoman.

“Alright, so it starts like this—you’re sitting, and I come in from behind and grab your shoulders like this and you lean away—yes! Just like that! And okay, I’m going to circle you next and you—no, no. You look constipated, I want bedroom eyes.”

“Can you at least play the damn song first?!”

Mary giggled and looked up. “Handsomest Black brother—music if you’ll please.”

“Coming right up,” Regulus said, dropping the needle. A second later, the song was playing. It only took about four seconds for Sirius to drop his head back in defeat.

“Oh no…”

“Oh yes!”

Mary launched herself up onto the ottoman. "Now don't forget, it's a duet, darling," she called, leaning her hands against Sirius' shoulders as she began to sing along. It was quite the show already, her giving everything while Sirius gave nothing at all.

'When you were lonely, you needed a man,
Someone to lean on, well I understand!
It’s only natural, but why did it have to be me?’

“Hold on,” Sirius interrupted; “Aren’t I singing the bloke’s parts?”

“I told you, I'm leading. Now sit there and look pretty until it’s your verse. I expect you to have this memorised by tonight!”

“She’s gonna kill me, Moons. I swear she is.”

"Nah, you'll be f—"

Mary collapsed spectacularly, draping herself across Sirius' lap with a sharp kick like a Rockette on Broadway. "You've got to point your toes!" She was shouting. "Sirius, point your—BUT BABY, BELIEVE ME! IT'S BETTER TO FORGET MEEEE!"

"My toes?!" Sirius turned to Remus, desperate, but Remus only shrugged. They were going to need more booze, it seemed. Lots and lots of booze.

* * *

Sunday 26th March 1978

“Do we haaaaave to?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because I said so."

"But we were in the library just yesterday!"

“Going to the library two days in a row won’t kill you, Padfoot.”

"It could! It might literally bore me to death."

Remus huffed sharply, unimpressed. He was standing in the middle of the common room’s threshold, doing up his coat. Mary had already returned to her room earlier that morning, complaining about the state of her hair after falling asleep without her bonnet for the second night in a row, while his boyfriend remained obstinate, still lazily rolling around the floor-bound couch cushions in his pyjamas. They'd slept there last night, under a hastily-built blanket fort of Sirius' making.

“C'mon, Moony,” he whined. “Macdonald kept me up for hours with that stupid dance of hers, and I was good, so don't I deserve a little lie-in? Come back to bed, Moons... I’ll even let you be the little spoon.”

Remus, who had already moved on to his boots, was not swayed. “We have A-Levels in a few months.”

“Hmph. Who needs A-Levels when you’re gonna be—”

“Fine, whatever, skive off if you want, you snot. But if you're staying then it's on you to clean up in here... there's rubbish everywhere.”

"Deal!" With a victorious, albeit sleepy smile, Sirius turned over, disappearing back under his covers on the common room floor. “See you at lunch. Love you!"

On his own then, Remus made his way across campus to the empty library. Inside, only a few tables were occupied, almost all of them by other year 13 students pouring over their texts. You could’ve heard a pin drop, but Remus had always had keen eyes. He spotted Regulus Black at one of the tables near the far back of the room, set up facing the rows of massive crystalline windows the library was famous for. The windows overlooked the southern half of Lake Dubh, and the stunning view nearly distracted him as he made his way toward the table.

“I hope you’re here to study,” Regulus said, without looking up from his textbook.

“Of course."

“Good. Because you if you can’t be quiet then you—”

“Can’t stay,” Remus finished. Really, those Black brothers were so predictable.

Regulus rolled his eyes but indicated to the chair opposite to him and Remus took it, silently thankful. Most of his homework for the week was mere busy work, which he didn’t mind so much, but when he went to pull out his copy of Brave New World to begin working on the paper he had due for Flitwick, it came with one of Mr. Pettigrew's newspapers. The paper must've ended up in his bag by mistake; already he could see evidence that Sirius had had his hands on it. There were several addresses for rent already circled in red pen as well as a few accidental cigarette burns and devil horns drawn onto the Queen's portrait in the upper right hand corner. The first address he'd circled was a tiny three-bedroom in Chiswick, but it boasted a ‘third floor private entrance’ which most likely meant a three-floor walk-up on some rickety fire escape. The next was advertised as a ‘spacious flat in West Brompton’, but the rent was suspiciously low. Either the nearest tube station was thirty kilometres away, or someone had died in it recently and the owners were looking for a quick lease. He'd circled more, though when Remus compared the addresses he found all of them to be rather suburban and quiet.

It was almost surprising. When he’d first pictured Sirius living in London, Remus had imagined a flat overlooking the bustling streets of Soho and Carnaby—somewhere the city never slept. All Sirius talked about was living the high life, making noise and not caring what anyone thought of them. Perhaps he was pulling back a bit then, considering how it might feel to try sleeping with the background noise of a city when all one was used to was the serene emptiness of the Scottish Highlands.

Or maybe he just needed a map.

When he came across the job classifieds and found even more red circles, Remus was surprised again. Most of the listings were of bars or restaurants advertising for day staff, but unsurprisingly Sirius had left several scooping circles around the single one of them that offered exactly what he was looking for.

LOCAL PUB SEEKS HOUSE BAND, it read; INSTRUMENTS REQUIRED. RATES NEGOTIABLE.

Underneath Sirius had written the words; "we pay in exposure", which at least made Remus chuckle.

“What are you laughing at?”

Remus jumped. He'd nearly forgotten Regulus was there. “Nothing, sorry," he murmured, folding the paper up and stuffing it back into his bag. “I won't interrupt anymore.”

Regulus didn't say anything, merely returned to his homework with the same indifferent expression he always wore, and Remus broke open his books to get started on his own. Studying had never been particularly hard when he'd applied himself, it was one of the reasons Lily was always going on about what a shame it was that he had no plans to go on to university. Remus didn’t mind; if those newspaper classifieds were anything to go by, he would be plenty busy anyway.

After several hours of revision, Remus’ back was starting to ache. He stood up from his chair, admiring the early afternoon sun as it glinted off the Dubh’s inky surface. After muttering that he was off to use the loo (Regulus ignored him) he took a walk and ended up on the library’s back steps. Feeling the wind’s bite without his coat, he eventually ground the cigarette he'd been smoking out on the stone steps and tottered back inside. He’d just passed the antiquities section when a hand reached out the doorway and grabbed him. Before he knew it, Remus found himself pinned up against a shelf of books, Sirius Black peering up at him with half-lidded eyes.

“I was looking for you,” Sirius whispered, before stretching upwards and kissing him deeply.

“Afternoon to…mmm… you too,” Remus said around his lips. "Thought we were meeting for lunch."

"It is lunch."

"Oh."

Remus went to grab his face—a kiss or two as sorry—but Sirius was faster. He snatched Remus' wrists and pinned them down by his sides while simultaneously bringing his mouth down and trailing hot kisses along the base of Remus' jaw and neck. Remus bit his lip and let his head drop back against the books, breathing heavily as his eyes inevitably slid shut. This week was supposed to be the one chance for them to be all over each other without worry of prying eyes, and yet he hadn't felt Sirius' desperate fingers since that first night. It made him irrational, but as Sirius' mouth dipped lower into his collar, Remus remembered where they were.

> > >

"Wait," he said, pulling his hands away and bringing them up to clamp on either side of Sirius' face. "We're literally in public. At school."

"This place is huge," Sirius said. "No one's gonna notice if we just..." Then he turned his head ever so slightly and fit one of Remus' thumbs between his lips. Remus' mouth went uncomfortably dry as Sirius sucked, then released it with a soft pop. Dear Christ.

"You are such a..."

"Giving lover, I know," Sirius finished, then he dropped to his knees and began working at Remus' belt.

Heart hammering a mile a minute, Remus whipped his head around to make sure no one else had suddenly appeared. The antiquities section was one of the only parts of the library with its own enclosed space, its door meant to protect the delicate texts and tiny artifacts stored behind their glass cases, but that didn't mean they were entirely alone. With the door open wide as it was, anyone walking the same path to the lavatory would surely see them. He reached for the door handle, desperate to shut it—but then Sirius was already moving his underwear aside, pushing his shirt up so he could trace that cursed line beneath his navel. He went slow at first, enough to make Remus clamp a hand over his mouth. Wicked tongue, wicked tongue.

"Fuck..."

Sirius chuckled darkly. "I like your ambition, Moony, but let's start with a blow job." Then his mouth closed around him and Remus moaned into his palm, trying not to come apart completely. The door! the sane portion of his brain was screaming; Lock the door!

As Sirius' wicked tongue curled around him, Remus stifled another groan and reached desperately for the tiny lock set in the middle of the door handle. The shift in his hips had Sirius pushing him back tighter to the shelves and so Remus bent at the waist, stretching every tendon—every muscle—until his fingertip was just brushing the tip of the lock. But then Sirius squeezed and Remus missed—completely.

As his hand fell on open air, he scrambled with the other for the edge of the book shelf and only found purchase after he'd knocked a heavy tomb from the shelf behind his head. The book fell to the floor with an echoing thud and Remus' heart immediately seized in fear—but Sirius didn't miss a beat. He clung to his boyfriend's hips with one hand, rocking himself back and forth all on his own. With the other he worked him, up and down until the rhythm was enough to have Remus pushing back against his tight lips.

If only there was a tracker for Sirius' sexual mood swings so that Remus might better prepare himself, but knowing the both of them, hearing it ding at all hours of the day would be more of an annoyance than a relief. Unable to help himself, he dared make only one single glance downward and what he found was his lover's shirt open to the third button, his perfect jaw arched upwards as he pressed deep enough to leave Remus whining. At that moment it wouldn't have mattered if they were in the middle of St. James Square; Remus teetered on the edge for several mindless seconds, sparing the chance to reach down and brush some of that long hair away from that handsome face. When he did, Sirius looked up at him, and that was it. He was well and truly done for.

<<<

"Don't tell me," Sirius said, when he came up panting ever so slightly. "Did I forget to lock the door?"

Remus' head dropped back against the shelf. "You're... so fucking insane."

"That mean you're not gonna do me?"

Suddenly feeling rather bold, Remus bent down and cupped Sirius by the back of his neck. "I'll do you alright," he murmured, before kissing him deeply. They broke apart when Sirius began pushing for tongue; "But not here, you animal."

"Best not leave me waiting then," Sirius warned. "Might get bored... Could go looking for fresh meat."

"As if."

With a final kiss, he pushed Sirius lightly and stood, double-checking that his fly was up before he made his way back to where he'd left his things. Only remembering halfway that Regulus would be waiting for him, Remus quickly smoothed down his hair and rounded the corner. He found Regulus exactly where he'd left him, only now with his nose in Sirius' newspaper, peering at the addresses circled in red.

“Find anything good in there?” Remus asked, coming round the table to gather his things. Regulus jumped when he spoke, and quickly set the paper aside.

“I did not,” he mumbled sharply. “Though I had no idea you could advertise a potential marriage partner in the paper.”

“Oh yeah, it’s how all our parents met, isn't it?”

“No? My parents’ marriage was arranged by my grandparents.”

“It was a joke, Regulus.”

“Oh.” He avoided eye contact. “Finished studying then?”

“Yeah…” Remus said, pulling his coat on. “Gonna… go for a run. See you at dinner?”

Regulus didn’t seem to catch the lie. He shrugged indifferently and glanced at the paper. “Are you really going to move to London with my brother?”

Slowly, Remus slung his bag strap over his head. “Well, I’m from London, so… yeah, probably.... Have, er—Have the two of you talked about it at all?”

“It's all he talks about."

"Oh."

"So you're really going." Regulus drew his hands into his lap. "I suppose you'll be taking Potter and the other one with you.”

“That seems to be the plan.”

“And you’re just gonna, what—play music forever?”

“For as long as it makes us happy, yeah.”

Regulus bit his lip. “Don’t forget this then.” And he picked up the paper, offering it to him. Remus looked at it, before pushing it back.

“You’ll always be welcome on our stoop, Regulus. If you’d rather not go home this summer, you’re more than welcome to tag along. I know it would make Sirius happy.”

“You think I'd just follow you to London? Do you hear yourself?”

“It’s an option. As long as you can put up with us, that is.”

Regulus looked at the paper then, and dropped his arm. Then he sighed—and Remus told himself it was a good sign.

“Don’t you know, Lupin? There’s no putting up with the likes of you.”

* * *

Monday 27th March 1978

Now, Mary had always understood Sirius in a way no one else had. They weren't each other's first kiss, but they were certainly a few first somethings. Remus could’ve accepted it, and gotten over it too... if not for the fact that they were always speaking to one another in fucking French.

"GOD!" He yelled, after two days of listening to them yammer. "Speak English, please! I know you're talking about me!"

"Aw, Sirius, ton petit ami est jaloux."

"Oui, j'sais. Ne t'inquiète pas, ça rend les choses plus excitantes quand on est seul."

"Oh. Très coquin."

Remus slumped back against the sofa, tossing away the cards they'd been using to play whist and returning to his task of sorting through the records they'd brought down from their room. Mary didn't seem to notice, and kept fanning herself with her cards while Sirius gave her sly looks. Of course the two of them had started doing it only after realising how much it irked him to be the only one out of the loop, but if Remus had to listen to them chitter about his ‘beau cul’ one more time, he was going to lose it.

“Mais y avez-vous déjà pensé?”

“Pensé à quoi?”

“Une ménage à trois."

“Tu es défoncé? Évidemment oui. Mais il faudrait que le mec be stupid fit.”

“Et si c’était une fille?”

“Une fille?”

“Ouais, une fille. Remus est bi. Et s’il voulait une meuf?”

“Ben… Il faudrait que ce soit toi!”

Mary burst into laughter.

“If you two don’t stop purposely speaking another language right in front of me, I’m going to find an English to French dictionary and beat you with it!” Remus fumed.

“Il est si mignon quand il est en colère,” Mary sighed wistfully.

Sirius looked up from his spot on the middle of the floor. “J'sais. Je suis tellement chanceux.”

“UGH!”

They laughed at him, and Remus played the next song that much louder. It was easy to be pissed off at them, but at least they were doing one thing;

Remus hadn't thought of family or godmothers in days.

Sirius was the best good distraction, as always, but when combined with Mary, they were the ultimate duo. It was around day five of their mutual isolation when Remus realised that he hadn’t had a rough time sleeping since the holiday had begun. Being in the music room didn't bother him anymore either, though he hadn’t touched the Martin since Sheila had left. Even if it really did belong to him now, it just didn't feel right.

So far Regulus had refused to join in on any more practices, but did concede to meals together and the occasional game of cards. The rest of them were content with this, and together with Mary, they continued their camp-out in the common room. At first it felt like overkill, but when it really began to dawn on them that they were the only ones around, it was easy to settle in. They made the space their own, scattering blankets and pillows everywhere and leaving empty bottles and unfinished meal trays scattered about until they felt inclined to return to them. The stereo was always going, and in the rare moment that it wasn't, they all bundled up in front of the telly, throwing popcorn at the screen until they'd passed out from exhaustion.

Remus learned a lot about Mary during moments like these—things he hadn't even considered in the almost-three years he'd already known her. Like him, her mother had passed away when she was young, and then to top it off, her father had waited less than a year before he remarried. After that, all traces of Céline Macdonald had seemed to vanish one by one, until her sweet little girl with the twisted braids had begun to feel like a stranger in her own home.

"He doesn't talk about her anymore," Mary said softly one evening. They were lying on the common room floor, heads tucked together in a circle. They were all liberally intoxicated by the time Sirius offered her the last sip from his bottle. She accepted, finishing it and cradling the glass to her chest afterwards. "I used to think he stopped because he'd fallen out of love with her. That he blamed her for dying, but I've seen him cry over her photographs... I suppose he took them down because it was too painful, and I was only ever back for the summers, after all..."

"He should've left them up," Remus said quietly. "He should've."

Mary smiled and reached for his hand. Remus held it, and she gave it a gentle squeeze.

"Do you think the two of you will ever get married?"

"Me?" Sirius echoed. "Married to Moony? Well, not that I wouldn't enjoy an entire day where I'm the centre of attention, but Moony doesn't really seem like the marrying type, do he?"

"Buzz off," Remus scoffed. "Men can't marry other men anyway. It's illegal."

"How about in a perfect world?" Mary reaffirmed. "Just think, if there was nothing stopping you—nothing holding you back, would you?"

Remus tilted his head, so he and Sirius could share a glance. He was waiting for him, Remus knew. And so he took Sirius' hand as well, and kissed the silver ring on his right hand.

"Maybe... in a perfect world."

Sirius smiled.

"I don't think I would," Mary said.

It surprised both of them.

"No?" Sirius echoed. "And why not? I'll bet men would line up around the block to marry you."

"I'm sure they would too. And I'm sure I'd love to see them try." She giggled, but it filtered off in the end. "But that's just it, isn't it? I used to think I wanted it, but now I'm not so sure... I've had it, however childish, and it never feels like enough. Somehow something always feels missing... I guess I should want it though, shouldn't I?"

Remus shook his head. "You don't have to... to want to get married, Mary."

"Not married... loved."

"Oh."

She wiped her eyes, though neither of them could see if she were crying or not. "It's stupid. I mean, I think about it all the time, yeah? And when I was younger, I used to think it'd just come, like this big moment when you realise—oh! That's how it's supposed to feel! … But now I'm thinking that maybe it just doesn't happen that way. Not for everyone, anyway."

"Mary..."

"Marlene told me that she loved me. She was so honest and I—god... I have no idea what that feels like. All this time I've listened to Kara-Ann talk about how much she loves my father, and every time I hated her for it because I thought that's what daughters do. They hate their step-mothers! But now I think maybe... Maybe I was just jealous. Because I've never loved anyone. Ever."

"You have lots of time to love people," Sirius said. "Literally the rest of your life. Maybe you just have to find the right one."

She nodded. "Yeah... Yeah, maybe."

"Either way." And Remus kissed her hand too. "We'll love you. As our Mary."

"Oh, chérie."

She went to sip from the bottle, only to remember it was empty and they laughed.

“Forget marriage," Sirius said, tossing a pillow up in the air to catch. “Marriage only exists to make parents of people, and who wants that? Parents are shite all around.”

Remus silently agreed. He supposed there were some exceptions, like the Potters, but how was it that ninety percent of the people he cared for were so hurt by those who were supposed to love them back? He’d never thought life was fair, but sometimes he just wished it made sense.

“I’ll never be like them,” Mary swore; “I’m going to treasure my family, should I have one. I’m going to cultivate myself too—my talent and my mind, not just my looks. And then I’m going to make everyone regret underestimating me.”

Remus didn’t doubt it for a second.

* * *

Tuesday 28th March 1978

“Padfoot?”

“Mhmmm…?”

“I think I’m getting better at this.”

Sirius groaned, turning over in his sleep. “Better at what?”

“At this," Remus said, raising his arms. "At the ‘waking up with no hangovers’ thing. I feel great.”

As if to punish him, Sirius rolled on top of him very quickly, stabbing Remus in the ribs with his chin. “Good for you, twat,” he moaned.

Smiling to himself, Remus took a moment to look around while he massaged his chest. They’d somehow made it up to their dorm the night before, though with everything still strung out in the common room, they were without any pillows and squeezed into Sirius’ bed with only a thin blanket covering them. Sirius was burrowed down into it, his hair peeking out and catching the sunlight that was spilling through the open window, turning it a raven-blue. Everything about him made Remus want to tease him.

“Paaadfooot,” he sang softly, the way Sirius did whenever he wanted something. “Are you awake?"

A groan.

"Are you still tired?”

Another groan, this one more stubborn, and Sirius had pushed Remus’ fingers aside on his chest. He started by massaging his ribs for him and then ever-so-slowly sliding upwards, until he was pinching and prodding in the cheekiest places.

“Yes, I'm still tired,” he said despite all of it.

Remus leaned down, so his lips were just grazing Sirius’ ear.

“Liar.”

A beat passed, and then in one deft move, Sirius burst up from the blanket and swung himself over Remus into a straddle. He pinned Remus to the bed by his shoulders and gave him a cute glower. “I’m hungover,” he grunted. “My back feels like shit from sleeping on the floor all week, and I'm positive my breath could kill a small mammal. So tell me, why do you insist on disturbing my beauty sleep?”

“Because you don’t need it. You’re beautiful enough as it is,” Remus said, reaching up to tuck a piece of hair behind Sirius' ear. He finished by grabbing him round the arse, and was rewarded when Sirius cracked an inevitable smile.

“Fine, cheeky. Where’s my good morning kiss then?”

Remus grinned and leaned up, covering Sirius’ soft lips with his own. He could still feel the piqued curves of his smile beneath it, and the simple gesture unlocked that voracious part of him that could never get enough. Cupping the back of Sirius’ neck, Remus pulled him in tighter, until they were flush against one another and his tongue was tracing the deepest reaches of his lover’s mouth. Sirius’ eyelashes were a flutter against his cheekbone as his hands raced across the ridges of his chest. Invigorated, Remus’ tightened his hold until his mouth shifted and he was pressing kisses down over Sirius’ chin to his exposed throat.

“You sure about this, Lupin?” Sirius breathed huskily, his face turned toward the sky. “You’re the one who promised the others we’d meet them for breakfast. And then I’m to meet Mary for—mhmm—dance practice.”

“She's still forcing you to do that?” Remus asked between kisses. He slipped both hands past the waistband of Sirius' pants and pressed deeper, a move that earned him a short moan from those perfect lips.

“It’s torture, really," Sirius moaned, knotting his fingers through Remus’ hair. "Yesterday she was—ah!—talking about doing the tango.”

Breaking away with a short sigh, Remus peaked at the clock on Sirius’ bedside. It was already past ten, which meant they’d slept in anyway.

“Guess we’ll just have to apologise at lunch.”

At his answer, Sirius looked back down at him. He used his thumbs to trace the softness of Remus’ under-eyes, before placing a kiss on each one, humming in contentment as he began to slowly rock his hips against Remus’ pelvis.

“You... You’re so taking the blame for this one.”

* * *

Wednesday 29th March 1978

They spent that whole day together, sadly disassembling their nest of pillows and restoring the common room to its usual order. Afterwards they set an album on the turntable, and took their dinner on the floor, settled down on the rug in a perfect table setting of paper napkins and plastic forks. They even had ice cream for afters, which they kept frozen in the kitchenette’s small refrigerator. As far as Remus was concerned, it was a perfect final day.

"So, Reggie?" Sirius called. "Does this mean you've gotten over your aversion to our common room?"

“No," Regulus answered, sipping cranberry juice out of a styrofoam cup. Mary had managed to talk him into letting her add a little vodka. But just a little. "Starting tomorrow I'm going to have to ask all of you to forget any of this ever happened. Can't let my reputation suffer."

"What reputation?"

"My reputation as the smartest Black brother, duh."

"Don't forget 'handsomest'," Mary cooed.

"I'd be offended if I didn't already know that was a load of bollocks," Sirius scoffed.

"What part? The part where I'm smarter than you or more handsome?"

"Both—neither! ... Ugh!" Sirius groaned. "I meant the forgetting it all happened part! You liked those drums, baby brother, just admit it. All you need now is a nickname."

"Ooh, how 'bout 'Scrappy'?" Mary suggested.

Remus lowered his ice cream bowl and licked his lips. It was his second—apparently Regulus didn't like chocolate. Heresy, actually. "I like 'Jazzy'," he teased. "We could call you the 'Jazzster'."

"That's funny coming from the guy who mooned the entire school," Regulus mocked.

"I didn't—fine, you wanna be the 'human metronome'?"

"That's not even clever, you're just copying what Sirius said—"

"No, no, no," Sirius interrupted, "you're all wrong, I've already got it. S'gotta be 'Edge'."

" 'Edge'?" All three of them echoed.

"Yeah! 'Cause he don't like 'Reg'. And because he's so 'edgy'. Therefore, 'Edge'."

Remus laughed while Mary clapped her hands together in delight. "It's horrid," she cackled, "but still not as bad as mine."

"I knew you liked yours," Sirius preened. "But 'Edge'! Yes, I like it! It's mysterious—leaves people wanting more. What else could you expect from my brother?"

“It’s dumb,” Regulus muttered, hiding a smile behind the rim of his cup.

“You know what isn't dumb?” Mary asked as she balled up her napkin and tossed it onto her empty plate. "Playing a game together on our final night alone."

“What’d you have in mind, Snatchy?”

“Two words—truth or dare!”

“Mary… that’s three words.”

“No, it’s not. Truth or dare. Duh.”

“Right, I’m out.” Regulus set his plate aside and made to stand, but Mary grabbed his arm with a pout.

“You can’t,” she moaned.

“I only came because you said I’d get to see this one—” he pointed at Sirius, “make a fool out of himself in a choreographed dance routine.”

Sirius stuck out his tongue. “Jokes on you, Edgy, because I’m an excellent dancer. Ask Macdonald.”

"He is a pretty good partner."

Huffing, Regulus let Mary pull him back down to the floor and gestured lazily with his hand. “Go on then…”

Grinning ear to ear, Mary rubbed her hands together in anticipation. “Okay… Remus! Truth or dare?”

“Truth.”

“Bah! Boring,” Sirius honked.

“Shut it you.” Remus hit him lightly with a throw pillow before looking back to Mary, who had leaned in with big eyes.

“Remus, have you… everkilledsomeone?!”

“... No.”

“Oh… Boo.” She straightened up. “I was hoping for something more juicy with your gangster background, mais c’est la vie. Your turn.”

He glanced at Sirius, who looked far too eager, and then Regulus, who looked like he'd just smelt one of James' football boots. "Okay, Edge, truth or dare?"

As if the question was a matter of pride, Regulus turned his nose up.

"D-Dare."

"Yes!" Sirius cried. "I knew we were related!"

Now this was the hard part. There were plenty of things he could've thought up for the rest of the Marauders, but Regulus was different. There were more boundaries, he shied away from the faintest touch—but if Remus knew anything, it was that he didn't have to touch Regulus to make him uncomfortable.

"Alright. I dare you to stare into Mary's eyes for one entire, uninterrupted minute."

"That's it?!" Sirius demanded. The reaction apparently gave Regulus the confidence to scoff as though it were too easy, but the moment he looked at Mary and spotted her eager expression, his face fell.

"C'mon then, love," she said, scooting toward Regulus until their knees were practically touching. Sirius keenly appeared behind his brother, pushing him in further.

"Go on, Edgy, get in close! Snatchy don't bite—most of the time!"

"You'll say when the minute's up?" Regulus chittered nervously. Remus pointed at the grandfather clock on the far wall.

"Try not to blink," he smirked, just as Sirius began the count down.

"Three… two… one—look!"

On 'look', Regulus turned toward Mary with such a focused expression that she was instantly giggling and he had to snap at her to cut it out.

"Whoo, okay, okay," she tittered. "Serious business, I got it."

All of them were very quiet for several long seconds.

"You two do know that you're allowed to blink, right?" Sirius snorted, making Regulus smack him without breaking eye contact.

"Mind your own dare."

Mary's smile deepened at the corners. "My, your eyelashes are so long. I'm jealous. They're like a little girl's!"

"Huh!?"

"Seriously, it's not fair."

"Lupin, how much time left?"

"About thirty seconds."

Regulus puckered, and Mary leaned in even closer. "Ooh, I think he's gonna cry—"

"I'm not crying!"

"You're blushing."

"… I'm not."

"You and Sirius have such similar eyes. Like little pebbles plucked from the stream, it just makes me wanna—"

"Is she supposed to talk this much?"

"Ten seconds," Remus smiled. "Five… four… three… two—one!"

With a great sigh, Regulus slumped backward, quickly rubbing his cheeks. He was blushing.

"Is looking at me for one whole minute really so hard?" Mary snubbed. "Honestly, the dramatics. Must run in your blood."

"Don't take it personally, Macdonald, he just gets nervous around the ladies," Sirius said, nudging Regulus with his shoulder. "Go on, Edgy. S'your turn."

"You then," Regulus snapped. "Truth or dare?"

Sirius thought for a long moment, then; "Truth."

"I thought you were supposed to be the king of dares?"

"I like to keep things fresh. Now hit me."

"Fine." Regulus arched a single black brow. "Now tell the truth—it was you who defaced all of the portraits in the salon last summer, wasn't it?”

“Yeah,” Sirius sniggered. “What can I say, Great Aunt Belvina looks better with a stash.”

“And you were the one who hit those golf balls through the dining room windows, weren't you?”

“Those were good shots, I’ll have you know.”

“And you put itching powder in all of my pants.”

“Well, actually! Er… no, yeah that was me too. Sorry, my bad.”

They all laughed, and then miraculously, Regulus shoved Sirius back. It was fond, and after Sirius shyly looked in Remus’ direction. “So, Moony? What d’ya say—truth or dare?”

“Truth.”

“Kiss me on the mouth.”

Remus squinted at him, before immediately throwing all caution to the wind and surging forward to catch Sirius’ mouth in a deep kiss.

“But he picked truth!” Regulus wailed, while Mary just howled some more. They only broke apart again when she started battering them with her hands.

“Remus,” she laughed, “you have to ask somebody!”

“You then Mary! Truth or dare?”

“Dare me!”

“Alright, you think you can bench-press Sirius?”

Mary looked Sirius up and down. “What, like lift him?”

“He’s scrawny enough,” Regulus added.

“Har-har,” Sirius started. “If I’m scrawny then you’re skeletal. But have at ‘er, Macdonald. If you can, that is.”

Looking indignant, Mary stood up and ordered Sirius to his feet. “If I can dip you in choreography, I can bench-whatever you,” she said, before grabbing Sirius arm and slinging it over her back. She wobbled a bit as she caught his weight against her, and Remus momentarily regretted suggesting the dare in the first place, but with one great heave Mary surprised them all. With a little squeal on his part, Sirius was lifted off of his feet into a fireman's carry, which Mary held until her face darkened with exertion and she all but threw him back down.

"Damn, Macdonald!" Sirius cried, pushing the hair from his face. "Who knew you had it in you?!"

Mary dusted her hands. "I did, all along. That'll teach you to underestimate a lady. Now it's your turn. Sirius—I dare you to give Remus a lap dance!"

Remus' mouth dropped open. Shooting up from the rug, Sirius only appeared ecstatic. "Okay!"

"What's a lap dance?" Regulus asked.

"Oh, you poor sheltered thing."

Ignoring his brother's plight, Sirius jumped to his feet and pulled Remus up with him. "C'mon, Moons. Time for the show," he grinned, practically shoving Remus backward on the sofa.

"This is insane," Remus stammered. "A lap dance, really?"

No one was listening.

"Oi, Macdonald, can I at least get some music?"

"Coming right up!"

A second later the turntable was going, and more ABBA began filtering them through the speakers. Obviously hoping for something better, Sirius groaned and covered his face while Remus pinched him.

"Ow!"

"You did ask her to choose the music."

Sirius shook his head; "This is fucking cruel," and promptly straddled Remus' waist on the sofa. Mary squealed, but the moment Regulus realised what was happening, his hands flew to his eyes.

"Dear god!"

“Get it, Black!”

Sirius rolled his hips seductively, grinding them with enough rhythm and drive that even Remus had to cover his face. He peeked out between his fingers though, and Sirius mouthed along to the words of the song that on regular circumstances, he would never have admitted to knowing.

‘I’m jealous and I’m proud,
If you hurt my feelings I’ll cry out loud;
I’m Carrie not-the-kind-of-girl-you’d-marry,
That’s me!’

“C’mon Moons, you know you love it,” Sirius purred, twisting around until they were back to chest. He kept rolling his hips, much too slow for the song’s upbeat nonsense, and when he reached back to stroke his fingers along the side of Remus’ face, Remus felt his breath leave his chest with a shudder.

“Yeah, that’s it! Open your legs a bit more,” Mary instructed from the sidelines, shouting over the music while Regulus just buried his face further into his hands.

“How long do I have to do this for?” Sirius called, while he grabbed Remus’ hand and slipped it up under his shirt himself to press against the toned planes of his stomach.

“The whole song, of course!”

Sirius sighed, and glanced back at Remus. “You heard her, Moons.”

“You’ve had too much to drink."

“On the contrary, I think I’ve had just the right amount.” Grinning like a cat, Sirius slipped down to the floor, where he turned around once more, connecting with every inch of Remus as he slid back up his body and seated himself back into a straddle. Remus didn’t even wait this time. He popped the bottom buttons of Sirius’ shirt, sneakily sliding his hands up his stomach and feeling the tightened muscles beneath his finger tips. He’d never had a lap dance before, but surely nothing would ever top Sirius’. He swayed his hips perfectly, and when he extended his back to lean away from him, in a great circle, Remus could see the faint outline of kiss marks he’d left scattered about his collar bone. It was mouthwatering.

“Oh my god, they’re still going?!” He heard Regulus scream from somewhere else in the room.

“Gotta be honest, I didn’t think he had this much in him,” Mary cheered. In answer, Sirius flipped her off, before grabbing a fistful of the front of Remus’ shirt and crashing his mouth down onto him. Distantly Remus was aware that the song was coming to end, but he couldn’t care less. Sirius was cupping his jaw as he pressed his tongue inside, tasting every inch of him. Remus wanted to bottle the feeling, but instead all he could do was grip the tops of his jeans and pull him closer.

“Oi! Oi! Okay, break it up!” Mary called gleefully. “The song’s over, and guess what’s next?”

The song change dawned on them both at the same time, but it was Sirius who ripped his mouth free and leapt up. “Oh!” He cried, leaving Remus out to dry while he and Mary fled to the centre of the room. They met up just as Sirius’ chorus began, and together started trotting around the common room, perfectly in sync.

“ ‘I was so lonesome, I was blue’,” Sirius sang, “ ‘I couldn’t help it, it had to be you and I—always thought you knew the reason why…”

Mary shrieked in happiness, and they spun each other around, toe-tapping on the carpet.

“ ‘I only wanted a little love affair! Now I can see you are beginning to care—but baby, believe me! It’s betterrrrr—to forget meeeee!”

Together they leapt up onto one of the far sofas, did a twirl, and then Mary dipped Sirius as promised. She dropped him once by accident, but they both had the biggest smiles on their faces, and Remus slumped back against the sofa in bliss.

“He loves it,” Regulus said, appearing behind the sofa with his arms crossed. “He’s such a whiner, and then he loves it.”

“You’re right, Edge. Reckon we should try it out? I’m sure I could lift you.”

“I’ll break your kneecaps first.”

Remus laughed.

It was positively the best Easter he’d ever had.

Chapter End Notes

Songs in this chapter: "Love of my Life" by Queen, 1975, and "Why Did It Have to Be Me?" and "That's Me" by ABBA, 1976.

Also you heard it here first, folks. Motswolo is a “R-edge” defender. “R-egg”??? Don’t know her Starting tomorrow I'm going away on holiday myself and won't have the time to keep up with updates. So sorry, but my next update won't be until Sunday August 21st. Though, if you're good, I maaay be inclined to give you a little treat, though you'd have to be subscribed to my profile (not just 'Cadence') for the notif.

As always you can catch me on tumblr @motswolo.

Much love - mot.

Chapter 91: The Flour of Youth

Chapter Summary

Ya'll been waiting patiently for this one, but honestly, how is one expected to pass Parenting 101 with such poor role models...?

Chapter Notes

I foolishly left the editing of one of this chapter's main scenes to the day-of, which ended up changing the flow of the entire chapter. I've been here for six hours, so please, have mercy, lol.

I don't believe there's any specific TW for this chapter, though Sirius is a bit of a dick in it. We all have our days, won't be like it forever!

And as a note, this chapter is for Dasha, who keeps ME inspired xoxo

See the end of the chapter for more notes

But life goes on, you know it ain't easy,
You've just gotta be strong, if you're one of the six teens;
And life goes on, you know, you know it ain't easy,
You know you'll never go wrong 'cause you're all part of the six teens…

- "The Six Teens" Sweet, 1974

Thursday 30th March 1978

As fond as Remus had become of their shared time alone at school, he was excited to welcome his friends back. Mary did so with the most vigour, throwing herself over Marlene and crying as though she'd been tortured all week without her presence. Remus, feeling distinctly as though it was the other way around, tried not to take it personally, and Sirius, who had been missing James just as much, crowded in among the chattering group of returning students and slung an arm around his best friend's shoulders out of glee.

"So, Prongs, how was it meeting the in-laws?"

“Great!” Said James. “Lily’s dad is champ. He’s got this whole collection of records. He could actually talk about music for hours, and get this—in the garage? A 1949 Vincent motorbike in pristine condition. Said he was just housing it for a friend, but still.”

Sirius’ mouth practically began to water. “I swear—first purchase after the flat!”

“Good luck navigating London on a motorbike,” Remus scoffed. It made Sirius smirk, before he reached up and pinched Remus on the earlobe. Pain instantly shot through him, and Remus quickly batted him away with a sharp smack.

“Don’t, bloody dickhead... Still hurts.”

“Oh? What’s this?” James raised both brows. "You put an extra hole in your head too, Moony?”

“Blame Mary,” he grumbled. “I still can’t sleep on my left side.”

James leaned in to admire it. “Well, I like it. Very rock and roll. Maybe I’ll get mine done when we finish school.”

“I’ll do it!” Sirius declared. “This wimp wouldn’t let me do his.”

Pushing Sirius away by the cheek, Remus turned back to James. “How was the rest of Lily’s family then? Did her sister bite your head off like you thought she would?”

“Let’s just say that if I had to choose between charming a king cobra and Petunia Evans, I’d pick the snake.”

They broke apart snickering, as Peter wordlessly passed behind. He had his trunk in one hand and there was a distinctly solemn look on his face, but he didn’t spare his best friends a second glance.

“Hey, Wormy,” Sirius called anyway; “How was the old bird’s place?”

“Don’t wanna talk about it, Black,” Peter grumbled, nearly fumbling his trunk. Undeterred by the cold shoulder, Sirius reached for Peter’s actual shoulder and gave it a tight squeeze.

“Aw, don’t tell me there’s trouble in paradise?”

“Just fuck off, alright!” Peter lashed, shoving Sirius hand off before carrying on in the direction of the dorms on his own. Sirius turned back around after he’d gone, looking disgruntled.

“What crawled up his arse and died?”

“I think he and Moira broke up,” James answered reproachfully.

“They did?” Sirius gasped. “Fucking finally!”

“Wow. Maybe try for some decorum, Padfoot?”

“Go on, what happened?” Sirius asked giddily, ignoring him. In answer, James rubbed the back of his neck, using the gesture as an excuse to glance around and make sure no one was listening.

“He told her about our plans to go to London after school. And the band. And the no-university-thing. I guess she wasn’t very impressed…”

“Well, it’s the truth, ain’t it?” Sirius said. “We all agreed! And I dunno about you two, but I don’t want to be bothered with looking for a new drummer fresh out the gate. Showbiz waits for no one, least of all squares like Moira Thurnberg.”

“Do us a favour and keep that one to yourself,” James advised. “Pete’s in a foul enough mood as it is.”

Sirius shrugged, as if it couldn’t be helped, and picked up James’ trunk as they started back toward the dorms. Up ahead, Remus could still see Peter’s blonde mop bobbing along the street. He wondered if his bad mood was going to last.

“Don’t worry about it,” Sirius told them both on the way; “The two of them have fought like this before, right? Either they’ll make up, or we’ll be off to London with one less girlfriend in tow.”

“You’re pushing it, Sirius,” James warned.

“What? … Alright, fine. I’m happy to be the arsehole this time around. Just you wait, one day when women are throwing themselves at his feet, he’s gonna look back on this and smile. Then you’ll know I was right.”

So, Sirius was playing the bad guy. A common enough role for him when it came to Peter. The two of them had always occupied different spaces, especially when it came to James; Peter the childhood friend, Sirius the best friend. It'd been that way for years, long before Remus had ever come along, but if they were ever going to—as Sirius had so eloquently put it— actually make it as a band, then they were probably going to have to tell Peter the truth sometime.

"Have you told him?" James asked, bridging the topic himself when they were nearly back at the dorms. "About the two of you, I mean."

"Not yet," Sirius said sheepishly. "Just not been a lot of chances, right."

James appeared sceptical, but relented without a fight. "Suppose it wouldn't make him feel any better, finding out two of his best mates are bunking up right when he's gotten dumped."

"Exactly. Let him mope a bit, do his thing. My love for Moony's boney arse ain't going anywhere."

Sirius glanced at him, and Remus shook his head—pleased nonetheless. The look was not missed by James, who stretched his arms up behind his head casually.

"At least someone's in a good mood. Here I was, half afraid we'd come back to find that Moony was secretly related to Margaret Thatcher. Just life's little victories, I suppose."

* * *

It'd been clear from that very first week that although term had recommenced and everyone had settled back into routine, they were still lacking a crucial piece to their regular cast. Sheila Buchanan had yet to return to her post as Hawkings' most beloved music teacher, and all of them were feeling the burn of it.

Remus tried not to think about it. It'd been easier during the holiday, when he'd had Sirius and Mary's insanity to distract him and Regulus' snark to put him at ease, but Sheila's absence left a colourless hole that was getting harder and harder to ignore. She wasn't just his music teacher anymore, she was his godmother. His family. And he didn't know whether to miss her or hate her for it. Wasn't sure he'd ever know. Knowledge of her truancy felt like a sad song played on repeat, one that only he could hear. He tried fitting lyrics to it, but they never came. No word seemed like enough. Though if he had to pick, 'mourning' came the closest.

It was an ongoing problem—one McGonagall saw fit to fix herself.

To cover Sheila's absence, their forms class was merged into another, a decision that left poor Professor Bilshin in charge of not only his own students, but Sheila's usual group of cheeky laze-abouts as well. Sirius was ecstatic; it was the first time he and James had ever shared a forms class, and the two of them spent the block attempting to lock Barty in a broom cupboard for pulling on May Donahue's bra straps. While Mr. Bilshin grumbled over who to give the detention slip to (in the end he decided on all of them) Remus took his book and sat down next to Lily, equally as pleased to see her.

"You're looking good," she told him, as he flipped through his assigned reading text. "Heard you guys had a lot of fun over the holiday."

"We did."

"Mary said that you and Sirius were inseparable."

"Well... I like him."

"You mean you love him."

"Not so loud, Evans, he might hear you."

She giggled. "Does this mean you and Black are fully ready to move in together then? Big commitment, that."

Remus peered back across the room, where James and Sirius were making paper aeroplanes out of their pink slips. Sirius let his go and had watched it soar over the heads of several classmates before he finally caught Remus staring and gave him a little wink.

"Yeah, well... Can't really live without him, can I?"

Lily smiled at him again, her green eyes almost sparkling in the morning light.

"You don't know how wonderful it is to hear that, Remus."

Maybe he didn't, but for anyone that really knew them, it was probably very predictable. But that was the future, and it wasn't until the following present day, in sixth-form music, when things took an even more surprising turn.

Each of them had shown up in the music room as per usual and were sitting around in wait, curious to see who might walk through the door. So far, no one had, and Remus was starting to get suspicious.

While they waited a betting pool had broken out, with most people placing their money on another teacher stepping in to supervise, or no one at all. Sirius had bet on Filch just for the shock value, but Remus had abstained. He couldn't stop thinking about what he might do if Sheila actually came—showed up, flying through the doorway just in time for the bell. What would he say to her?

I hate you.

I'm glad you're back?

In the end it was Professor McGonagall who strolled through the doorway, much to the disappointment of several gamblers.

"I understand this is a music classroom," called the headmistress, "but if you could be so kind as to humour me, and put all your instruments to the side for today, thank you."

No one objected, though most looked rather bewildered. As Peter came out from behind his drum kit and everything from brass to strings was stowed away, the four marauders scooted their chairs closer together.

"What are the odds that she lets us off for the rest of the week?" Sirius asked.

"Not good," James winced. "Look."

With the undignified sound of four squeaky wheels, Filch appeared in the classroom doorway, wheeling a telly cart ahead of him. Before Sirius could start arguing that the gnarly care-taker's appearance meant he'd won the pot, Professor McGonagall cleared her throat.

"As you may have already guessed it, due to your teacher's absence I will be personally supplementing your music blocks. Now I could've simply given you this time for self-study..." She paused, long enough for the anticipation to build up amongst them; "But as you well know, we teachers place a great value on instructional time. And I am, at my core, a teacher."

There was a round of impish groans, not that Professor McGonagall seemed bothered.

"I have elected to come up with an alternative of sorts," she said. "And although I promise that you will have ample time for practice, you may find it beneficial to lean on one another until your regular lessons resume. Until then, I have designed a five-week course for you in home economics."

The groans turned to rabid chatter as everyone perked up in their chairs. Five weeks?! Said one girl. Home economics?! Chittered another. No one seemed to know what to think of it; usually home economics was treated as a dullard's subject, meant only for those who couldn't hack a tougher elective. It wasn't even offered to sixth-form students or those studying for their O-Levels. After all, what use was there in learning how to poach an egg when everyone had a cook at home to do it for them?

"Professor McGonagall, does this mean Mrs. Buchanan won't be returning for five weeks?" Asked one of the boys in the front row.

"Mrs. Buchanan is taking a personal leave," the headmistress said calmly; "Five weeks is merely a precaution, all we can do is hope for her swift return. But in the meantime, I'm sure she expects all of her students to remain dedicated to their work. Mr. Filch, the other cart, if you'll please."

As Filch shambled back out into the hall and all the other kids craned their necks out of curiosity, Remus sunk further into his chair. He didn't know whether to be relieved or angry. What about his personal time— his questions? She'd lost her husband, but he'd lost everything. Wasn't he owed some of it back, even if he was afraid of the answers?

While he brooded, Filch returned with a flatbed trolley piled in small sacks of flour. It appeared rather out of place in the music room, and judging by the looks on his classmates' faces, no one had the slightest idea what they were for. One of the girls asked what they could possibly be baking with so much flour, but McGonagall only smirked at her.

"Thank you, Mr. Filch," said the professor, as he set a bag on top of Sheila's podium for her. "Now, please partner up, and have one person come and grab a bag for the both of you."

"I call James," Peter said, grabbing him by the sleeve.

"As if that's any surprise," Sirius said, looking keen enough to be partnered with Remus anyway.

As the class paired themselves up, Professor McGonagall clapped her hands together urgently. "Come, come! Gather your flour and your seats, I've not finished my instructions."

Pensively, several of them stood and returned to their chairs with the heavy sacks. Remus had only just sat down when Sirius took the flour from him and pulled out a pen to begin scribbling on its surface.

“Mum hates bleached flour,” James said, inspecting his and Peter's bag. “Says it causes cancer.”

“Doesn’t sound like we’re going to be eating it,” said Remus.

"What else would you use it for?"

"Lottie swears by it for zits," Peter observed. "And Mum uses it to polish the silver at home."

"Not much silver 'round here..."

“Oi, psst!" Sirius whispered. "Anyone wanna see my knob?”

They all looked, only to find that Sirius had drawn a rather crude-looking phallus on the side of the flour bag. He grinned, and it earned him a short snigger from James and Peter anyway.

“Hm.” Remus considered. "Bit small, don't you think?"

“You would know, wouldn’t you?”

Across the room, Professor McGonagall clapped again to gather their attention.

“Now you've probably guessed it, but these—” She smacked the bag sitting upright on the podium, sending a cloud of flour up into the air; “are not meant to be just any old sacks of flour.”

“What are they for then?” Someone called. In answer, Sirius covered one nostril and bent his head down, snorted up an invisible line up off the bag. While half the class began to crack up, Professor McGonagall maintained her composure and merely shook her head.

“Be wary, Mr. Black, it's not that either. As of this very moment, these bags of flour are no longer flour at all. Rather, they are your children.”

Peter turned to Remus. “Did she just say what I think she said?”

The room was quiet for a second, while each of them shared their baffled glances. “Children?” Several voices whispered. “Like kids?”

"Oh my god." James raised his bag into the air. “It’s a flour child.”

"Damn, Minnie," Sirius groaned, "now I know you're joking."

“I assure you, I am not,” McGonagall smirked. “For the next two weeks, these bags of flour are to be your entire world. You will care for them, protect them, and love them as though they were your very own. You and every other music class."

“But it weighs a ton!” Someone complained.

“It’s merely ten pounds of flour. Human babies weigh around that much at just a month and a half. Be grateful I did not hand you a two year-old.”

“And we’re supposed to carry this thing around with us… everywhere?”

“Would you leave a real baby on its own? Just think of what could happen.”

“But it’s just a bag of flour!”

“Not anymore."

Professor McGonagall came around the podium, her hands clasped tightly ahead of herself. Remus was positive he'd never seen her looking so happy.

"As of this moment forward, these bags are your new little bundles of joy. You will be responsible for all manner of their care, and next week we shall evaluate the diaries you’ll be expected to keep as well as the state of the child. Welcome to parenthood, class, and good luck. Now Mr. Filch, would you mind terribly to set up the parenting instructional video? I have a feeling a few in here will require it...”

* * *

Wednesday 5th April 1978

Initially the bags of flour had seemed like one big joke. McGonagall had assigned the same project to every one of Sheila’s music and choir classes, and kids seemed to get a kick out of parading the fake-babies around campus, drawing faces on them and letting their friends graffiti their backsides. But as the days went by, the flour children grew to be more and more inconvenient. The bags were nearly four and a half kilos each, and leaked everywhere. On day three, Remus had been written up by Professor Bilshin for poor uniform. He'd tried desperately to explain that the white dust coating the front of his jumper was merely flour, but the professor had given him detention anyway just to be a cad.

To no one's surprise, the parenting gene came most naturally to James, who'd taken to carrying the lump—which he'd affectionately named 'Prongs Junior'—on his front in a make-shift baby carrier. He'd tried to convince his classmates that it was the most efficient way to keep an eye on the assignment, but at the risk of looking completely moronic, most had abstained.

"You look insane," Sirius complained, as he watched James wrap the shredded bits of old bed sheet around himself. "My mum never held me, and look how I turned out? Perfectly fine."

"It's just to keep things in place," James surmised, trying to prove his point by jogging on the spot in the middle of their dorm room. "Really, it's more of a wearable weight than anything. Pro athletes use them all the time when trying to bulk up."

"I'm not trying to bulk up, I'm trying to keep our reputations intact. You've already gone and named it—next thing we know you're gonna be carrying a bag full of spare nappies and pureed carrots."

"Don't be silly, Junior hates carrots."

"It's. Not. Real!"

James shrugged, already turning for the door. "Best be off now, it's breakfast time. And we mustn't keep Mummy waiting. Now Junior, say goodbye to Uncle Moony and Uncle Padfoot." With his back turned, James began talking in a high voice; "Bye, Uncle Moony. Bye, Shit-toes!"

At least Remus got a kick out of it. While he snickered, Sirius turned around and aimed a sharp punch at their own flour bag.

"Ugh. Who's 'Mummy' anyway? If it's Wormtail then I'm going to shoot myself."

"Actually, I think he was talking about Lily."

"Somehow that's even worse!" Sirius flopped back against the floor, using the flour as a pillow. “You’re not gonna start talking to it too, are you? Because I might need to reevaluate our entire relationship if that’s the case.”

“Too late,” Remus said, raising his hand bashfully. “You already put a ring on it.”

The look Sirius gave him was certainly worth any embarrassment, but they were still stuck with the flour. And so the week progressed, and apart from their missing music lessons, things almost felt normal. The girls laughed whenever they saw the flour-babies but they were managing well enough, save the occasional near miss, until halfway through the week, when some dick started a rumour that McGonagall had hidden a ‘get out of detention free’ card inside one of the bags.

(Remus strongly suspected Sirius.)

News of the assignment had already stretched all across campus, which meant a hunt was promptly launched. By lunchtime, Hawkings was a baked good’s worst nightmare. Boys teamed up to see who could mangle the most flour bags, competing until the shredded sacks had appeared in almost every hallway—with the only evidence of the perpetrators’ crimes being the white dust that inevitably got stuck on their uniforms. Remus had already bore-witness to at least half a dozen girls’ tears, after someone had invariably come along and spilled their children’s guts right in front of them. So far he and his friends had managed to keep theirs in one piece, despite the high-risk environment that was the mish-mashed forms class. Barty had already taken it upon himself to ensure that Remus and Sirius failed ‘Parenting 101’, and took every chance to get his hands on the thing. And every forms he ended up locked back in Bilshin’s cupboard.

That was probably the most fun Sirius had with the assignment. He gave no thought whatsoever to the journal they were supposed to be keeping, and instead made of various entries such as;

Took The Sack to his first gentlemen’s club. He preferred the Vodka Tonic to the Tom Collins. I haven’t bothered fretting, he still has time to become a man of taste. We kept the tab open and he complimented Naughty Robin’s top. But don’t worry, won’t be letting him head backstage until he’s grown a bit more hair on his pits.

It was funny, until Remus realised they were most certainly being graded. Bollocks.

“At least you have it easy,” Remus said, nudging Peter over lunch hour. “Potter’s doing all the work.”

“Guess so,” Peter mumbled, poking at his food. James sat across from them, Prongs Jr. still strapped to the front of his chest.

“We can’t all be the perfect parent,” he boasted, reaching over to pick up Remus’ flour. “C’mere, Knobby, Uncle Prongs will—oh my god! Knobby! Moony, what hell have you done to him?”

Fork paused halfway to his mouth, Remus watched as James turned the sack over to reveal a thick strip of gaffer tape across its middle.

“Oh. Blame Crouch. Took a pencil to him this morning.”

“And what were you doing when your child was getting run through with a bloody pencil?!”

“I patched him up, didn’t I? He’s just flour, Prongs.”

Frowning deeply, James set Knobby down on the table and rubbed its back comfortingly. “Poor thing, to live with two such unsympathetic fathers.”

As if on cue, Sirius arrived at the table with his own tray, pushing aside little Knobby with little care. If it weren’t for James, the fake-baby would’ve toppled straight off the table.

“Careful, Padfoot! You almost killed poor Knobby.”

“Oh shut up,” Sirius grunted. “I never gave you permission to name it.”

“Everyone needs a name. Even baking constituents.”

“Hmph. If anything, it should be called ‘Lunch’. Or a twelve pack of scones.”

Grinning, James held the flour up beside Sirius’ head. “What do you think, Pete? Does Knobby look more like daddy number one or daddy number two?”

Peter regarded the faded, drawn-on knob. “Sirius, for sure.”

“You guys are just hilarious,” Sirius drawled. “Let’s see how funny you are after this.”

Scooping up his fork, Sirius made an attempt at stabbing James’ chest, nearly impaling Prongs Jr. right in front of them. James knocked the first attempt away, but took a second in the back of his hand.

"Ouch! Jesus, Padfoot, you really aren't taking this well at all. It's just a fake baby. It doesn't even cry or shit or anything."

"It's stupid," Sirius said stubbornly, before turning to Peter. "Wormy agrees with me, don't you, Wormy?"

Silence sounded, and it became clear that Peter wasn't paying attention anymore. As Sirius snapped his fingers in front of his friend's face, Peter kept his eyes trained across the room, where Moira sat with her best friends, Hannah and Rachelle. Soon they were all staring, which was enough for one of the girls to take notice. One quick whisper later and Moira had spotted them; but the look she gave Peter was not exactly pleased.

"Chin up, Pete, my boy," James said, when Peter had sorely turned back to his lunch. "Stings now, but it'll fade I'm sure."

"I dunno… I was pretty sure she was the one for me."

"To hell with that," Sirius scoffed. "You're only seventeen, how can you—"

Remus kicked him under the table, making Sirius' mouth clamp shut as he reached for his shin. "Alright," he grunted. "Wager this then, we'll talk to her."

Peter looked immediately distraught. "What? No!"

"Why not?"

"I'm pretty sure you're the last person she wants to talk to, Black."

"Au contraire, you still hold that title, my dear Wormy."

If Sirius' goal was to make Peter feel better, Remus didn't think he was doing a very good job. Peter scowled, but it didn't stop Sirius from reaching over and snatching James' sack flour from his sling.

"Come on, Prongs. Let's go see if we can get Prongs Jr. a step-mum."

"Sirius, be careful! You're jostling him!"

But Sirius was already striding off, James close on his heels. With a bad feeling, Remus turned to Peter for judgement.

“You want them to stop? Just say the word.”

“I dunno,” Peter shrugged. “Don’t suppose he can make it any worse…”

Really Peter should’ve known better.

Never underestimate a Black.

Remus caught up to James and Sirius just as Moira’s friends had begun to ream them out for having the gall to approach in the first place. Sirius took the heckling in stride, waiting his turn like the good little boy he wasn’t. And when Moira had finally tired enough to glance his way, he pounced.

“Think of the children, Thurnberg!” He moaned, holding Prongs Jr. out ahead of himself. “Alright look, you’ve made your point. The lad’s distraught. You’ve shattered his heart—and the rest of his manly pride. I know you don’t exactly approve of the company he keeps, and I’m flattered, really, but don’t you think enough’s enough? If you don’t take him back we’ll never see get to have our drummer in top shape again. And we need him in top shape if we’re to avoid failing miserably at life.”

“That’s just the problem, don’t you see?” Moira said. “You only view Peter as a means to an end—a member of your shitty band! And he doesn't even realise it. You’ve got him so brainwashed into thinking that this stupid plan of yours will work, that he’s incapable of thinking for himself anymore.”

“For himself?” Sirius echoed. “Or for you?”

Moira fumed. “Piss off.”

“Ooh, do you talk to your mother with that mouth?”

“Sirius—!”

“You’re the worst of them, Sirius Black,” Moira lashed, getting up from the table. “You tread over Peter like he’s not even there, always have!”

“Now that ain’t true,” James pressed. “Pete’s as much of a Marauder as the rest—”

“No one asked you, Potter! You’d follow this idiot off a bridge if he marched you there, so you tell me, why should I support my boyfriend when he's so insistent on acting like he walks on water just because you three have put this silly fantasy in his head?!"

"Because he will walk on water some day," Sirius said. "At least to some people. Pete's an artist, and pretty soon he's gonna have those around who see that. Who appreciate him for it. And all you're gonna be is the whiney girl he dated in sixth form that was too blind to see what was right in front of her."

The girls gasped, and Remus instantly regretted not stepping in sooner. Before he could, Moira screwed her face up very tight. She looked like she might actually kill Sirius, but instead she merely snatched Prongs Jr. from his hands and slammed the darling baby down on the floor of the dining hall with a great plume of floury dust.

"Junior, no!"

As James threw himself to his knees and began scooping handfuls of Prongs Jr. back into its tattered bag, Moira pointed a finger beneath the tip of Sirius' nose.

"You can tell Peter that until he's ready to wake up and see what an arsehole you are, I am not interested in anything he has to say."

While the rest of the dining hall stared, Moira and her friends gathered their lunch trays and marched off. Remus was mortified, though not as mortified as Peter when he appeared beside them.

"What the fuck did you say to her?!"

Remus glared at Sirius, who only shook his head.

"Personally, Wormy, I think you dodged a bullet. Not a shred of maternal instinct in that one at all…"

* * *

For three days Peter hardly spoke to them, which was no less than they deserved really. He was slightly more lenient with James, as they still had McGonagall's home-ec project to complete, but even that never went past apathetic chit-chat. It left James in a mopey mood, which meant Sirius was in a worse one. In forms the three of them sat around, hardly even caring when Barty threatened to use the flour bags as target practice for all the office supplies he'd nicked from other people's desks.

"Go away, Crouch," Lily ordered. "Unless you'd like Remus to give you your fourth detention this week."

He didn't listen, and so Lily got Professor Bilshin to give them permission to use the classroom next door. When they sat down, she reached over to brush a patch of flour from the front of James' jumper.

"I don't understand why you guys don't just leave them behind at the dorms," she said, eyeing the half-deflated bag of flour in his lap. "They aren't even real."

"Can't," said James, flipping open his law text. "McGonagall's has all the teachers in on it. She gets them to take attendance for the flour in every lesson."

"That is insane."

They all grunted in agreement. Clearly their headmistress was just having a laugh.

"It's worse for him," Sirius said, pointing at James while chuckling lightly. "He's practically a single mother now."

"Yeah, no thanks to you."

Sirius' smile vanished, and Lily scooted her chair forward.

"Yes, you're all miserable, we've covered that. But have any of you tried fixing it? Apologising, maybe?"

" 'Course we have," Remus answered. "Pete won't—"

"I meant to Moira."

"No way," Sirius replied. "I'd rather cut my own ear off than apologise to that snooty bint."

"At this rate you might have to, that is if you ever want Peter to speak to you again."

He scoffed, but it seemed James was not entirely opposed.

“Daisy’s right. You should apologise to her, Padfoot.”

“Why me?”

“Because you’re the one who called her a whiney nobody!”

Lily turned on him. “Sirius! You did not.”

“Okay, so maybe I did!” Sirius snapped. “But we were all thinking it! She’s hated us since ninth year, and you know all she does is bad-mouth us to Pete when no one’s around. Sorry that I’m the only one with the balls to say something…”

“It’s not worth it if it hurts Peter too,” said Lily. “You can’t treat him differently and get down on him for who he dates.”

“Now hold on, we may not be the socialist utopia everyone wants, but we treat Pete the same as anyone!”

“No, not the same as me,” James said. “Not the same as Moony.”

Remus felt his shoulders grow tight, while Sirius slumped in his chair and scoffed.

“Oh, come on. That’s different.”

“Different how?”

“You really gonna make me spell it out, Potter?”

James shut his textbook with a smack. “Fine, maybe it is different! But Moira could still be right. You’re my best friend, Sirius, and Moony, well he’s your…”

“My boyfriend,” Sirius answered curtly. “You can say it, Prongs. He’s my boyfriend.”

“No one’s not saying it, Sirius,” Lily sighed, “but Peter doesn’t even know.”

“Christ, where’s McKinnon when we need her? Moony and I don’t owe an explanation to any of you. Potter’s just upset ‘cause Thurnberg called him a sheep, but it’s our relationship! A secret one, I might add. And Peter Pettigrew couldn’t keep a secret if all our lives depended on it!”

“That’s not fair,” Lily scolded. “Not when you haven’t even given him a chance."

Sirius gaped at both of them, and then whirled on Remus.

"What about you? Don't try telling me you don't have an opinion?"

Remus winced. "Call me a hypocrite—"

"You're a hypocrite."

"—But … I think maybe Lily's right. We should at least try to tell him."

"You really want Peter to know? ... You?"

"I just think we owe it to him to be honest, like we have with the others. And if we want the band to work then…"

Sirius looked back to James, who had started picking at a hole in Prongs Jr.'s head rather than make eye contact. Finally he groaned.

"Fine! We'll tell him… But after the Craigtyre trip! … Don't need any shitty rumours messing up what could be our last good day."

They all agreed on that at least, and Remus tried to not give in to the black hole that was slowly eating him from inside out. It'd been there ever since Sheila left, and got bigger each and every time he thought about that photo from his baptism.

It was another hitch; another hitch in the tragic pattern that was his life. Realising it made Remus feel like a stoppered bottle shaken to its bursting point. He wanted to scream and yell, to beat them with his fists, but everyone he felt the need to punish was long gone.

Where are you? Came the anger, often. Why are you all such cowards?

He put it away.

On Saturday, all upper-sixth students met their buses outside Castle Hall as usual. It was their final weekend with the flour children, and luckily for them Professor McGonagall had been kind enough to let all of the would-be parents off for the evening. Uninterested in toting the heavy bags around off campus, nearly everyone had left them back at the dorms—but not James Potter. He still had his flour bag in a sling across his front, though Prongs Jr. had been looking worse for wear ever since Moira exploded him across the dining room floor.

“I have a gift for you,” Lily said, before unceremoniously pulling out a blue baby cap. James took one look at it and lit up from top to bottom.

“Oh, Daisy! It’s great!”

“Thought you might like it,” she said, as he kissed her hair and fit the cap over Prongs Jr.’s head. “One of the girls in Rowena is like a knitting machine.”

“That is so embarrassing,” Sirius grimaced. “At least you know he’ll be loyal.”

“Look, Potter,” Lottie cooed, “now Junior and Francois are matching.”

She showed off her own sack of flour, which had a pink bonnet fitted over its top. Remus had forgotten that Lottie was in Sheila’s choir class until she’d appeared with baby Francois the next day. Though he tended to avoid looking at it; the extra lipstick and fake eyelashes were a bit unsettling.

“Petey, will you help me with my bag? It’s got Francois’ dummy in it.”

“Now you’re just taking the piss,” Peter grumbled, fetching his sister’s bag for her anyway. Remus watched, but when Peter caught him staring, he was not impressed.

“What? Do I have something on my face?”

“Er—no…?”

Peter spun away, and Remus tried not to let it bother him. As they moved up the line, nearly ready to board, he spotted Trish with her clipboard and got an idea.

“Oi, where’re you going?” Sirius called, as Remus stepped out of line.

“Just to talk to Trish! Be two seconds!”

“You’ll miss the bus!”

The crowd of kids was already thinning by the time he reached her, most having sorted themselves onto their allotted buses. A few honked, ready to pull away from the pavement, and Remus could hear his friends calling out to him from behind.

“Best get a shift on, Remington, else ye’ll miss yer bus.”

“I know, Trish, I’ll be quick—nice hair by the way.”

She reached up, touching the wisps of hair that had been shorn short like Liza Minnelli's.

“Whach'ye want then?”

“Can you tell me what bus Moira Thurnberg is on?”

She glanced down at the list. “Uh… Bus three.”

“Cool, thanks. Say hi to Regulus for me.”

Her cheeks reddened, though that could’ve been the cold, and she smacked him—“Say hi to him yerself, lavvy head!”—but Remus had already legged it. By the time he made it back down the grass to his bus, Sirius was hollering at him out the window.

“Hurry up, Evans asked the driver to wait!”

“Actually I’ll meet you in town!”

“What?!”

“Just gotta do something first!”

“You nutter!”

Flashing Sirius a thumbs up, Remus watched as his boyfriend ducked back into the window and slammed it closed. A second later the bus honked twice and began pulling away from the curb. Luckily for him, when he made his way aboard bus three, it was Stan sitting in the driver’s seat.

“Sorry, Stan. Missed my bus.”

“Just get on, Lupin,” the man yawned, pulling the door shut after him.

He found Moira sitting near the middle with her friends, and only began to regret every decision he’d ever made when he started down the aisle and was met with three piercing glares. He stopped beside Moira’s seat, only slightly intimidated by the look her best friend Rachelle was giving him.

“Uh… Hey, guys."

The girls merely glared.

"Uh... so, Rachelle, would you mind switching seats for a moment? I just would really like to talk to Moira…”

Rachelle crossed her arms. “Yeah, right. You’re thicker than I thought if you think I’m moving, Lupin.”

“You can sit here, Remus,” Hannah said, adjusting her glasses. Both Moira and Rachelle spun around in their bus seat to accost her for it, and she shrugged shyly. “What? Everywhere else is full…”

He sat, and though Moira tried her best to ignore him, he was tall enough to see over the back of her seat.

“Moira, what Sirius said was—”

“Save it,” Rachelle hissed. “She isn’t taking Pettigrew back.”

“But Peter—”

“Really should be here himself if he meant it,” Hannah finished.

Remus sighed. He wasn’t going to get anywhere unless he changed tactics.

As the bus started up and set itself down the cobble path leading out the school gates, Remus raised his voice and addressed the best friends instead. Appeal to the masses, and all that.

“I get it, you guys have full rights to be pissed off. I would be too. Sirius was a total dick, and James and I—”

“Said nothing—”

“Did nothing.”

“Yeah… But look, I can’t say anything for whatever happened between the two of them over Easter, but you guys should know that Pete is really torn up about it. Regrets it and everything. His—uhm… His brother… Yeah, he told him to… to give Moira space! That’s the only reason he hasn’t said anything before now. But he’s really, really sorry. And we are too, if it counts for anything…”

The girls shared a glance, and then deferred to Moira, who’d kept her arms crossed and was still glaring out the bus window.

Hannah nudged him, nodding urgently; Keep going!

“You wanna know what Pete said? He said that… That Moira was the only one for him. No one better, and no one who knows him better… Not even us.”

The bus kept on rumbling, banging off the rough dirt road as it headed into the valley. For a while it seemed as though Remus’ efforts were all for naught.

Then Moira turned around.

“Did Sirius put you up to this?”

“What? No… I mean, he’s sorry too, if that’s what you meant.”

She pursed her lips. “You’re going to regret it if you get stuck cleaning up his messes forever.”

“Yeah, but sometimes he cleans up mine too.”

She didn’t look impressed, or like she believed a word he’d said, but neither did she spin away in a huff. Remus told himself it was something.

“Fine, Lupin. You win. I’ll talk to Peter, but Sirius can stick his apology up his arse.”

It was more than something then—it was a win.

"Fair enough."

Sirius wasn’t impressed when they got off the bus in the village, but he understood when Moira approached Peter and asked if the two of them could go off together.

“You sneaky bastard, you really are the best-worst matchmaker there is.”

“Trust me, it’s not for a lack of trying,” Remus moaned.

Because everyone wanted their alone time—and because Sirius couldn’t bear to be seen in public with Francois and Prongs Jr.—they arranged to meet back at the broomsticks as a group later in the day.

“It’s just so dumb,” Sirius was ranting. “Baby-this, father-that. I don’t get it.”

“You’ve been in a bad mood since McGonagall set the assignment,” Remus said, the two of them walking shoulder-to-shoulder as they started up the village’s high street. "Wanna tell me what that's about?"

“What, like you’re actually enjoying yourself? Don't tell me that you want to be a parent all of a sudden?”

“No, but it’s only two weeks. And it’s just a bit, anyway. James is only making fun.”

“Yeah it's a bit—it’s a bit annoying. And it’s insensitive.”

“Insensitive how?”

“Insensitive like—you! You just found out about Sheila! That you had a whole godparent out there who knew everything and still didn’t tell you! And then Pete goes off the rails, and you’re also dealing with your bloody dad—or dads—I mean, parents are just shite all around, who would ever want to be one? All they do is let you down...”

He could sense Sirius’ own hurt leaking out around his words. Perhaps he’d gotten a bit too comfortable when it was them, Regulus, and Mary. Their friends’ arrivals, the assignments, the jokes—maybe it was a bit much. But hating James and lashing out at Peter wasn’t fair either.

Purposely slowing their walk, Remus looked up at the grey-blue sky. It’d rained that morning, and puddles were still collecting around the roadside. A small lorry drove past, scattering their surfaces and rumbling all the way up the street. He finally stopped on a corner, and had Sirius do a turnabout to face him.

“Do you think Sheila loves me?”

“Huh?”

“Do you think she could love me, even after all this time?”

“Well... Who wouldn’t love you?”

It was such a Sirius answer. So lovely and simple.

“I care about you so much, nothing else should matter. It doesn't matter. So if you’re feeling bad, Sirius, you can talk to me. You know that, right?"

Sirius wiped beneath his nose, a bit like a child. “You hypocrite. You never tell us your problems.”

Remus laughed and fit his hands into his coat pockets. “Yeah, guess I deserve that.”

“Does that mean you forgive them then? Sheila and—and your parents…?”

“Dunno,” Remus shrugged. “Might never forgive ‘em. But I’m not going to let them take the things I want away from me anymore.”

Sirius’ lips parted in further surprise. He thought for a moment, and then he smiled. The sort of smile that creased every inch of his face and had made Remus fall in love with him that very first day.

“You know, just this morning Mary was ragging on me," he said. "She said I had the emotional range of a teaspoon. Do you know what I told her?”

“That it’s closer to two teaspoons?”

“I said, ‘that’s okay, Moony’s deep enough for the both of us’."

Oh.

"And you are. I could drown in you. Couldn’t imagine a better way to go, actually.”

Now that’s a song, Remus thought.

Swelling with happiness, he surged forward, hugging Sirius first and then dropping an arm around his shoulder as they walked. To anyone else it might’ve looked casual, but to the two of them, it meant so much more.

After a quick pit-stop for whisky and cigarettes, they stopped in at the record shop, where Sirius badgered Graeme to put on some T. Rex and Remus sorted four crates of stock just to leave with a slightly-battered copy of The Freewheelin’ Bob Dylan.

“Not that I’m questioning your taste,” Sirius said, as they left the shop and started toward the pub; “but… Nah, I’m questioning your taste.”

“It’s got a certain song on it,” Remus said, peering down at the back of the album sleeve. “Haven’t heard it for a while. I’d know what all the fuss is about.”

“It’s that good?”

“No. Pretty sure it’s shit, actually.”

They shared a smile.

When they arrived at the Three Broomsticks, they found their friends already waiting for them. Remus had to duck to avoid cracking his forehead against the drooping sign hanging above the pub’s doorway, but the inside was as warm and inviting as always. Near the back, James, Lily, and Marlene were set up at their usual table, a small forest of glasses already spread out in front of them.

“Oi, Padfoot!” James cried when he spotted them. “Come over here! I think I’ve finally figured out what’s got you so cross lately.”

“Oh yeah?” Sirius asked, sliding in next to James, Remus right behind.

“Yeah, completely my fault—I forgot how much the title meant to you! So here, say hello to your first godchild!” James gestured to Prongs Jr., still wrapped up in his lap. Next to him, Lily shook her head hopelessly.

“I told you it wasn’t a funny joke.”

“No?” James frowned. “Padfoot? … Dadfoot…?”

Sirius slumped back against the booth, and finally groaned. “I hate ya, Prongs. I love ya, but I hate ya.”

This made everyone laugh, and just like that, things were alright again. They ordered more drinks and the Broomstick’s landlady, Rosie, came over to prattle them about being nearly finished with school. Marlene told them that Lottie was visiting with some girlfriends a few tables down, and so far Peter was still missing in action after going off with Moira earlier on. Remus hoped it was a good sign, and not because she’d drowned him in the lake.

Eventually Mary made an appearance, shrugging off her winter coat while grinning ear to ear. She shoved in next to Marlene with news that she’d just refused a date with Jason Barnes, arguably one of the fittest boys in their year.

“Why’d you say no?” Marlene asked her. “You told me he’s been making eyes at you for weeks.”

Mary smiled coyly, popping a few pub peanuts into her mouth for good measure. “I almost did, but then I thought to myself, in less than two months we’ll all be going off—doing new things, in new places! And I just sorta thought that it would be nice to spend the rest of my time at school with my friends.”

Remus and Sirius shared a glance. Not even the dim lighting could hide the rosy twinge in Marlene’s cheeks after that.

Remus was relieved when Peter and Moira finally showed up. Peter stood awkwardly at the end of the table, but Moira didn’t seem interested in backing down. While James quickly cleared space for them, she regarded Sirius coolly.

“Thurnberg.”

“Black.”

This time, Sirius did not need a swift kick beneath the table. He straightened up in the booth, and raised a nod to her. “I respect anyone who can speak their mind like you did, Thurnberg—no holding back. And for what it's worth, I’m… sorry, for what I said.”

Moira glanced at Peter, softly, and nodded. “I accept your apology.”

“Moira and I are dating again,” Peter smiled.

The girls all congratulated them, and when the two were sitting, Lily leaned over and pat the girl fondly.

“Don’t ever pay any attention to what Sirius says. He’s a sour thing, especially when his friends like anyone more than him.”

“Only ‘cause it must mean they’ve gone mad! There aren’t many people more likeable than I am.”

“I can name a few,” Marlene said, counting off her fingers; “Charles Manson, Ivan the Terrible, Filch…”

It made everyone laugh, and Sirius raised his glass with a scoff. “Alright, everyone yack it up. See if you’re laughing when it’s this face that’s paying your mortgages, then you’ll all be desperate to have me __”

“Lily?”

It surprised Sirius, enough that he almost fumbled his pint. When he looked up to see what it was, he let out a heavy sigh.

“Christ, I can’t believe no one’s put a bell on you yet. What do you want, Snivellus?”

Snape miraculously held his tongue, though he did look a lot like he’d swallowed a lemon.

“Lily, I just came to offer my congrats.”

Looking surprised to be called upon, Lily raised her head and nodded cordially. “Erm, thank you, Severus… but for what?”

“I spoke with my mother this morning, and she told me the good news. She said she was chatting with your parents this morning when they mentioned that you’d gotten into Oxford.”

A round of gasps went up.

“Oxford, Lils?” Marlene demanded. “You mean you heard back from them already?”

“I–I… uh…”

“Daisy, that’s amazing!” James said. “For real? Blimey, why didn't you say anything?”

Lily was still stammering. “I—I only found out the other day. They moved me from ‘conditional’ to ‘accepted’ after Professor McGonagall wrote to them on my behalf. I was going to tell all of you tonight, I just… couldn’t find the right moment, really.”

“Yeah, it’s proper brilliant, except Snivellus, here, ruined the surprise,” said Sirius.

“It’s fine, Sirius, really—”

“Because it’s still amazing,” James said.

“It’s more than amazing,” Snape interjected haughtily; “it’s remarkable. To get into Oxford is a top achievement. In fact I was accepted as well for chemistry—”

Mary interrupted, raising her glass. "To Lily!" She cried, and they all matched it, cheersing while Lily turned red in her booth.

“Thank you, everyone. And you too, Severus. It still doesn’t quite feel real, but... I’m afraid I’m not going to Oxford.”

“What?” They all echoed.

“Why not?” Asked James.

“Because… I’ve already accepted a different seat. At the University College of London.”

For a moment everyone was silent, until James connected the dots.

“So you’ll be in London...?”

“Starting in September, yeah!”

James nearly leapt up from his chair—only Prongs Jr., still sitting in his lap, kept him seated. “Oh, bloody hell—yes!” He cried, taking Lily and kissing her several times on either cheek. Their friends had just begun to celebrate when the good news was unfortunately interrupted once more.

“You can’t be serious,” Snape fumed. “You mean you’d actually give up a spot at the most prestigious university in the country just to chase after—after these bastards?!”

“If you wanna get technical then only Moony’s a bastard,” Sirius said, making Remus punch him in the arm.

“It’s my choice, Severus,” Lily said calmly. “Please tell your mother I said thank you. But I’m only going back home to Liverpool to gather my things, then I’ll be moving to London.”

Snape began to sputter; “What—? Why?! I… I cannot believe you!”

“She didn’t ask for your opinion, Snape,” James snarled, leaning over his bag of flour threateningly.

“And just what exactly are you possibly going to learn in London? How to fare-dodge and avoid the puddles of piss on the pavement?”

“Oh yes, some of life’s greatest lessons, naturally,” Sirius cackled. “Add in a little debauchery and hedonism and you’ve got our entire summer itinerary.” As if to prove his point, Sirius untucked a cigarette carton from his pocket and lit one up right there, blowing the smoke in Snape's direction.

Nostrils flared, Snape remained at the end of their table, practically vibrating with rage. "This is pathetic," he snarled. "You're throwing so much away and for what?"

"It's her choice, Snape," Marlene hissed.

"It's a stupid choice!"

"Alright, I think we've all heard enough," James said firmly. "You didn't get what you wanted, but we're not interested in the fight you so badly want to pick, so just shove off."

"You'll drag her down, Potter. She's only going because you—"

"Enough!" Lily shrieked, surprising all of them. "I won't do this anymore, Severus! No more name-calling or bickering or fighting. This is my choice, and I'll not have you belittling me or those I care about! Now please, leave!"

"But Lily, you're making a mistake!"

"You're not hearing her!" James lashed. "You have nothing to do with this, Snape. Now get lost before I have to—" In a beat of protective anger, James had made to stand—except the argument had distracted him, and as he got up, Prongs Jr.'s sensitive paper wrapping got caught on the table edge and tore straight down the middle.

They all yelped as flour flooded the table top, dousing drinks and spilling into laps. Desperately, James went to grab for the bag, but there was no helping it; Prongs Jr.'s powdery insides slipped out between his fingers in vain.

"Oh—not again!" He wailed, as the rest of his friends were caught between moans and crazed laughter.

"Now you've gone and done it, Snivelly!" Sirius howled, holding his cig aloft and flicking flour at him. "You've killed a child! Lily's adoptive son, no less! I hope you're happy with yourself."

Looking repulsed, Snape shot one final glance at Lily before storming off.

"It's not in my hair, is it?" Mary fretted, desperately trying to wipe the dust from her shirt-front.

“No,” Marlene giggled, “but it is right there—!” She finished by poking her friend on the tip of the nose, leaving a white outline behind as Mary scoffed.

As other patrons turned to watch them scoop handfuls of flour out of their laps, Rosie reappeared at the table-side, a rag in both hands and disbelief written across her face. “Jesus Mary and Joseph—what happened?!”

“I killed my child,” James sobbed, leaving white handprints across his face.

“It’s just flour,” Remus clarified. “School assignment. The bag ripped.”

“Yes, well it’s going everywhere,” the landlady grimaced.

“We’ll clean it,” Lily assured her, wiping flour from her chin with one hand and comforting James with the other.

“Sorta sad, isn’t it?” Sirius said to Remus. “I was barely a god-dad for an entire hour. If you ask me, the whole thing was completely half-baked.”

“Was that supposed to be a pun, Padfoot?”

“Did’ya like it? I got more. You really bread my mind, Moony. Now I’m on a roll. Or how ‘bout—” He dipped his pinky finger into the flour and licked it; “the kid was a real raw talent.”

“You’re terrible.”

Sirius began to snigger, and then stubbed his cigarette out in one of the tiny white mountains on the table. “Maybe. Call the whole thing a recipe for disaster.”

“Oi.” Reaching over Remus, James clapped Sirius in the back of the head, sending flour everywhere. “Where’s your compassion, Padfoot? That was your godson, it was.”

With his dark hair sprinkled white, Sirius just shrugged. “I’m already numb. Forgot to tell ya, but Knobby might have taken a tumble out of a third floor window this morning.”

Remus gaped at him; “Might have?”

In answer, Sirius dug a hand into his pocket and pulled out a single baggie of flour. “Reckon half a cup will be enough to earn us decent marks with McGonagall, Moons?"

* * *

They ended up staying late, scrubbing flour from the cracks in the Broomsticks' floorboards for so long that they had to make a run for it just to make the final bus. James had to carry what was left of Prongs Jr. out in a shopping bag, and when Lottie saw them all covered head to toe in white, she laughed so hard she nearly dropped Francois.

"At least one good thing came of today," James said wistfully, indicating toward the back of the bus, where Peter and Moira were stowed away, grinning and smiling and positively made-up.

"You know what this means, right?" Sirius asked. "We're gonna be stuck with Thurnberg 'til we die."

"Little victories, Padfoot, little victories."

Back at the dorms, James didn't even bother showering. Instead he made straight for the kitchenette to perform what he was calling 'emergency surgery' on what was left of his son. Too tired to make fun of him and too weirded out to help, Remus and Sirius made their way upstairs before anyone else could catch an eyeful of their ghostly get-up.

"How the fuck did it get into my belly-button?" Sirius mused, looking down at his bare chest as Remus emerged from the toilet, freshly showered.

"It was behind my ears too," said Remus, rubbing a towel over his head. Sirius glanced at him, moving to prop himself up on his bed with his elbows.

"Are you sure you don't want to hear the story of how Knobby ended up falling from the Priori Block's third floor?"

"Save it for McGonagall, we're gonna need a decent sob story if we don't want to fail," Remus said. He pulled the towel from his head and came forward, bending down so he could lock Sirius' lips with a kiss.

Suddenly the door flew open and Peter raced inside, making the two of them jump apart as though they'd just been given an electric shock.

“Hey lads!” Peter cried, barely glancing their way as he beelined for his own bed.

“H–Hey Wormtail,” Sirius started. “Said goodnight to Thurnberg already?”

“Not quite!”

“Things are going well then?” Asked Remus.

“Yeah, brill!” Peter threw open the hutch at the end of his bed and began digging through it. “I told Moira I was sorry for the way I acted over Easter—I was a proper dick. But I think she’s even coming around to the idea of the band! You think we could still get into the campus gardens at this time? I wanna take her out and explain everything properly. ”

“Probably, if you’re quick about it.”

“Sorry for freezing you guys out earlier,” Peter said, tugging on his spare trainers. “I was just upset about Moira.”

“We get it, mate,” said Remus. “We’re just glad you’ve made up.”

“Thanks. You two done with the shower then? I gotta piss but I don’t want to keep Moira waiting too long.”

“S’all yours,” Sirius called, and Peter nodded at him before disappearing inside.

“Well, glad that’s over with.” Reaching for the ashtray on his bedside, Sirius picked up one of his unlit cigarettes while Remus sagged against the floor next to him.

“Sirius… we gotta tell him.”

“What—like right now?”

Remus pulled the cigarette from Sirius' lips, leaning in until they were nose to nose. “Sirius, it’s time.”

“Okay,” he sighed, snatching back the cigarette. “How d’ya wanna go about it then? ‘Hey, Pete, just so you know Moony and I are dating and while you were fighting with your girlfriend, we spent all of Easter shagging on the common room floor. But don’t worry, we never touched your bed’.”

“Very funny.”

“Should be, I got the rug burns to prove it.”

Remus shook his head. “There’s gotta be an easier way. How’d we do it with James and Lily? I can hardly remember…”

“That’s ‘cause you were too busy having a fit,” Sirius snorted; “We could always tell him about Sim. About how he tried to kiss you on their front drive.”

“Not a chance.”

“You’re right, imagine the fallout.”

“It’d be catastrophic.”

“More like cataclysmic.”

“I think you mean calamitous.”

“Mm… God, I love that big brain of yours, Lupin.” Then Sirius leaned in and kissed him.

“Hey, Sirius, I think I found your—” Peter stopped dead outside the bathroom doorway. “What are you doing?”

Remus pulled back, turning to look at Peter with eyes like saucers. “Pete! We were just—uhm—!”

“Snogging,” Sirius said, very boldly. “We were snogging.”

“… Why?”

Sirius glanced at Remus, then back at Peter, and shrugged. “Because we… love each other?”

A look of floundering confusion crossed Peter’s face, then what could’ve been realisation. For a second Remus almost thought he’d gotten it—before his mouth split into a dismissive smile.

“Right, sure. Very funny, you daft tarts,” Peter said, crossing the room toward them. “Here’s your ring, Black. You should keep better hold of it, I just about knocked it down the drain.”

“Oh shit, that’s mine actually.” Remus reached out and took the ring, slipping it back onto his own finger as Sirius gaped at him.

“You took it off?!”

“Only ‘cause my hands were still covered in flour! Must’ve forgotten it on the side of the sink… Cheers, Pete.”

At the thanks, Peter gave Remus a funny look. “You sure? It’s got Sirius’ initials inside.”

A beat passed between them, and Remus looked at Sirius again, who carefully sat up on his bed. “Yeah... and it’s Moony’s ring."

“Why would Remus be wearing a ring with your initials in it?”

Both of them leaned forward pointedly, and Sirius beckoned Peter on with his hand. “Because we’re…”

It was as though the gears began turning behind Peter’s eyes. “You’re —”

“Buggering each other, yeah.”

“Sirius! I’m going to push you out of a third floor window.”

“What? You said you wanted to tell him!”

“I did, but—shit…”

Peter continued staring at them with disapproving eyes. “You mean the two of you are actually…?”

“We meant to tell you with the others,” Remus urged. “But then things got complicated and we were worried that… well…”

“Others? You mean James knows?”

Maybe it would’ve been better to lie, but it would’ve done nothing in the end. And so they nodded.

“Since January.”

“January?!” Peter half-shouted. “You guys have been doing th—this?! —since January?!”

“A bit longer than that…” Remus confessed. “But yeah.”

“So the two of you… In our room?!”

“Yeah, our room,” Sirius shot defensively. “As if you haven’t done god knows what with Thurnberg in here.”

“That’s different! Moira’s a girl, and Moony, he’s a—he’s a—!”

“A guy?”

“Yes!”

“Blimey!” Sirius cried. “Moony you never told me that!”

“Sirius, don’t.”

“Why not? Macdonald didn't have such a reaction, and she found out the same way.”

“You told Mary?” Peter demanded. “Who else knows then?!”

“Evans,” Sirius answered. “And McKinnon, though she sorta figured it out on her own.”

“No, I told her,” Remus rebuffed.

“You did? I thought she called it.”

“No, Lottie was the one who figured it out on her—” Remus covered his mouth quickly, but the damage was already done.

“You gotta be fucking joking,” Peter said. “Does everyone know but me?!”

“It wasn’t intentional.”

“Bollocks!”

“We figured you wouldn’t want to know,” Sirius said. “That you’d rather be blissfully unaware.”

“Not when everyone else knows! Not when you guys are having a great laugh behind my back!”

“We weren’t laughing, Pete. We were—”

"Screw you!"

Before Remus could even finish, Peter had gone from the room. Just marched straight out, without another word. Dread welling up inside of him, Remus jumped to his feet and made to go after him, but faltered before he'd even made it halfway to the door.

"Well, now he knows," Sirius said, solemnly flipping the cigarette around in his hands.

"Do you think he'll tell anyone?" Remus murmured, still staring at the door.

"No. But that doesn't mean he'll ever talk to us again. Maybe Marauders will be looking for a new drummer after all."

"He didn't seem offended," Remus tried meekly. "That we were both blokes, that is. Just that we didn't say anything."

"A poison dart frog doesn't seem poisonous, either."

And with that, Sirius turned over on his bed.

Neither of them ventured out, and Peter didn't return. Remus wanted to stay close to Sirius—to let them comfort and reassure one another—but he was too wound up. In the end they stayed on their own beds, not talking. Near curfew, James finally returned with a half-sellotaped Prongs Jr. under one arm and his shirt and trousers still covered in flour. He seemed breathless, like he'd taken each set of stairs at a run.

"Hey," he panted; "Have either of you seen Pete? I saw him walking out and he seemed kind of off."

"We told him, Prongs," Sirius said, completely blasé. "He knows about Moony and me."

"Oh… Oh shit."

"Yeah."

"O–Okay. And I'm assuming it went…?"

"Swell," Remus answered from his own bed, nose tucked into a book.

No one said anything for several seconds, and James simply stood in front of the door, chewing his bottom lip nervously.

"Well hey, i–it's okay, right? I'll talk to him. He'll come around, I know it."

"Glad you're so confident," Sirius said, popping up to set a record on the turntable.

Still appearing antsy, James started across the room and set Prongs Jr. down on his bedside. “There’s, erm… There’s something else too.”

“Oh no, has the Queen died?” Sirius asked sarcastically. “Or no, wait —it’s not John Lennon is it?”

“No.”

“Paul McCartney? He always was the most insufferable Beatle.”

“No!” James turned around, and looked straight at Remus. “It’s Buchanan. She’s back.”

Chapter End Notes

As far as I’m aware, bleached flour wasn't banned in Europe until the 90s.
'Delia Smith' was/is a famous British baker. She actually baked the cake that was on the front cover of the Rolling Stones’ “Let It Bleed” album.
'Gaffer tape' is just duct tape.
A 'dummie' is another name for a pacifier.
The Bob Dylan song Remus is talking about on the 'Freewheelin' Bob Dylan' album is "A Hard Rain’s A-Gonna Fall" -- the song that was playing in Hope's hospital room the last time he spoke to her, and the song that's caused him so much trauma consequently. I like to think this is his first step toward healing, and ofc Sirius was there to see it <3

As a final note, I know I didn't deliver on that 'something else' I promised in the end notes of last chapter. I just got too busy over the holidays. But if you're really good, I might post it alongside next week's chapter.

Much love - mot xo

Chapter 92: Blue

Chapter Summary

"What sort of blue?"

Chapter Notes

Note: This chapter picks up immediately following the end of chapter 91. Apologies to any people who have to wait until late in their evenings for these Sunday chapters to be released, lol. I'm in the PST timezone so I'm quite far behind the majority of readers.

Massive Trigger Warning for this chapter: Mental illness involving adults and children as well as strong intrusive thoughts (Remus) and mental trauma. I will say it loudly for those in the back This chapter touches heavily on Hope Lupin's poor mental health.
Here is a tumblr post I made a while ago stating what Hope was experiencing, however this has been a theme throughout Cadence and should not come as a shock, though I understand why it could be read as upsetting.

Trust me when I say I don't take any of these themes lightly, nor should any reader. Poor mental health is a hard topic to handle within media, but just because someone has poor mental health does not mean they aren't capable of being a good person who is worthy of care and love. If you are at all sensitive to this, please do not read this chapter or come to my tumblr to ask for a summary. As long as I'm active, I will always give it, no matter how long it's been. Thank you.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Don't let me down,
Don't let me down;
Don't let me down,
Don't let me down…

- "Don't Let Me Down" The Beatles, 1969

Sheila was beloved. Remus had always known that. She looked for the troubled ones, the lost causes, and accepted them even when they shouted obscenities right in her face. She was kind, often too kind… too patient. But she was beloved. And as much as he hated her for what she'd done, Remus couldn't help but love her too.

Do you think she could love me, even after all this time?

"You don't have to go," Sirius told him. "Not if it'll make you sad."

I am sad. I'm always sad. I have been sad for eighteen years.

And who's fault is that?

The thought came violently; intrusive and punishing. He hadn't had one in so long—Sirius' influence, probably. Stupid Remus... And here he'd thought it must've meant that he was getting better.

You don't care! It rang, like some sick children's song. You don't care, you don't care, you don't caaaaaaaaare!

"Moony?"

Your fault, your fault!

"I'm going to see her, Sirius."

"… Alright then."

Remus had never been to the teachers' quarters before. Considered out of bounds to all students, the brick and mortar building sat just behind Castle Hall and boasted the largest car park on campus save the trolley depot. They had to scale the main gate to get inside, but it was easy enough for the two seasoned pranksters.

Unsurprisingly, James had gone after Peter. Remus had no idea whether it would help or what James even planned to say to him, but he didn't have the energy to argue. If Peter wanted to be angry with them then he could be angry, but Remus could only tolerate one relationship imploding at once. Maybe it was selfish, but if Sheila really was back then he wasn't going to wait. Not until he got his answers.

"Shit... Fuck!"

Remus threw his hands down, hearing the sharp ting as the bobby pins disappeared into the dark. He'd been working on the front door's lock for ages, but it was heavy and the wrong kind—harder to pick than the usual pin-and-tumbler ones scattered about campus.

"What if we just knock on her window?" Sirius suggested, standing behind Remus and looking antsy.

"We don't know which window is her's."

"Eh, maybe we get lucky."

Remus sighed, haggardly. Even if they did manage to somehow get inside, there was no guarantee they'd even be able to figure out which door belonged to her. One wrong move and they could be in detention for the next month.

"We could wait until Monday," Sirius said, pressing a hand on his shoulder. "At least that way you know she'll be—"

"I don't want to wait until Monday, Sirius!"

The shout had poured out of him on accident, and Remus was instantly sorry. "I'm sorry," he murmured, standing up beneath the buzzing yellow entry light. "Sorry..."

"You don't have to be sorry." Sirius raised a hand, pressing his palm to the side of Remus' neck. It was cool; comforting.

"You can go," he said. "I'll figure it out on my own. No need for you to get caught up too."

"Not a chance. I'm here, Moons. Always."

Remus smiled, agonisingly. What would I ever do without you?

Just then the gate surrounding the building's car park gave a loud buzz. It began rolling back and a van drove through, its headlamps reflecting off of the first floor windows as it pulled up to the curb, cornering them on the front doorstop.

"Quick!" Sirius hissed, stumbling away from the doors and practically pushing Remus into a thatch of the nearby bushes. Had they dawdled for even a second longer they would've been caught by the delivery man pushing a heavy laundry cart from his van into the building.

"We have to do our laundry and they get theirs delivered?" Sirius whispered harshly. "Oh, that is so not fair."

"Shh!" Remus hissed, elbowing him to be quiet. Luckily the delivery man didn't seem to notice. He whistled as he passed their hiding spot, a large silver keyring jingling on his belt. It was the perfect opportunity, but in his hurry to hide, Remus had gotten his shoelaces caught up in the lower brambles of the hedge.

"Sirius, the door!" He moaned, as the delivery guy pushed his cart inside and the door began to shut behind him.

"Yeah, I got it!" Sirius grunted, pushing free of the hedge. He caught the edge of the door at the last possible second, sliding his fingers in between the gap. After freeing himself from the bush, Remus joined him in the doorway. He had several leftover leaves in his hair, and brushed them away while Sirius smiled. "You missed one," he said, picking a stray twig from the front of his jumper. Remus caught his hand and kissed it, trying to keep his own from shaking. Sirius only looked at him sadly.

"Are you sure you wanna do this, Moons?"

"I'm never sure," he murmured into his knuckles, "but I'm tired of waiting."

There was not much to be said after that. Together they slipped soundlessly into the building. It was already past supper time, but unless every Hawkings professor made it a habit to retire at eight o'clock Saturdays, then they still ran a high risk of being caught. Thankfully they were not left to wander around aimlessly for long. The building's lobby was brightly lit, and next to a wall of tiny post boxes they found a directory that was most likely meant for deliveries. They scanned the list until they found her; S. Buchanan, 3F9.

"So..." Sirius raised his arms for a stretch; "Elevator or the stairs?"

They took the stairwell, which was made of cement and echoed horribly, and ran the risk of being caught only once when Professor Bilshin stepped out to collect his post.

"I could'a gone my whole life without seeing old Bil' in a robe," Sirius shuttered, when they finally emerged on the third floor. "Reckon he was naked under it?"

"I don't really want to think about it to be honest," Remus murmured, busy scanning the golden door numbers as they rushed down the hallway. Sirius had to practically skip to keep up to him, but Remus was hardly paying attention. He counted the flat numbers as they went; F4, F5, F6—

Just as they were nearing a hallway corner, Sirius grabbed Remus by the front of his coat and pinned him to the wall.

"Watch it!" He hissed. "Laundry dead ahead."

They flattened themselves against the wall, and Remus peeked around the corner to find the laundry deliverer from earlier. He was standing in front of one of the flats—3F9.

He should've expected the smile when she answered. Sheila always smiled.

"Oh, Linus. Hello. Final round of the evening, is it?"

"Yes'm. Just get in yourself?"

"About a half hour ago, yes."

It was like hearing her again for the first time. Remus didn't know if he wanted her to hold him, or to scream in her face.

Stop that. Don't be kind—I hate you!

Outwardly she looked no different from the way she always did, and yet something was off. From his hiding spot, he forced himself to look past the vibrant purple dress, the polka dot tights, the golden butterfly clip in her hair. What he found was dullness and exhaustion. The bags under her eyes had darkened, and the faint stripes of grey at her temples had grown more pronounced. Beneath her colourful shell, it was as though she'd aged ten years in only a few short weeks. Still she smiled.

"Apologies for bothering you so late, Mrs. Buchanan, but I got that laundry you sent out before you left," said the delivery man as he began digging around in his cart. "Figured you'd be wanting them clean linens for when you got back."

"My, that's very thoughtful of you." She took the linens as he passed them to her, and afterwards, she handed him a small package wrapped in paper. "And, just before you go... This is for you. I thought you might enjoy it."

"For me?"

"Yes, I was digging around in some boxes back home, you know, trying to clear up the clutter? Anyway, it's just a little book on bird watching. Colin once got it into his head that he might pick it up as a hobby, but I'm afraid neither of us quite had the patience for it. I thought maybe you'd get better use out of it."

Linus peeled back the wrappings like a kid on Christmas. He softened once he'd gotten a look at the cover, and finally pulled off his cap.

"That's very kind 'a ya, m'um. And... Apologies for your loss. Your husband was a smart man, picking you for a wife."

She placed a hand on his shoulder, and Remus felt his own twitch.

"Thank you, Linus. You're very kind."

It was agony waiting for the man to move on, even more so to see her smile and wave—stop it, stop it, stop it! Your fault, your fault!—but then Linus rolled his cart out of the way and she finally looked up. He knew instantly that she had spotted them by the way her smile vanished.

There, Remus thought bitterly; You finally see me.

"Moons...?"

Sirius was prodding him gently on the back, but Remus couldn't see anything but her. He watched as she looked sadly down at the stack of linens she was holding and ran her hand across the soft lace. Then she nodded, and stepped away from the open door—disappearing back into her home. It was an invitation, Remus knew. And it scared him.

"I'm gonna go in," he mumbled, still staring at the flat's open door. Ever the brave one, Sirius nodded and began marching straight for it.

"Right. Let's go in then."

Remus caught his arm.

"Sirius, I-I love you, but... I think I..."

It didn't matter if he could hardly form a coherent sentence; as always, Sirius was reading his mind. "Hey," he whispered, reaching up to hold Remus' cheek; "Don't worry about me. I already had plans anyway. Gonna go see if Bilshin's itching for company. Heard he makes a mean cup of tea."

Remus chuffed, like a laugh that turned sad at the end, and Sirius, the liar, hugged him tightly.

"I'll be right here if you need me, Moons."

Remus held him for a long time, relishing in the comfort. Then he went to face his fears.

There was no missing the flat as hers; there was a coat rack stood by the door, draped in at least half a dozen patterned rain coats. On the wall hung a portrait of Duke Ellington, and every inch of the floor was covered in some eye-catching rug or other. There were stacks upon stacks of books, music sheets, and records piled everywhere—most of them jazz—and photographs sat strewn about in frames, though Remus tried hard not to look at them. Instead he stared at the boxes, an obvious addition to the room. Some were labelled*; kitchen, bath, bedroom...*

Colin's things.

Distantly he could hear the sound of her tinkering in the kitchen, and when she returned she was carrying two mugs of tea.

"Excuse the mess," she said. "I thought we might have tea while we talked."

"You mean you actually want to talk?"

"Don't you, Remus?"

He glared at her, but she was used to such things as angry children. Smiling meekly, she set the mugs of tea down on the coffee table, using a book on music theory for a coaster. She gestured to the sofa chair across from her, but Remus didn't trust himself enough to sit. Better to be uncomfortable; he had plenty of uncomfortable things to say.

"Do you want to tell me how you got in here?"

"Snuck in after the laundry guy."

"Hm. Clever thing," she hummed, stirring her tea. "And where has Mr. Black gone? I hope he's not out causing too much trouble."

"I'm not here to talk about Sirius," Remus snapped. "I'm here to talk about you. And me. 'Cause it's a related thing, isn't it?"

It was harsh, but no less than she deserved. With a slow sip, she swallowed and set down the tea cup.

"Would you like to sit?"

"No."

She sighed. "I understand why you're angry."

"No, you don't." Remus felt his lower lip begin to tremble. "Where were you—where did you go?"

"Glasgow. It's where our home was."

"Was...? You're back to stay for good then?"

“Mhm, yes. I love Hawkings, and I love teaching. I think I would miss it if I never came back.”

“So does this mean your husband…”

She nodded, hands folded tightly in her lap. “Colin’s passed away, yes. We had a service for him in early April. It was beautiful, but I needed to take some time.”

The sudden urge to lash out rose inside Remus. No one had ever given him time. “I don’t want to feel bad for you,” he said lowly.

“I understand.”

“I’m angry with you.”

“I… understand.”

“Furious, even. I hate you. There are so many things I want to say to you. Things that you… That you deserve!”

“You can say them. I promise not to be angry.”

He almost wished she was. At least if she were angry then they could shout at each other, be equals. As it was, he was still just the angry kid.

Your fault, your fault!

"Remus, I am sorry for everything I’ve—"

"SHUT UP!" He wailed, resisting the urge to slam his fist through the nearest pile of books. “You knew what you were doing! You put that photo there to fuck with my head, and you didn't even care! How long did you think it would take me to find it? A week? A YEAR?!"

"Remus..."

"You didn't even care!" He said again. "You left that photo in there hoping that by the time I found it, you'd already be long gone. That I'd be grown up and you wouldn't have to worry about taking responsibility anymore! Like some sick fucking fantasy!"

"No! No, never."

"Liar! You're a liar—in fact, you're worse than a liar! Because you couldn't even tell me the truth yourself! You... You're a coward, just like her. You let me find out that you're my fucking godmother and then you disappeared. But you—you were supposed to be better! I believed in you!"

As his voice began to shatter, Sheila's mouth parted in pain. She stood up from her chair and started towards him, but Remus only stepped away, too afraid to let her close. She stopped then, and covered her mouth to hide the shakiness in her voice

"Remus, what I-I did to you… was so indescribably wrong. You can't imagine how sorry I am."

"I don't care how sorry you are!" He swore, losing his patience and slamming his hands into the back of the sofa chair ahead of him. "You know Linus the bloody laundry driver better than you know me! But I was owed! You owed it to me—all of you! I don't care if you were in fucking Scotland with a sick husband—I could've used you! I might not have wanted you—probably would've hated you, but dammit—I could've used you. You're my godmother, it was your job to protect me and you threw it away! And now… Now people pity me… I have everything—a home, friends who love me—and yet I'm pitied because the people who were supposed to want me—didn't. And it's YOUR FAULT!"

"Oh, Remus—"

"No! Don't you 'oh Remus' me! Just tell the fucking truth! I'm eighteen! Tell me why you did it! Why you never told me who you really are—TELL ME!"

He was come apart all over again. Confronting her was more terrible than he could've ever imagined, but they were both in it now. It was obvious in the way Sheila covered her face—hiding the tears that had started trailing down her cheeks with her hands.

“I’m so sorry,” she pleaded, over and over again. “Sorry—so sorry. What I did—I’m so sorry, Remus…”

“Tell. Me.” He croaked. “Didn’t you… Didn’t you want me?”

“Yes,” she whimpered, “yes, oh yes. I swear, Remus, I wanted you from the first moment I held you in my arms. You were so precious, and I loved Hope more than anything. And then when I saw you in my classroom, I thought that maybe… but you..."

"But what?"

"You didn’t know who I was, Remus. I was a stranger to you, and for a while I thought it was for the best. You had your family, and I’d already promised your father I wouldn’t tell you anything.”

“You mean Tad didn’t want—”

“No.” Sheila shook her head sadly. “Not Tad. Tad—he... Oh Christ, we were so young. Hope, me—all of us. Just young and stupid. I’m sorry, Remus, but I haven’t spoken to Tad in years."

Remus felt his heart lurch, but it was what he’d suspected. “Lyall then.”

Sheila’s entire face creased into a horrible sob, and she dropped her head in shame. “Yes... it was Lyall. You see, when Colin and I met we were still in college. He was so brilliant back then, he could play anything under the sun. But he got in on scholarship, and his family was poor. So when I told my parents we were getting married they disowned me.”

“What does this have to do with me?”

“Everything,” she wept. “Colin was an aspiring musician in London, and I was just a simple school teacher. We had no money, and when he became ill and couldn't work anymore, I had to stay home and take care of him. I never resented it, never, but life can be cruel, Remus. We were drowning and Colin needed more than what I could give him. I went to your parents for help, but Hope wouldn’t see me. She was still so angry... Your father had to go behind her back to help us, and in the end he agreed to finance all Colin’s hospice care as long as I never tried to contact either of you again.”

“… Why?” He couldn’t think of anything else to say. He wished he’d listened to his gut and just run away.

“Because I knew about Tad, and he wanted you to be a Lupin. He wanted to keep his wife and son, no matter what.”

Suddenly Remus felt like he was drowning too. Couldn't get a breath in. His brain wouldn't shut up—I hate him! I hate him! I wish he was dead.

The thought was too much. He staggered, enough so that he had to grab onto one of the sofa chairs just to support himself. Immediately Sheila came forward, but Remus simply threw an arm out. “Don’t,” he hissed, before fisting the front of his shirt to help himself calm down. She flinched, but did not back away. Nor did she try to touch him again.

“Remus, you're right. I am a coward,” she said, with all the sadness of a thousand lonely nights; “I took the money your father offered and moved Colin and I back to Glasgow. I told myself it would be better for everyone. Hope would get better, as would Colin, and you would grow up loved.”

"Do you hear yourself?" He echoed. "Loved? No, all you did was keep more family from me. You kept yourself from me.”

Sheila nodded, unable to deny it. “I’m so sorry.”

“It's not enough, not by half. The world may not be fair but I deserved better, from all of you. So I want to know. I want to know why the two of you fought. You and Hope."

She stared at him, then her eyes fell to the floor.

"No more secrets," he said gravely. "If you lie to me now, I’ll know it, and I will never forgive you. Not for as long as I live.”

A beat passed between them, and Remus suddenly regretted ever sending Sirius away. It would've been easier to have him there to hear it, rather than have to say the words himself again later.

"Alright, I will tell you," Sheila said finally. "But first you have to sit down."

He wanted to say no, but couldn't find a good enough reason to throw it back in her face. He needed to know, and like her, he was tired.

"I need you to understand just how sick your mother was," Sheila started, once they were both sitting quietly across from one another. She thumbed her mug of tea anxiously, and often glanced at the photograph of a man sitting on the mantle. Remus didn't have to ask whether it was Colin or not.

"It was not a good situation for anyone, Remus, let alone a baby."

"I don't care what you thought about the 'situation', I want to know why the two of you fought. Why didn't I grow up knowing about you?"

She sighed. “Because I was the one who told Lyall she needed help.”

"... You?"

"Yes," she said grimly, wiping a few stray hairs from her face with shaky fingers. “Hope—she... She would have these breakdowns, just scream herself hoarse. It started about a year before you were born. Some days it was about Lyall, other days it was about Tad, some—nothing at all. She would just scream, Remus… And then you were born and for a while she seemed well again. She was so happy to hold you, hardly ever put you down. We thought it was over..."

"You're saying she was crazy?"

"No, not always. Most days were wonderful, you would've never known the difference. But then you were born, and she became fixated on you. She wouldn’t let anyone near you, not even Lyall. Then her outbursts got worse and I... Well, I told Lyall he should have her looked at, just for her own safety. At first they just chalked it up to pregnancy and mood swings, a traumatic after-birth. Later when the symptoms persisted the doctors started calling it, ‘severe mental depression’. It was rubbish of course, nobody really knew what that meant. They just stuffed her with medications, hoping something would fix it. When it didn't, the depression became ‘mania’. I didn’t want to believe it at first, but how could I not? One moment she was laughing and speaking to you clear as day, and the next she’s throwing herself down the bloody stairs—!”

She lapsed into silence for a moment, clutching her cup hard enough that her knuckles went white.

"I'm sorry... I didn't mean that. It's just... we were worried. We didn't want her to hurt herself, and it almost always became worse whenever you were involved. I didn’t want to believe she could actually hurt you, but one day, during one of my visits she was rocking you in your nursery. I got up to make us some tea and—and when I came back she was... She was trying to smother you in your crib. Oh Remus..." She shook her head, looking ragged. "That was the first time she was committed to the hospital. Lyall swore me to secrecy, he didn't want them to take you away from her. But Hope blamed me for telling him, and I couldn't even argue. But she was so sick, Remus, I swear."

He knew she was telling the truth. Even now, at eighteen, Remus could still remember the weeks his mother used to go on her 'holidays'. She'd be gone and no one could tell him what it was she'd left him for, and whenever she returned she'd always felt... empty, somehow. Like she wasn't really there. She could see him, hear him, but she wasn't the mum he knew.

"Your mother deserved better than those doctors," Sheila told him. "She was a good girl. And she loved you, she... She just needed more help."

"Did you know then that Tad was my real father?" Don't lie, don't lie. "Did she tell you?"

Sheila shook her head. "I knew the two of them were having an affair and that she was probably in love with him, but I think things changed when she found out she was pregnant. She was probably very scared, Remus."

"Scared enough not to tell her best friend the truth?"

She shrugged, sadly. "She wanted her baby to grow up with a father."

"No, she wanted her lover! She was always changing her mind. I remember how she used to follow him around like a lost fucking puppy, she didn't care!"

"She cared, I know it. We're all just selfish in love."

He was still angry, and he didn't want her words to bother him, but they did. Remus knew exactly what it was to be selfish. His selfishness had almost doomed him and Sirius from the start; it'd never solved anything. When he was in love, only one thing had ever helped.

Remus raised his head.

"I don't know if I'll ever be able to forgive you, but I'm glad you told me the truth."

"I am too," she said. "You are so brave, and I swear, Remus, I will never lie to you again. You deserve better, just like your mum did. And if you'd let me, I would like to be in your life. Even if it's just as your music teacher."

And so, Remus Lupin was at a crossroads. He could go right, and live unhindered by the past he so resented, free from any bonds made by so-called family. Or he could go left, and begin his trek through poisonous jungles of hurt and anger and resentment all while not knowing if it'd even be worth it in the end. Those were the choices; go right, alone, or left, with her. It almost seemed like an easy solution for someone who'd never put much stock into any adult, but she'd said she wanted him. And in the end that's all anyone could really hope for.

"I can't forgive you for what you did," he said, "but I don't want you to go. I want you in my life, if you're willing."

The look on Sheila's face was like blue skies after a month of rain. "Oh," she sobbed, "yes. Yes, please. I would like that very much."

"No more second chances though. I... I can't do it again."

"I know. I swear it."

He nodded, and then noticed a ticking on his cheek. Reaching up, he touched his fingers to his face only to have them come away wet. It scared him slightly to wonder how long he'd been crying, and whether his tears had influenced her decision. That thought—that one—was the one that broke the camel's back.

He began to cry, for his mother, but also for himself, and as he wept she came to him. She held him, and he did not push her away.

“I love you, Remus,” she whispered. "You are so loved."

They clung to each other for a long time, and through it all Remus was reminded of Mrs. Potter, and how it'd felt to be held by her. A motherly rock, a gentle hand over the forehead. Perhaps Sheila hadn't had as much practice, but there was time. There was always time.

When the tears had ebbed, Sheila released him and crouched by the foot of the chair. "You're okay," she told him, "You're okay."

He nodded, feeling like a used tissue, and using her thumbs, she wiped the tears from his cheeks as they both sucked back several sniffles.

“Guess this means we’re family,” he croaked.

“Guess so,” she answered.

“I don’t know a thing about you,” Remus confessed. “I mean, I know you like music and have questionable taste in fashion, but… not much else.”

She beamed; in all her beloved kindness. “How about we start with something small then?"

"Like what?"

"Like... I hate parsnips. I love tomatoes. And my favourite colour is orange, like a sunset. Now you go.”

"I... I like sweet things."

"Oh yes, I knew that."

"Yeah, and—uhm, I don't really like mushrooms."

She stuck her tongue out. "They're just fungus anyway. And your favourite colour?"

“Blue.”

“What sort of blue?"

Remus thought. Sirius, Sirius.

"A very specific kind."

* * *

He had waited for him. Of course he had. The dear idiot.

He’d fallen asleep on the bench in the hallway, head tilted back against the cinder brick wall. Remus bent down in front of him to wake him, and gently squeezed Sirius’ shoulder until he’d jolted awake.

"Ngh—I'm not out of bounds!"

“It's me.”

"Moons...?" Sirius wiped his eyes. "Shit... didn't mean to fall asleep."

"Surprised you could, what with all my shouting."

"You were shouting?" He sounded concerned.

"Only a little."

Sirius peered at him. Then he brought his hands up and gently traced beneath Remus' eyes with the soft pads of his thumbs. “You’ve been crying.”

“Yeah,” Remus said honestly. “I was sad.”

“Are you still sad?”

“A little. But I’m glad I did it.” Leaning in, Remus pressed his mouth to Sirius’, who kissed him back. Slowly their lips parted, but rather than coming apart, they simply dissolved into a tight hug. Sirius slipped down from his bench so they could be even closer, straddling him and wrapping his arms tightly around Remus’ neck.

“M'proud of you,” he murmured, as Remus’ shoulders began to tremble.

They held each other like that for a while, uncaring if anyone were around to see it. But it was late anyway, and when Sirius finally peeled himself away, Remus had no tears left in the bucket.

“Come on then, let’s get you home," Sirius said, picking him up off the floor. "I think a nice, soothing bath is in order."

“Sorry for making you take care of me all the time,” Remus mumbled.

“Don’t be stupid. We take care of each other.”

Despite the late hour, James was waiting for them back at the dorm. He glanced up from his A-Levels text and smiled hopefully, but Remus only had enough energy left to collapse down onto his bed.

“Where’s Pete?” Sirius asked cooly.

James’ smile faded. “Just needs some time, I think. You two proper spooked him, doing it the way you did.”

“I’m sorry our relationship is so shocking, but he’s the one who ran off."

"Sirius, do we have to do this now?" Remus asked. Sirius glanced at him and shook his head.

"Sorry."

Across the room, James sat up on his bed. "I didn’t know you'd told Mary and Lottie."

"Potter, Moony's asked for quiet."

"But you should've said something, don't you think?" James reasoned. "Even just helped him understand a bit more, instead of laughing at him. I mean, hell, I was shocked when you told me—not that I have an issue with it or anything... But you didn't think he'd be upset to be the last to know out of everyone? Wouldn't you be upset?"

"That has nothing to do with any of this," Sirius said staunchly. "It's not as if we planned the order on purpose. Mary was by accident. Lottie figured it out on her own. It's not our fault Pete's too thick—”

"Don't be a twat, Padfoot!"

The shout was so sudden, especially for James. Probably very unused to it, Sirius peeled off his coat and marched into the toilet. Remus watched him go and sighed, thinking about how he could really use a month-long nap.

“I didn't mean to shout," James said, guiltily thumbing his textbook.

"I know, Prongs."

"I'm just worried. I agreed on this band stuff so that we could stay together, but if this is how it's gonna be, I don't think we'll last."

Remus' stomach sank like a heavy stone. "You're probably right..."

"You don’t have to explain yourselves to me," James called. "But will you at least talk to him? For me?”

“Sure, Prongs."

James' shoulders seeped with relief and smiled at him again. “How were things with Buchanan? Did you sort it?”

“Mostly. I promise to tell you everything later.”

He nodded in understanding. “Okay, Moons.”

Trying not to appear sheepish, Remus kicked off his boots and followed Sirius into the bathroom. He hadn't locked it, and when he strode inside he found Sirius already filling the tub, muttering darkly to himself;

"Acting like he's the one who's been wronged… little rat…" Sirius straightened up when he saw him, and turned around with a hand to his forehead. "I'm sorry," he muttered, "you've already had a shit night and here I am going off."

"Wasn't all shit," Remus shrugged, and then gestured to the tub. "May I?"

"Huh? Oh. Yeah, drew it for you."

"Will you stay with me too?"

Sirius didn't need any more asking than that. Quickly he stripped himself down and crawled into the tub, spinning around in the old porcelain tub to hold a hand out to Remus. "Here. Think I'm gonna hold you today."

Oh, yes please.

Remus didn't feel the least bit shy as he peeled out of his clothes and slipped one leg over the edge of the tub, followed by the other. Both he and Sirius knew what the other looked like on the inside, down to their very bones, and that was ten times uglier than whatever could be found on the surface anyway. Against his back, he could feel the rough shape of the burn scars that laced across Sirius' chest. He was growing out of them just as the doctors said he would, but it was still slow going. Good thing Remus adored every part of him, even the sad ones. Inside the bath, the water was warm, but Sirius was by far the warmest part. Remus' legs stuck out the other end by a good half, but he couldn't be bothered to complain as Sirius hugged him from behind and pressed small kisses along his hairline.

"Bit ironic, isn't it?" Remus murmured.

"Mm..." Kiss, kiss. "What's ironic?"

"My life. Shit's like a fucking kitchen sink drama. Dunno where all the nonsense comes from."

"You mean that's just occurring to you now?"

Remus smiled, reaching up and pulling one of Sirius' hands to his mouth to kiss. "I don't think I can ever be without you now, you know."

"You won't be."

"Ever? You swear you won't go anywhere?"

"Never. You're stuck with me, Moons. I'm like gum on the bottom of your shoe. Handsome gum."

Remus kissed his hand again. "Tell me we're gonna fix things with Peter. I really want this—all of us, in London, together."

Sirius exhaled and Remus felt it tickle the back of his neck.

"Fine, alright. If he's willing to come around, I will too... Of course I will. Can't risk losing James, I think I've come to like Wormtail's stubborn push-back. Who knows, might win us a Grammy one day."

Remus chuckled, dipping further under the water, while Sirius leaned over him and smirked.

"What? You think we can't do it?"

"If there's anyone who can do it, it's you, Sirius."

Sirius gave a low hum and buried his face in the crook of Remus' neck. "Not on my own… Need my Moony, don't I? After all, you're our good luck charm."

Remus shivered. "How do you do that, Sirius Black? Make me feel so good when all I want is to feel bad?"

Sirius lifted his face to whisper into his ear.

"Magic."

Chapter End Notes

Shorter chapter than we're used to, but luckily I have a little treat for you all. Mwah!

Chapter 93: Stayin' Alive... Stayin' Alive...

Chapter Summary

Oooh, the girls are fighting... hehe. I love arguing :^)

Chapter Notes

CW: Alcohol and drunken shenanigans, including a brief cheeky bit in a broom cupboard. (These boys have no idea of the meaning of 'subtlety'.) If sex talk isn't your thing, pay attention to the '> > >' and '< < <' to skip over it.

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Everyday, it's a-gettin' closer,
Goin' faster than a roller coaster;
Love like yours will surely come my way,
A-hey, a-hey, hey;
Love like yours will surely come my way...

- "Everyday" Buddy Holly, 1957

Remus had forgotten what it was like to have a mother. He'd witnessed bits of it, through Effie and Mrs. Pettigrew—even a few of the more overbearing ladies in the estate's kitchens—but Sheila was something else entirely. It wasn't as though she was suddenly bursting into his room every Sunday morning, screeching for the laundry or pestering him about how a cup of coffee did not qualify as a meal in itself. (He had James for that.) Rather, she told him things. Gave him her opinion, offered advice, shared memories from when she was a girl. Memories of himself, and his family. Before it had irked him, knowing that a stranger might remember more of his own past than he did, but Sheila wasn't a stranger.

She was something else.

He wasn't sure he'd ever be able to forgive her for walking away during the penultimate years of his life, but maybe he didn't have to. Maybe it was enough just to let her in at all.

“I think you should be glad to be named Remus," she'd told him once. "You were almost Rodney.”

“And then on your first Halloween, Hope dressed you up like a little dalmatian," came another; "A bit on the nose, maybe, but the photos she sent of you with the dogs were so cute.”

“The first time you met your grandmother you spit up right in her face. Hope and I laughed for hours. She really was a nasty woman, that Alys Howell. You're lucky, Hope was nothing like her.”

Every memory, Remus drank in desperately. It was as though he’d lived his entire life on a desert island, and was only now just getting his first taste of water.

“Do you remember the first song you ever heard, Remus?” Sheila asked.

He shook his head.

“I do. I was there actually. But of course you wouldn't remember... it was the first time you and I had ever met, after all. Hope had just brought you home from the hospital. Such a tiny thing—Lyall barely had you through the doors by the time I came whipping up the road. But I was so excited. I'd made your mother promise that I could play you your first ever song."

"You?" Remus echoed. "You played me my first song?"

"Not myself," she laughed; "Doubt I could've gotten through a single verse on my own, no matter the instrument. I'd already mucked up the whole thing, you see. When I arrived at the house, I'd meant to play you a Bobby Darin record, only I was so nervous that I'd grabbed Bobby Day instead. Not that it mattered much, you loved it. I can remember the way your pudgy little face just lit up! I swore up and down that you'd be a music lover, and you proved me right straight away. Playing that record was the only thing that could get you to sleep. I'm almost sure that Lyall and Hope were cursing me to my back —they must've had 'Rockin' Robin' stuck in their heads for months."

It was amazing. Like a golden ticket—the perfect flick of ash off the end of a cigarette. As long as she had it in her to keep going, Remus would listen.

"Hope and I would sing to you for hours, you know,” Sheila said proudly that same evening, after he’d finished the day's lessons and snuck away to her office for the fourth time that week. It wasn't a secret where it was going, but Sirius and James knew better than to try and tag along. Remus needed this, even if hearing some of her stories made the knots in the pit of his stomach twist uncomfortably; he wanted to know.

"Your mother had decent enough taste when it came to music," Sheila went on; "Though, it was all thanks to me, of course."

"Yeah?"

She nodded, smiling. “But not everyone's perfect. Did you know that when we were growing up, all she would listen to was American pop music? Yes, she was convinced she was going to turn eighteen, move to California, and marry Guy Mitchell—kept a poster up in her room that she’d kiss goodnight and everything. Personally, I didn't get the appeal. He was so soppy.”

“I’ve never even heard of him,” Remus smiled, eager for more.

“He was a bit before your time, I think. Though I should have one of his albums around here somewhere...” Popping up from her desk chair, Sheila began digging through the many storage boxes that lined the office walls while Remus sat back with his tea, occasionally munching on the biscuits she’d set out for them.

“Ah! Found it!”

Practically tossing the record sleeve over her shoulder, she set the vinyl disc up on the turntable that took up most of the space in the office’s tiny corner. He listened earnestly at first, but there was no arguing that Sheila was right, it was soppy.

‘My heart cries for you,
Sighs for you, dies for you;
And my arms long for you,
Please come back to me…’

“She never told me it was this bad,” Remus said. “She always said she grew up on rock and skiffle. Like Chuck Berry and the Beatles.”

“Ha! As if... No, Hope was a good girl. Our parents would’ve had our guts for garters had they known we were listening to that stuff. Besides, by the time we’d left school John Lennon and Paul McCartney were still playing their banjos around Liverpool as the Quarrymen." Pausing to sip her tea, Sheila promptly ripped Guy Mitchell up from the turntable mid-wallow and tossed the entire record lazily over one shoulder to join its sleeve on the floor.

"Now this," she said, setting down the teacup; "was my American standard."

Pulling out a simple little 45 LP, Sheila handed him the sleeve and set the record up to play. Remus turned the cover over in his hands.

"Little Richard?"

"Oh yes," she grinned, "they don't call him the 'architect of rock and roll' for nothing."

'Gonna tell Aunt Mary 'bout Uncle John!
He claims he has the misery,
But he havin' a lot of fun!
Oh, baby, yeah, baby!
Whoooo! Baby, havin' me some fun tonight, yeah!'

As the song continued to play, Sheila strolled back to her chair and sat. "Little Richard inspired the Beatles, right. They even covered this song ten years later. Can you imagine—inspiring the Beatles? I don't like giving those Yanks all the credit, but they did have some good'uns."

"Does that mean you don't like Elvis?"

"Pfft. Elvis—overrated." She winked at him, then pointed to the LP's sleeve. "You can keep that if you'd like, and the Guy Mitchell. That is, if you can find it..." Raising her hands hopelessly, she glanced around the cluttered office, which was still perfectly curated in its own chaos. Not that Remus minded. He polished off his tea while glancing over the LP's b-side, and when Little Richard's song ended Sheila flipped the record and went to fix him a second cup, humming the tune under her breath. Watching her, Remus began fidgeting.

"You've probably already heard about the band… o-or, our band..."

"Oh, you mean 'The Marauders'? Yes, I think Mr. Black has filled me in once or twice."

Damn you, Sirius.

"It's just 'Marauders' actually..." Remus cleared his throat. “We—uhm… We’re all gonna move back to London after school’s done. Live in a flat and see if we can actually do something with it—the band, that is..."

“Really?” Sheila’s eyes seemed to twinkle. “That’s wonderful, I hope I’ll get to see you in a show some day. Maybe at Wembley, hey?”

"Wembley? Are you joking?"

"Oh, c'mon, Remus. It's Wembley, not the moon."

This made Remus awfully embarrassed. Wembley Stadium might as well have been on the moon. Aiming to play there was like fetching a bingo card and expecting to win the lotto; a one in a million shot. Even with all four of their luck combined, it was statistically impossible. Still, it felt rather good to hear Sheila say it.

"We’re actually looking to record some of our own stuff," he boasted meekly. "Sirius writes a bit, and I—well, we'd like to put together a demo. Just don’t have the proper equipment for it yet.”

"Well, I’m sure I could dig something up around here if you’d like. Or there's the radio room! There must be something in there.”

Remus picked at his thumbnail, before letting out a long sigh. "Aren’t you going to tell me that it’s absolutely mental?”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean—us. Thinking that out of everyone who has this exact same dream—that we could make it.”

Humming thoughtfully, Sheila lifted a biscuit to her lips and took a bite. Then she crossed her arms, and shrugged very simply.

“Why not you?"

It stumped him for a moment, but then Remus remembered who he was. Why not him.

“Look at me," he said, "I’m not exactly John Lennon."

"Of course not. You're much more handsome."

"No! I mean, I can't do that. I can't inspire people... I'm only me. And you!? Shouldn't you be telling me that I should pick something more useful? A career that actually has a chance of making me a living wage?"

"Why would I ever tell you that?"

"I dunno, because you're the adult? The sensible one?"

She squinted at him and Remus felt his heart lurch. He quickly reigned the feeling in as she polished off the biscuit and dusted her hands, all the while looking him straight in the eye.

"Remus, I have lived my life being entirely too sensible, and you know what it's gotten me?"

"A roof over your head and a stable career?"

"Bored."

She winked again.

"Be a dreamer, Remus. I think you'll find that they have more fun."

It felt heavy, almost reminiscent of a conversation he and Lyall had had ages ago; but still different, enough so that he shied a bit, peering down at his shoes. Not that Sheila was ever much deterred by shyness. Still smiling, she reached across the table with the plate of fudge biscuits and offered him another as her show of support. Remus accepted with a simple nod, and though her confidence in him hadn't served as some awe-inspiring moment of clarity, it did strike him then just how much he was going to miss her.

* * *

Friday 5th May 1978

With April officially come and gone, the only thing left for the Marauders to worry about was their end-of-term exams. Or, that was how things should've been. Remus was still picking bits of flour off of his jumpers, but that was nothing compared to the silent war that had been raging in their bedroom for over a week. Peter was still reasonably angry with them, and any attempt to talk to him had so far ended in a cold shoulder or rapid-fire shouting match. It made James uncomfortable, though not uncomfortable enough to pick a side.

"You three have to sort this out between yourselves," he'd said, "I'm not your mother."

It seemed a bit ironic that he'd chosen now to rein in his motherly tendencies, but Remus kept the thought to himself for fear of losing yet another friend. Without a drummer, all Marauders' band practices had been drawn to an immediate halt, and anytime Sirius suggested the three of them go it alone, James would make the excuse of having to meet Lily and the girls for study. This made for long hours in the library and a generally sour-Sirius, not that he wasn't also in attendance. The self-proclaimed 'King of Self-Study', ran the risk of having Lily bludgeon him with one of her textbooks every time he tagged along, and had eventually resorted to bringing a pillow with him just to catch up on his sleep. This lasted for about two days.

“This is such shite," Sirius complained over a yawn. "It's a Friday, and we've been here for hours! You can't possibly fit any more knowledge into those fat heads."

"Why don't you go back to sleep, you arse?" Marlene offered, already sporting deep purple bags beneath her eyes. Sirius might've, had Ms. Pince not confiscated his pillow that same morning. He'd already resorted to using James’ collection of textbooks as a pillow instead, which was proving annoying for James, who was forced to trade him books every time he switched subjects.

“A-Levels are important. Even for someone like you,” Lily said, not even looking up from her notes. It was no question who the 'you' was for, but Sirius only yawned again.

“Why? It’s not like I have any plans to go to uni. Honestly, I could probably skive them off altogether. I’d still pass.”

Lily pointed her pencil at him threateningly. “Throwing your marks simply because you ‘can’t be bothered’ might just be the worst show of slothfulness you’ve ever achieved, Sirius Black.”

Sirius rolled his head up, so he was just resting on his chin on the texts. “Ah, but you see, that in itself is still an ‘achievement’.”

Lily threw the pencil.

“Just wait until tomorrow,” James told Sirius. “It’s the FA Cup. Can’t study when the game's on!"

"Oh yeah," Marlene started. "Ain't your team in the finals this year, Potter?"

James held up a triumphant fist. "Arsenal's gonna bring home the championship this year, I can feel it!"

"Exams start on the fifteenth, you know," Lily cautioned.

"Aw c'mon, Lils," Marlene reasoned light-heartedly, "it's one day."

"And we'll study on Sunday!" James added. "The whole day if we have to!"

"O' please, madam slave-driver!" Sirius begged, clasping his hands together. "Please let these poor sods off for a single day to watch James' favourite team suffer a crushing defeat to the likes of Ipswich Town."

While James frowned, Lily only rolled her eyes. "I'm only looking out for your marks. Don't blame me when you fail."

"I thought we weren't supposed to say the 'f' word around you," Mary said, appearing behind them with the books she'd gone to fetch. "I see Peter's sitting with Moira again..."

The rest of them all turned as a group to look, and spotted Peter sitting with another swath of students, Moira among them.

"Sorry git—wonder if he thinks he's traded up," Sirius grumbled, clearly irritated. "Sleeps in our room, uses our toilet, but spends every waking moment with that broad. Who knows what he's told her."

"She is his girlfriend," Lottie chimed in, sorting through a swath of Spanish notes.

"And we're his friends—have been long before Thurnberg came around. What about loyalty?"

"Easy for you to say, the three of you are dating your best friends."

Sirius and Remus shared a silent glance, as did James and Lily.

"Has he... said anything to you, Lottie?" Asked James.

"No, and even if he had, I wouldn't tell you. You were supposed to talk to him yourselves."

“We tried!" Sirius interjected. "Tosser just sticks his nose up and walks out. Won’t give me or Moony a chance.”

“Is it the gay thing?" Mary asked quietly. "Is he being prejudiced?"

Remus shook his head. “Well, he hasn’t said anything distinctly… prejudiced. Hasn’t said anything at all, really.”

“Not true,” Sirius said, “yesterday he told me to pick up my ‘bloody socks’. Coming from him, it almost felt like character development.”

No one seemed to find the joke funny, and a staggered silence descended over the group, the kind that made it impossible to make eye contact with anyone. It was Marlene who finally broke it, folding her book shut and looking directly at Remus.

“Don’t worry about Peter, he’s just pissed off that you didn’t tell him.”

“No, he’s pissed he’s the last to know,” Lottie cut-in, coming to her brother’s defence with more vigour than before. “I don’t care if half of you are bent nine ways from Sunday—but just imagine how it would feel to be the last friend to know something like that.”

Marlene leaned in, whispering harshly to keep from being overheard by other tables; “Newsflash, Lot, Peter doesn’t get to be pissed over ‘something like that’—none of you do. People don’t just owe you an explanation, especially not about something so sensitive. You have no inherent right to anybody’s love, I don't care how long you've been friends.”

Lottie frowned, her nostrils flaring as though she were losing steam. “Big talk from someone who got to know first. Since when are you such an expert?”

“I just am.”

“Really? ‘Cause last I heard you had a cat down there, not a knob.”

“You hardly need a knob if you’re only interested in other cat, Lottie!”

Remus’ eyes shot wide in surprise. And he was not the only one. As soon as the secret was out, Lottie squeaked and Marlene’s hand flew to her mouth—the realisation of what she’d just said written all over both of their faces.

"Oh shit..."

"I think you mean—oh shit!" Sirius said, earning him a sharp shushing from the next table over. "Oh bite me," he hissed, before lowering his voice. "But seriously, colour me impressed, McKinnon. Never knew you had it in you to be so bold."

“Marls,” Lily breathed at the other end of the table, “you mean you’re actually—”

“I KNEW IT!” James cried, jumping up from his chair in one big whoop. The reaction was enough to draw attention from every neighbouring table, turning poor Marlene's face into a tomato. James sat back down before Ms. Pince could reappear and beat him with Sirius’ pillow, but it did not deter his enthusiasm.

"I knew it! I knew it!" He whispered keenly, while Lily gaped at him.

“What?! What do you mean you knew?”

“Okay, so I didn’t know-know, but I guessed!" He turned to Marlene. "You're so much tougher on the guys when we're practising. Most of the time you look at them like they're disgusting."

"That's 'cause they are disgusting!"

"Sounds like something a lesbian would say," Mary giggled.

Marlene was absolutely horror-stricken. “Potter, how could you… I mean—you?! Oh my fuck—how many others know?!”

James shook his head. “None, as far as I figure. I just know what it looks like, s’all.”

“What what looks like, James Potter?!”

“Oh, you know…” he glanced at Lily coyly, “love.”

“Eugh—gross, avert your eyes,” Sirius said, putting an arm around Marlene.

“I’m so embarrassed,” she moaned, pressing her face into her palms.

“Oh Marlene, don’t be!” Lily insisted.

“Yeah, s’nothing to be embarrassed about,” James said kindly. “Though, I can’t believe I guessed it before you, Daisy. I mean, you do live together after all."

"Oh yeah? Shall I remind you of the two flaming hearts living in your room?"

Remus scoffed; "Flaming?"

More than a little red-faced herself, Lottie cleared her throat. "Well, I'm… sorry... I think? Or did I just do you a favour? Hm... Really, I'm not all that surprised—oh, don't gimme that face, Marls. Lily might be thick but I also know what love looks like. Happy for you, really. I mean, girls are so much nicer to look at. I find myself staring at them all the time." She gave a little gasp. "Does that make me a lesbian?"

"It-absolutely-fucking-does-NOT!" Marlene hissed.

Lottie shrugged, in that blasé attitude of hers, and turned to James.

"Say something to my brother," she said, suddenly serious. "I know he's a bit of a cunt, but he's my cunt, so don't just leave him behind, Potter. No matter how tempting."

"Of course not," James said firmly. "We're Marauders. All for one, and one for all, since the very beginning. Just wait, soon we'll all be shacked up in a place of our very own. No teachers, no parents—only the bobbies to stop us."

"And me, wild child," Lily said, leaning in to kiss her boyfriend fondly.

Again, Remus looked to Sirius, taking his hand beneath the table. He didn't fancy apologising, but the situation was so messy, and James wouldn't ever be alright with leaving one of them behind. That alone could possibly spell the end of their little dream before it'd even begun. The two of them couldn't do it on their own—it'd break Sirius not to have his best friend with him.

He just hoped James was right.

The next day, half of Godric found itself crowded around a single small telly in the common room to watch the sports broadcast. Remus and Lily took up a comfy spot near the back of the room and curled up beneath a single blanket, more content to watch the excitement on their friends' faces than the game itself. James and Sirius sat near the front, crowded in with Marlene and totally engrossed with every move the tiny players on the screen made. Mary was squeezed in among them too, but she'd already given up watching and had resorted to braiding and unbraiding the longest bits of Marlene's hair, pausing every so often to flip through a magazine she must've read cover-to-cover at least a dozen times already.

"I'm really going to miss this," Lily said, after Ipswich Town had scored its first goal and the room erupted into equal parts cheering and booing.

"You mean being here?" Remus reached around and readjusted the blanket, which had slipped down from her shoulder.

"Yeah… it's like home."

Across the room, several boys gave a frustrated cry, James the loudest among them.

"Bloody O'Leary—c'mon! Get a leg on, mate!"

"Fat chance, Potter! O'Leary's got rubber for legs!"

"Oh? So you've got something in common then?"

"I get what you mean," Remus said, amongst all the laughter cheering; "I'm almost afraid I'll miss it."

"Right? I don't even remember what it's like to have my own room. How am I ever going to sleep without Mary's 'purring'?"

"You'll have James. Though he sounds more like a chainsaw."

Lily giggled, her cheek pressed against his arm. "Think we'll ever come back here?"

"Maybe. Life's strange like that. When I first got here, all I wanted was to leave."

"And now?"

"And now—"

"AHH! Did you see that? Did you see that?! Brady almost scored!"

" 'Almost' doesn't win a championship! Now sit down!"

"AUGH!"

Remus smiled. “And now I don’t think I want to leave.”

“Maybe you won’t,” Lily said, scrunching up her nose playfully; “Maybe McGonagall will offer you a job teaching music to the primaries. We could call you ‘Mr. Lupin’—or even better, ‘Professor Lupin’!”

“You’re silly, Lily.”

She beamed. “My dad used to say that to me. It’ll be nice to see him before we all go to London. And then… gosh—we’ll be in London! Bit exciting, isn’t it, Remus?”

“FOUL! Foul on Nelson!”

“That wasn't ‘a foul! Fuckin’ hell, ref! Are you bloody blind?!”

Remus hugged her close. “Yeah. Very exciting.”

In the end, Arsenal lost 0 to 1. Despite his obvious disappointment, James did manage to put on a brave face. As the telly began showing adverts for toothpaste and Benson & Hedges cigarettes, all of his teammates surrounded him in a big circle, offering heavy thumps on the back as consolation and ragging on him for his team’s defeat.

“Don’t worry about it, mate,” one of the lads teased; “one day when you’re playing for Arsenal, they’ll at least have a chance at getting a single goal!”

James laughed it off, but if he corrected his friend about his career-trajectory, it was swallowed by the noisy roar of the room.

“C’mon Potter, let’s have a few drinks!” Sirius cried. “There ain’t nothing like drowning a loss in some good ol’ fashioned hooch!”

There was a screaming rally of agreement, and Lily thumped her fist on the side of the sofa.

“That git, they agreed we’d be up early to study! He planned this.”

“Definitely,” Remus said, already thinking back to where he’d hidden that bottle of whisky.

It didn’t take long for word to spread about the impromptu party at Godric, and eventually alcohol and other illicits began to come out in droves. Never a Marauders party without it, Remus and Sirius dragged the stereo down from their room along with an entire milk crate of records, and by nightfall the common room was full with entirely too much irresponsible bouncing and bobbing. What with the carefully curated list of records he'd supplied, Remus had expected to spend the night in a head-thrashing roar, except that someone had found the single Elton John record and put that on instead.

'Oh, your sister can't twist but she can rock and roll!
Out bucks the broncos in the rodeo-do!
She's only sixteen but it's plain to see—
She can pull the wool over little old me!'

Sirius scowled at the stereo from across the room. He had somehow climbed up onto one of the common room's windows and was teetering dangerously off the edge. "Hey, Moony. Can your sister twist?" He drawled, already severely inebriated.

"I don't have a sister, you thick-head!" Remus shouted, just to be heard over the noise. "Now get down from there!"

"Maybe you do!" Sirius shouted back, swatting at the hands Remus raised toward him. "Who knows what Tad-the-dad's been up to! Maybe you've just never met her!"

"Then how would I know if she could twist?"

Sirius cackled. "Good point!" Then with a delightful cry, he launched himself off the window rim, forcing Remus to catch him awkwardly and sprawl back on the common room floor. There were several hoots of praise from nearby kids, but when Remus sat up, Sirius was straddling him.

"Can you twist, Moony?" He whispered cunningly.

"No," Remus grunted.

"Shall we give it a try?"

With a sharp scratch the song had changed and a few moments later, Mary swung her head down to interrupt. "If you're quite done rolling your tongue in Remus' ear, we would like a dance."

Remus looked up. Marlene and Lottie were standing behind him, arms crossed and looking devious. Clearly the two had made up from their spat in the library the day before, just in time to torture him with—oh god—disco.

‘Whether you’re a brother or whether you’re a mother—
You’re stayin’ alive, stayin’ alive;
Feel the city breakin’ and everybody shakin’—
And we’re stayin’ alive, stayin’ alive—’

“Take him!” Remus said, throwing Sirius to the wolves and scrambling up. Too bad for him, he was equally as sloshed, and the moment he got his legs beneath him Marlene and Lottie were there, grabbing his arm and turning him for the middle of the common room, where a boogie circle had unceremoniously started.

“Mercy, please mercy,” Remus begged as the girls pulled and prodded, tossing them back and forth between themselves like props rather than dance partners. Despite his eternal devotion to rock and roll, Sirius had no problem joining in. He dropped his weight into his knees and swung Mary around with all of his Saturday night fervor, laughing at Remus and singing along.

“C’mon Moons, it’s all in the hips! ‘Ah, ha, ha, ha, stayin’ alive, stayin’ alive—Ah, ha, ha, ha, stayin’ alive—!’ ”

“This is torture,” Remus said to Marlene, when she got in close and slid a hand up the centre of his chest.

Marlene grinned at him. “Is Sirius watching?”

“Of course he’s watching.”

“And Mary?”

Remus looked over her shoulder. Mary may have been dancing with Sirius, but she only had eyes for Marlene.

"I don't care if she's straight, Remus," she called, "just as long as she's looking at me when it counts."

“You’re so sly,” he smirked.

Marlene only winked at him, and giving a light laugh, Remus took her arm and spun her. Maybe disco was good for something after all.

‘Well, you can tell by the way I use my walk,
I’m a woman’s man, no time to talk;
Music loud and women warm,
I’ve been kicked around since I was born;

And now it’s all right, it’s okay,
And you may look the other way;
We can try to understand,
The New York Times’ effect on man…!’

> > >

Remus loved music. He loved Sirius too, but music was his way to Sirius. For example, Elton John had gotten Sirius to dive onto him in front of a crowd of people, but the Bee Gees had gotten them alone in the broom cupboard. It was like Halloween all over again, only this time the music was loud enough that not even Remus was worried about being overheard. They grappled together in the dark, ridding each other of their shirts and fighting against stubborn belt buckles.

“Moony,” Sirius groaned, desperately.

“Ngh—Uh-huh.”

Their hands were in each other’s trousers, and they rutted desperately against each other so desperately Remus almost forgot to breathe. He could feel Sirius’ thigh against the inside of his own and the warmth of his lips against his neck as he crowded him against the wall. A broom rattled as they knocked it over, then came a short gurgle as a bottle of floor polish was pitched off the shelf to their right. A lemony scent invaded Remus’ nostrils as it spilled somewhere along the floor, but neither of them could be bothered to stop and do anything about it.

“Moony, I’m gonna—”

“Uh-huh!”

They kissed, deeply, and Remus’ moaned straight into Sirius’ mouth as everything that had been building between them came apart all at once. A few seconds later Sirius followed him over the edge, creating a noise Remus wanted to pluck from the air and bottle forever. As their grip slackened and they slumped against one another, Remus busied himself by sucking a light bruise along the ridge of his boyfriend’s collarbone, stopping only to breathe again. Humming contentedly deep in his throat, Sirius began by peppering his jaw with several more tongue-in-cheek kisses.

“I love how articulate you become when we shag,” he taunted.

“Yeah? And all you said was my name,” Remus panted into his shoulder.

“Of course. It’s my favourite word. ‘Moony’. So stupidly sexy—or sexily stupid.”

Remus pulled back, drunk. “You’re sexily stupid.”

“Thank you. Shall I wank you off again now?”

He kissed him just to shut him up, and when Remus began itching for a second go, Sirius didn’t seem opposed at all.

<<<

After digging around in the dark for their shirts, Remus peeked out into the hall and deemed it empty enough to emerge together. It was clear by the rowdy music that the party was still going on full-swing in the common room, which meant the night must still be young. Enough time to get another two or three drinks in.

“It is a mighty convenient place to shack up. So many towels,” Sirius said, tossing one of the rags in question over his shoulder with a self-satisfied look. He shut the cupboard door after himself, and Remus sent up a silent prayer for the next boy who went looking for a spare pillowcase.

Pressing his cool knuckles against the warmth of his cheeks, Remus followed Sirius down the hall to the common room foyer, where kids were streaming in and out of the front door, a cloud of smoke and haze following them. Inexplicably, Remus spotted Trish weaving among them, and just behind her, dragged along by her hand on his wrist, was none other than Regulus Black.

“Heeey!” Sirius called, spotting his brother at the same time. “Look who it is!”

“Found this one hiding out in his common room,” Trish said, pulling Regulus up alongside her.

“I wasn’t hiding, I was studying!”

“Same thing really,” Sirius said, before throwing an arm around Regulus’ shoulders. “I’m so proud of you Edge. Want some weed?”

Regulus blanched slightly. “You have weed?”

“Lupin’s always got weed.”

“He’s right, I do,” Remus nodded.

Regulus pulled away. “No thanks.”

“So what, no concert tonight?” Trish asked.

Sirius shook his head; “Nah, not tonight. We were a bit busy,” he flashed a sly look at Remus; “Besides, can’t play for free forever. But if you're really itching for a show...”

“You’re this drunk and you’re going to try and play an instrument?” Regulus snarked.

“No, but I could! You should try it yourself, sometime. Really opens up the imagination.”

Regulus made to open up his mouth, no doubt for some cheeky retort, but Trish swooped in first, smacking him fondly on the shoulder. “Everything’s fiiiiiiine, he doesn’t have to play anything today. He’s just gonna have one beer and play wallflower with me. No dancing either—we agreed—but he’s not allowed to leave before curfew. He promised.”

Sirius raised both brows. “You making promises now, Edge?”

“No, she’s just drunk already.”

“I’m not drunk, I’m happily buzzed. I swear, It’s like he’s determined to grow old without ever being young. Being a dick is the only way he can show affection, but I’m trying to save him.”

“Actually, I think she’s just insane,” Regulus amended, dodging a group of kids as they squeezed past them to get to the front door.

“Trish, are you insane?” Remus asked.

“Maybe a little,” she crooned, “but who cares—we’re young! Now’s not the time to grow old and bored. Life is colourful, and I want to taste it all.”

Regulus made a face. “That doesn’t even make sense!”

“No, I get it,” Sirius agreed.

“See? He gets it,” Trish said, looking about as pleased as a peacock with its feathers fluffed.

“Of course you’d agree with her.”

“Mhm, yeah, makes perfect sense. Now let me do the honours of getting you your first real drink.” Leaving them momentarily, Sirius slipped into the kitchenette before reappearing with four beers in hand. He handed them along to Remus, who used his dorm key to pop the top off each and pass them around.

“Cheers,” Sirius said, knocking his beer against his brother’s; “To never getting old, and to tasting all that life has to offer.”

“Cheers!” Trish cried, downing a deep gulp. To Remus’ surprise, Regulus immediately followed suit, before grimacing.

“You drink this for fun? It’s warm!”

“Gotta drink a warm beer before you can appreciate a cold one,” Remus said.

“And who told you that?”

“I dunno, Gandhi?”

Another song kicked up in the common room and Trish lit up. “Ooh, I know this one! C’mon Reginald, let’s go!”

Regulus gave a noise of objection that sounded a lot like ‘you said no dancing!’ but the two of them were already being swallowed up by the crowd.

Sirius squinted after them.“You don’t think that they…”

“Oh yeah,” Remus snorted. A second later a hand came down on his shoulder, nearly spooking the beer from his lips.

“There you two are!” James cried, before lowering his voice slightly; “Thought you snuck off on your own, like a couple ‘a slags. Ha!”

“As a matter ‘a fact…” Sirius snaked a suggestive hand up the side of Remus’ neck. James caught the gesture and snorted.

“Oh yeah, where? Mary just went up to the room to use the loo and she said it was empty.”

Licking his lips, Sirius jutted his head back down the hallway and James followed, his eyes growing very large.

“No… No! Did you actually—? Dear god—you bloody maniacs!”

“Don’t be jealous, Prongs,” Remus grinned. "There's more than enough cupboard to go around."

“I’m not jealous, you arseholes—I have to clean that! I'm the bloody dorm monitor!”

“Might as well call Evans then," Sirius said. "Make the most of a sticky situation, as they say.”

Remus knocked Sirius’ hand off. “That's it, you’re cut off.”

James left them with a scoff, neither confirming nor denying that he was on his way to do just as Sirius had suggested. After a few more beers, both he and Remus ended up back at the stereo, riffling through the messy pile of records as more disco was being kept on loop.

“Moony, I can’t find ‘Ziggy Stardust’,” Sirius whined, tossing a Rod Stewart album over his shoulder.

“It’s probably under your bed with the rest,” Remus said, cutting the stereo. “Is it even really a party record though?”

“It’s a staple!”

“Alright, alright. Don’t get your knickers in a twist, I’ll go get it. But if I walk in on James and Lily, I'm coming back for reparations.”

“Oh, how I love you.”

"Save it for the bedroom, babe."

Sirius might've melted a bit, but already Remus had slipped away. It was considerably easier to weave through the crowd now that the party’s mood had gone from jumping and thrashing to more subdued. His guess was that the weed had finally begun to take effect; the entire room smelled of cigarette smoke and kids were scattered about, lounging on the carpet or the backs of sofas like cats. Remus spotted Marlene and Mary off on their own, squeezed in together on a large armchair. Despite the fact that Mary was lying back with her legs over the chair's arm and her head in Marlene's lap, they both seemed to be engrossed in rather deep conversation.

Lottie was missing, as were Lily and James—Remus tried not to be too smug—but even more out of the way was Trish and Regulus. The pair had made a home, leaning up against the common room's bookshelves. Regulus was reading a book like he was bored, and Trish had already fallen asleep on his shoulder. It was clear that the other boy was not keen on being there—he made a face whenever another stumbling student got too close—but as Remus stopped to watch, Regulus eventually dropped his book and peeked over. Then he lifted a hand, brushed a lock of hair from Trish's face, and went right on back to reading.

Maybe there was hope after all.

Leaving the common room, Remus took the stairs two at a time. He managed to trip on every fifth stair or so, but by the time he made it to his floor he felt downright giddy. Everything was falling into place. Soon exams would be over and there wouldn't be anything to worry about except the rest of their lives. And flat shopping. They could live anywhere! Limehouse, Lambeth, Soho, Chinatown, anywhere they wanted—!

"Oh, Pete. It's you."

Peter looked up from the hutch next to his bed, where he was currently putting away a fresh load of laundry. "Yeah, Lupin, it is my room."

Remus suddenly felt much more uncomfortable than if he'd just run into James and Lily with their shirts off. " 'Course…" he murmured. "You just get in?"

"I did. Good party then," Peter said. It almost sounded like a rhetorical question, but Remus answered because he couldn't think of anything else to say.

"Yeah. Good. Erm… Was real spur of the moment—Sirius suggested it after the game. You know, to cheer James up after Arsenal's loss."

Peter nodded, moving on to his socks. Which was a bit shocking—Peter never folded his socks.

Flexing his hands at his side, Remus finally shut the door and crossed to Sirius' bed. He crouched down and flipped back the bed covers, reaching beneath for the rest of their records. “You catch the game?” He called, back to Peter.

“Yeah. The girls were showing it over at Dorset. Watched it with Moira.”

“Cool. Bad luck for Arsenal.”

“The girls favoured Ipswich.”

“Ah.” Remus squeezed his eyes shut. This was the most Peter had said to him in weeks. He wished he were more sober.

Just do it. Do it for James.

He turned around. “Listen, Pete—”

“MOONY!” Sirius burst into the room. “MARY’S PLAYING ABBA AGAIN, TELL HER TO—Oh shit! Er... Hey Pete.”

Peter looked Sirius up and down. “Hey, Black.”

“Back from the Missus’s already, are you? Thought she'd be keeping you under lock and key by now.”

Horrified, Remus raised a sharp hand and drew it across his throat; cut it out!

Shrugging, Sirius shoved his hands in his pockets and came forward, falling back onto his bed with a haphazard flourish.

“How… How is Moira?” Remus asked, doing his best attempt at playing peacemaker.

“She’s fine,” Peter said, eyeing Sirius. “I’m gonna spend the night at hers again. Just came back for some clothes.”

“You want to bring her here instead? Party’s still going—we could all hang out downstairs for a bit,” Remus suggested.

“You mean bring her here? With you? Don't think that’s exactly Moira’s speed.”

Sirius swung up into a sitting position. “The party or us?”

“Both,” Peter said very quickly, his voice going up an octave as it always did when he and Sirius faced each other down; “You’re always saying so yourself, right?"

Before Sirius could ruin their chances of reconciliation any further, Remus took another step forward. "Pete, we just wanna talk."

"I haven't told anyone about you," Peter cut-in, "not even Moira. So if that's what you're worried about then you can shove it."

"Oh goodie, glad to see you haven't betrayed all of our trust."

"Screw you, Black! Talking about trust… You two think you're so high and mighty, but really you're just—"

Sirius leapt to his feet. "Just what? Go on, say what you want to say!"

Remus got between them. "Sirius, enough! This is supposed to be about our band!"

"Ha! Our band," Peter squeaked. "You mean the excuse to string James and me along while the two of you go on writing your songs and shagging behind our backs! We're not bandmates, we're just vessels for your bloody ego-trip!"

"At least we see some action!" Sirius shouted, crowding in on Remus in attempts to get closer to Peter. "At least I don't have to wait for a blue moon on the thirty-second of every other month for Moony to be in the mood!"

"Yeah, until you bloody break up, just like Christmas! That's right—I managed to put two and two together!"

"You mean James told you!"

"Fuck off," Peter snarled. "The two of you assholes broke up and made everyone one of us deal with it—we didn't even know what the fuck was going on and did you care? No! You're telling me we go off and do this band shit for as long as it takes the two of you to implode, and then James and I are the ones left with the fucking pieces! You're dicks, both of you!"

"And you're a homophobic arsehole!"

"I can hate you without being homophobic, Black!"

"ENOUGH!" Remus roared, pushing both Sirius and Peter away from each with a sharp shove. "This isn't what James wanted—we're supposed to be making up! You're friends for christ's sake, both of you You've known each other since you were wetting the damn bed—both of you! Maybe this wasn't the best timing, but goddammit, get a hold of yourselves!"

Sirius let out a long breath, appearing almost guilty as he watched Peter from over Remus' shoulder. "I won't apologise for our relationship."

"I never asked you to," Peter seethed. "I never asked you for anything —least of all this stupid band!"

Just like that, Sirius' hackles were back up. He ducked under Remus' arm and got right into Peter's face, staring him down with thunder in his eyes. "Well, fine then! If you don't want to be in the band, then don't be in the band! Go and marry your uptight little girlfriend, find yourself some ugly terrace house with a shitty garden, and work for your brother for the rest of your goddamn, miserable life!"

"Snape's fucking right!" Peter wailed back. "You're gonna end up in prison one day, you no-good, self-important fuck-head!"

"At least I'll have accomplished something on my own!"

With a great cry, Peter shoved Sirius with everything he had, sending him spiralling back into Remus, who had to catch him for the second time that night. Peter did not bother waiting for Sirius to recover, and instead grabbed his things and ran from the room, slamming the door behind himself.

Recovered from his little spill, Sirius pushed away from Remus and took several steps toward the door, practically punching the air. "FUCKING COWARD!"

"Sirius!" Remus moaned. "What were you thinking? Are you really that drunk?!"

Sirius spun around. "It's his fault! He's always been a little rat, running off as soon as things don't go as planned! He's only trying to roll with the band because James asked him to in the first place!"

"And James is only rolling because of us! Now do you want him to leave you for a better friend?"

Recoiling as if he'd been hit, Sirius glowered at him. "James wouldn't leave me for Peter. Peter's no one—what that git has isn't loyalty, it's cowardice!"

“Peter is your friend. Where’s your loyalty, huh?”

“I’m an equal opportunity guy,” Sirius said lowly, “Pettigrew gets as much as he gives.”

It was clear that there was no winning… not tonight. Both Sirius and Peter were drunk with pride, not fondness for each other.

“I think we just need to take a step back,” Remus sighed.

“Oh? We do? Fine. I was just thinking it was about time I took a shower by myself for once."

“No. Sirius, no—that’s not what I meant.”

“Don’t follow me,” Sirius said nastily, stepping past him and marching into the bathroom. He slammed the door hard enough to rattle the entire room, and as the sound of rushing water joined the distant sounds of partying and fun, James’ Arsenal poster unceremoniously peeled itself off the wall and fluttered to the ground.

* * *

The next morning, James hadn’t even needed to ask. It was clear from the way Remus and Sirius were sitting apart at breakfast that something had happened. When both of them refused to talk, he left them to try and track Peter down for answers, but returned unsuccessful several hours later. It was then that Remus finally confessed to the argument, filling James in on all the horrible details.

“Well? What do you have to say for yourself?" He glared at Sirius, who would not meet his eye, then; "Fuck... Bunch of bloody drama queens, the lot of you."

Remus was just glad that he and Sirius weren’t really fighting. As if he were worried about proving Peter’s point, Sirius had apologised by Monday morning. Not for the things he’d said to their friend, but the way he’d reacted when Remus had tried to mediate.

"I'm sorry," he said again. The two of them had skipped second period exam prep and skived off to the astronomy building for some alone time. There was a lesson going on that they'd almost walked in on, but the fire escape was private enough, and so they'd looped their legs down over the edge and leaned forward on the railing, sharing a cigarette.

“Me too," Remus said back, blowing smoke and passing the fag along. "I’m no good at playing Switzerland anyway... Always comes back to fucking bite me.”

“You say that now,” Sirius started, the corners of his mouth perking upwards, “but the moment someone else comes to you with their troubles, you’re gonna drop everything to make them feel better. It’s just a part of who you are.”

“You make me sound like some mother hen. Like James.”

“No, you’re just Moony. Moony the heart-mender. King of comforting all those lousy souls who must suffer a break up.”

“Guess I just… I know what it’s like, s’all.”

Sirius frowned, and reached up to stroke his cheek. “Never again.”

Remus took a pull off the cig and—stopping to make sure they were alone—leaned in to kiss him.

They went about their Monday after that; attending to the rest of their exam prep and music lessons. They met up with James, who was disappointed even further when it became apparent that Peter was not coming to class. While his drum kit sat empty, Mrs. Buchanan marked him absent and announced that it was a practice day, leaving everyone to their whims. A few kids began coordinating an accuracy contest in which they traded their instruments for something new, but the other three Marauders only sat back, not interested in joining in on the fun. Uncharacteristically quiet, James held his Strat to his chest and began plucking away at a sad little melody. Sitting opposite to him, Remus watched as his fingers rippled across the different frets, wondering briefly what colours James saw as he played the somber tune. Surely something depressing. Like beige.

“Moony.” Reaching over, Sirius tapped him on the arm and pulled Remus back to earth. “Sheila’s calling you.”

Turning around, Remus spotted Sheila, standing next to her office. She perked up when they made eye contact, and waved him over with her hand.

Hoping it wasn’t anything too life-altering—he really couldn’t handle finding out he had a long-lost twin right now—Remus left the Fender behind and crossed the classroom, letting himself be ushered inside the office.

“I didn’t want to bring these out while everyone’s around because they might not think it fair, but look what I found you!” She threw her arms out over her desk, where a machine about half the size of Sirius’ stereo was sitting, a single microphone connected to its side.

“It’s a tape machine!” She beamed. “For your band—so you can record yourselves!"

"Oh."

She must've read his expression as being unimpressed, as she rushed to clarify;

"Now, I know it's nothing fancy, but it's something, right? And I’ve found you a whole box of blank tapes as well. The machine belongs to the school, so I can’t just give it to you, but I don’t think it would be a problem if you took it back to your dorm until the end of the year. Provided you take care of it, that is?”

He didn’t have the heart to tell her that there might be very little ‘band’ comings and goings without their drummer, so instead he just nodded and smiled.

“Thank you. Mrs. Buchanan.”

Remus could tell Sirius was thrilled by the prospect of finally getting to record their own songs, but it was obvious that he was holding back his excitement to appease James. After class the other boy regarded the tape machine with little more than a glower, and finally he turned and grabbed both of them by the arm, dragging them from the room.

“Wha—?" Sirius baulked. "What about the tapes? A-And our instruments?”

“Just shut up and come with me,” James growled.

He marched them across campus to the Agrippan Block and straight up to the second floor, where he dropped them in the first empty classroom and ordered that they sit.

“None of us have class in this building,” Sirius rebuffed. “And it’ll be dinner soon.”

James turned on him fiercely. “Don’t. Move.”

Without another word, he swept from the classroom, leaving them both on their own.

“I don’t think he wants us to move, Padfoot,” Remus said, while Sirius sighed and took a seat at one of the desks in the front row.

“He’s meddling—which is worse than your meddling because it means that he’s also going to nag me.”

“I think you need a bit of nagging,” Remus said, sitting down across from him.

Smirking, Sirius hopped up and leaned down over Remus’ chair, effectively blocking all means of escape. “Was that an innuendo, Mr. Lupin?”

“No.”

"Oh. Well, could it be?"

"... Maybe."

Sirius smirked and leaned in until their faces were but a mere hair’s breadth away, but just then the door opened. They were caught in the act by Peter, who was standing awkwardly in the doorway, clearly just as surprised to see the two of them. He went to turn around, but just as quickly—James was there, backing him into the classroom without a stern look on his face.

“In,” he ordered. “And sit down.”

Without room to argue, Peter gave in and ultimately took a seat at one of the desks several rows over from the rest of them. Taking his time, James shut the door behind himself before calmly proceeding to the professor’s desk and lifting himself up until he was sitting on top. Sirius had already opened his mouth to offer complaint, but James simply raised a stern hand and silenced him instantly.

“I think we all know why I've brought you here. And just let it be known, how disappointed I am—in all of you."

Both Peter and Sirius began to speak at the same time; “No way, I—!” and; “But he—!”

“QUIET!”

The boys slumped back into their respective chairs, and James hopped down from the professor's desk, body as taut as a string. "Especially you two!" He hollered. "You are best friends for Christ's sake! How could you say such things to each other?"

Before any of them could respond, James threw out his arms again.

"No! In fact, ignore that! I'm the one who's gonna talk now, and you're gonna listen. Years of friendship aside, we agreed to do this together! We became Marauders together, and that's not gonna change, not as far as I see it! If any of us wants out then that's their decision, but we do NOT turn our backs on our friends. We do not intentionally hurt them—no matter how angry we are! I don't believe anything any of you have said or done deserves the kind of hatred you spewed at one another, and I want it to end here. Today—right now. So go on, let's have it out. Say what you want—resolve it—and leave it at the door. Because we're friends first."

There was a beat of silence, and then another. James looked to Sirius, who only glanced down at his fingernails, uninterested. Similarly, Peter crossed his arms and also refused to speak. Finally, James turned on Remus.

"Moony...?"

Remus couldn't handle it anymore.

"I was the one who asked Sirius not to tell anyone about us," he admitted. "I asked him to keep it a secret. From everyone. And he did it for me."

Sirius threw an arm out. "Moony, you don't have to explain—"

"I want to!" Remus said. "When things started between Sirius and I last summer, I wasn't ready to come out. I didn't even have a word for it. I thought we had to be friends first, and that whatever it was I was feeling, wasn't real. But it was—it was real. And it scared me. I didn't want you to see us any different, for anything to change..."

At his words, Sirius turned his face into his shoulder. Still, Remus plunged on.

"We fought because I was scared, and because I was being selfish. I wanted everything at once, but I wasn't willing to risk what I already had... It was the same at Christmas. And I'm sorry that the rest of you had to deal with it, even though you didn't know what was going on. I didn't know what it was that I wanted then, but I do now, and now all I want is for us to leave school and still be together. Even if it isn't as a band... or in London… It's like, I found out recently that I have a fucking godmother, but even if I hadn't I would still be okay, because I have you guys. You're my family... All of you."

James glanced at Peter, who didn't return the look, but eased the tenseness in his shoulders.

"Pete?"

Peter continued glaring at the floor, and then finally threw his arms down. "Fine! Yes, I understand. But it's not my fault you decided to like each other…"

"That's not what this is about, Pete," James said, then, more cautious; "Is it...?"

"No." Peter raised his eyes to Remus'. "You say you didn't tell people, but you did! You just didn't tell me. Even Lottie knew, only I was singled out! But that's how it always is, isn't it? I don't care who you're buggering, but christ—I thought it would be different when Miles left! Then you came and it was the same thing all over again... Do you even know why I like Moira? 'Cause she makes me feel like a person! You guys make me feel like crap."

"This isn't some polygamist cult, Pettigrew," Sirius said. "Not including you in mine and Moony's relationship isn't exactly uncommon! We had to know we could trust you first!"

"Trust me?!" Peter exclaimed. "What happened to being family?!"

"You can't keep a secret!"

"And my sister can?"

Sirius sat up. "Your sister did! For months—she didn't breathe word of it to anyone! You drop your spoon at lunch and you make sure the whole world knows it!"

"Piss off!"

"Stop!" James ordered. "We're not just gonna shout. We're here to work this out, because the way I see it, none of us are gonna move forward with any of our relationships as long as it's an issue. Now, Moony, why'd you decide not to tell Pete about you and Sirius?"

Remus felt at a loss. “It just… never came up.”

Peter scoffed. “Right.”

“Not even when you were telling Lily and me?”

“It’s not that simple,” Sirius cut-in. “Telling one person doesn’t mean you’ve suddenly got the confidence to shout it to the entire world. We had no idea how you and Evans were gonna react—it’s not like we were telling you our bloody shoe size had changed. It's like Moony said, it was about how you saw us. What you thought later and forever. Because it matters.”

“And I don’t, I suppose,” Peter shot back.

“You do, Pete,” Remus insisted, “but it was harder than that. And thinking about how we wanted to do this band… Be rock stars. One word to the wrong person could ruin everything.”

Peter slammed his hands on the desktop. “Fuck's sake, it’s always gotta be about the bloody band with you!”

“Lay off him!” Sirius snapped. “He just means we had to know you were serious.”

“Serious?” Peter echoed. “SERIOUS?! Try seriously pissed off!”

“Right, we got that part.”

“Oh, you think you’re so smart!” Peter hissed. “But how smart could you be if this mythical band’s all you’ve got going for you!”

“What did you say?”

“That’s right! You’re so desperately clinging to this idea of being rock stars because you’ve got nothing else going for you! Me and James have shit—he could take over his dad’s firm in an instant, or be a sports star if he really wanted! And I’ve still got options with my brother—no matter how pathetic you may think it is, I have people who want me! James and I could make something of ourselves, it’s you two who have nothing other than this fucking band!”

“I knew it!” Sirius howled, launching himself up to his feet. “It was never about me or Moony, it was always about following James! Of breaking us up so that he could be as pitiful as you! Some artist—just say you’re a coward and get out!”

This time Remus did not have to get in front of Sirius—James did it for him, using all his full height to walk Sirius back to his desk.

“Sirius, sit down.”

Remus couldn’t see with James’ back turned, but something about his expression must’ve made Sirius think twice. Slowly, he lowered himself back down into the desk, kicking the closest chair to him away for good measure.

"This is not how I wanted this to go," James said. "We were supposed to be making up!"

"Guess that's what happens when you try and force people to get along," Peter glowered. Sirius returned the look, and James' hands became fists at his sides. For a moment it looked as though he might actually hit something, but then he shut his eyes and let out a long breath and just like that he'd relaxed again.

"Fine," he said, leaning back against the professor’s desk. “If that's the case, then I wanna take a poll. No shame, no pressure, just answer honestly—all of you. But either in or out, I want us to promise right now that we’ll still be friends after.”

He cast his gaze over all of them, and one by one, they all managed a nod.

“Okay. Now who actually wants to be in a band? Not, ‘it’d be cool to do that for six months and then piss off’, but actually. Who wants this?”

Sirius’ hand went up without hesitation, and Remus’ too, a few moments later. James did not vote right away, instead he looked to Peter, who was picking at his desk with a fingernail.

“Pete, now’s the time to be honest, mate. No judgement, just honesty.”

Slowly, Peter looked up until he was able to look James in the eye. And then he raised one hand. At that moment, Remus wasn’t sure if he should be upset or relieved—and because it would’ve terrified James to know which, he pushed the thought away.

“Good.” James raised his hand too. “All four of us want this then. And we want it together, how it should be. But we have to know we can trust each other too.”

“Yeah,” Peter said. “How do we know that this won’t all go to shit if the two of them suddenly break up?”

Sirius turned sharply as though he were ready to stand again, but stopped when Remus grabbed his arm. “He has a point,” Remus said.

“We’re not breaking up,” Sirius said firmly. “Maybe this is all news to the rest of you, but I’ve loved Moony since—” he stopped short, and scratched his nose to cover it; “since… a while. Now we’ve sorted out our shit. We’re happy.”

“So you say now,” Peter said, “but your track record’s against you.”

This time it was Remus’ turn to spin around. “Pete, don’t be an asshole.”

“Me?”

“Yeah. We wanna do this with you, but not if you’re just gonna be a prick about it.”

“Well, I may be a prick but at least I’m not shagging one.”

“Pete!” James snapped. “What did we talk about this morning?”

Scowling, Peter leaned back in his chair and crossed his arms, but said nothing else. Remus eyed him grimly for a few moments and then turned back around in his chair. Sirius was covering his mouth next to him, and when he pulled his hand away Remus expected to find a frown—only it was a smile. He looked from Peter, back to Remus, and then inexplicably, Sirius began to laugh.

“Ha… mhm… ‘not shagging one’…” he mumbled; “s’a good joke almost…”

“Sirius, are you actually laughing?” Asked James.

Sirius shook his head, even covering his mouth again. He held out for a good few seconds before sputtering through his hand and breaking down entirely. “He got you, Moons,” he cackled. “You are indeed shaggin’ a prick! HA!”

“And an idiot, apparently," Remus half-moaned, covering his eyes. Across the room, he heard James give a chortle.

"Is it a tiny prick, Padfoot?"

"No, massive. Right, Wormtail?"

"Yeah, well he is a massive prick..."

"HA!"

More laughed, and Remus finally removed his hands to find that all three of them had joined in, even Peter. It was ridiculous how easy it suddenly felt. All of that, and now this.

Infected by the sudden lift in mood, Remus began to laugh too, letting all of the pressure and anxiety seep from his bones. Sirius laughed until he was practically crying, and while he was wiping the tears from his eyes, Peter cleared his throat.

“Look, I don’t care that you’re gay—”

“Moony’s bisexual,” James and Sirius said together.

“What… So like, both?”

Remus shook his head. “Doesn’t matter. As you were saying, Pete?”

“I’m not gonna tell anyone," Peter said. "I want to be in the band too, and as much as I hate saying it, you're right... I don’t think the world is ready for a gay rock star, even if he is as fabulous as Sirius.”

Sirius smirked, and then shrugged amicably. "Wouldn't want to steal the spotlight off of the rest of you that much anyway. Sounds like a lot of work, that."

They shared another chuckle, and finally James clapped his hands together. "Glad that's over. I hate fighting, so if there's anything else the lot of you want to say, now's the time to do it."

Remus and Sirius both shook their heads, but three out of four wasn't a whole, and so finally they all found themselves looking back at Peter.

"Pete?" James said anxiously. "Come on, mate."

"I want this," Peter nodded. "But I need to know, what's gonna happen if the two of you break up?"

Sirius frowned, and Remus could tell he was trying to keep his anger in check.

"We won't."

"That's not good enough."

The hackles went up again, but luckily James was there to soothe it once more.

“Hey. I understand where Pete’s coming from, and it's not an insult, Padfoot."

"Easy for you to say. What if he'd just asked whether yours and Evans' relationship had an expiry date?"

"It'd suck, but it wouldn't have anything to do with the band."

The frown became another scowl, and Remus reached out to take his hand. "Say what you want to say then," he told the other two. "We'll hear you out."

"You gotta swear this isn't just for you," Peter said. "That this whole band thing, leaving school to live like bums—that isn't just a part of some crazy romanticised idea. That it isn't just for you."

"I see four people here," Sirius echoed; "Just because it was our idea doesn't mean you don't have an equal stake."

"But you could make or break it, Sirius," James finished. "Pete's right. I know you might not mean for it that way, but things like this can get warped. You… You—I dunno—Maybe you just have to swear that this whole thing—taking a year off, working for the band—that it's more than what we see. That it's not just for you guys, because it can't be. It has to be all of us, together, like you said—four. I love you both, really, but you have to be real about this, 'cause this is real life, ain't it? And if anything’s gonna come of it you have to put this first, or at least make it the same.”

Unsure of how to answer such a thing, Remus wiped his face. Opposite to him, Sirius leaned back in his chair and looked up at the ceiling.

“Put it first, huh?”

Or the same, Remus thought sorely.

“I just mean we have to be friends first, don’t we?" James winced. "That’s how this whole thing started anyway. Like, if we can’t be friends before bandmates and whatever else, then… Pete's right, how could it ever work?"

"I agree," Remus said, though he didn't want to. "We started this as friends, I think we should finish it... as friends."

Obviously relieved, James nodded. "Okay. And what say you, Padfoot?"

Sirius sighed, and dropped his eyes from the roof. "I say yes, I suppose. Marauders weren't meant to walk alone anyway."

" 'One for all, and all for one', right?"

"Right." Standing, Sirius took James' hand and clapped his shoulder in a friendly hug. "Pete," he called afterwards, "I didn't mean what I said earlier, I was just angry. My bad, won't happen again."

Remus thought that it wasn't exactly an apology, but Peter didn't seem to notice. He stood up too, and nodded in return.

"I hate fighting. It's so much easier to just let James boss us around."

James pulled a face. "Oi, I'm not bossy. Sirius, am I bossy?"

"Only as bossy as Moony."

"I am not bossy," Remus scoffed, "you just need a twenty-four-seven babysitter."

"Eh, boyfriend—babysitter. You're all the same. Sarcastic arseholes with a pretty face."

Remus grabbed Sirius by the jaw, squishing his lips together with a grin. "Says you."

"Is this what they're like when they flirt?" Peter asked James.

"Pretty much."

"Ah, so not that different from usual then."

Remus smiled back at them as Sirius pulled his face free. "I think we need to do something," he said keenly. "Something to make up—make us not so foul anymore. We're leaving school soon and everyone's gotten weepy, but I'm excited! Shove the exams, let's do something to celebrate! Something cool, so that when we leave we'll have no regrets.”

“You mean like a prank?” Asked Peter.

“Yes… or, that too anyway. Suppose there's gotta be more than one way to have 'em remember us.”

James tilted his head, clearly intrigued. “What are you getting at, Padfoot?”

“I was thinking we could make a time capsule, actually.”

“Like the one Filch dug up last term?”

"Yeah!"

Peter scratched his head. “What would we put in it?”

“Anything—everything. Whatever we wanted! Put in James’ rank football boots for all I care.”

“But we’re not important. Who wants to dig up a time capsule full of our crap?”

“Yet, Wormy,” Sirius said, “we’re not important yet.”

“I think it’s a great idea,” said James. “We could get the girls in on it. Let McKinnon try out a time capsule of her own.”

“You’re so nice,” Sirius teased, knocking him gently in the shoulder. “But yeah, the girls too. Now whaddya say, Moons?”

They all looked at him, and Remus smiled.

“I think it’s about the lamest thing you’ve ever suggested."

"Oh? Really."

"Yeah... And I know exactly what we should put in it.”

Chapter End Notes

In my head the first song Sheila (accidentally, hehe) played for Remus was "Rockin' Robin" by Bobby Day (1958).

Lots of songs in this chapter, because I can do that, lol:
“My Heart Cries for You” by Guy Mitchell (1951),

“Long Tall Sally” by Little Richard (1956),
“Your Sister Can’t Twist” by Elton John (1973), and; “Stayin’ Alive” by the Bee Gees (1977).

Once again, I update on Sundays around mid-day (sometimes before, sometimes after), but I'm in the PST timezone so I cannot help if that's basically a Monday for you, lol.

Chapter 94: Glory Days

Chapter Summary

The Marauders get ready to leave school while juggling exams, football, and an unfortunate lack of pranking ideas.

Chapter Notes

Will mot ever get a chapter out on time??? Probs not ¯_(ツ)_/¯

CW for this chapter: It's a fun one, but there is reference to some brief religious trauma. There's also a sex scene, but I believe it's the last one before the end of the school year. Pay attention to '> > >' if you wish to skip over.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

For once in my life, I won't let sorrow hurt me,
Not like it's hurt me before;
For once, I have something I know won't desert me,
I'm not alone anymore;
For once I can say, "This is mine, you can't take it!"
As long as I know I have love, I can make it;
For once in my life, I have someone who needs me…

- "For Once in My Life" Stevie Wonder, 1968

Wednesday 31st May 1978

Remus clenched the post card tightly between his fingers. It was wrinkled as though it'd been dropped in a puddle and only had a few sparse words, but the excitement it carried was astronomical.

Imming was bust. Found a group and we're moving on. Phone me at the Roadman's Pub in Ipswich. Wrote the number down below. Luv Tom.

He took the stairs down two at a time, and was punching numbers into the closest telephone line before he'd even stopped to catch his breath. The phone rang for a moment, before it clicked on and an old, breathy voice shouted down the line.

“ ‘Ello, Judy? Is that you?”

“Eh… No… it’s Remus…”

“What’d you say, Judy? Come now, speak up you old bat, you know my ears ain’t naught but whistles in the wind nowadays.”

“Sorry, wrong number!”

He slammed the receiver down, stopping just long enough to laugh at himself as he dialled the number again—more slowly this time. It took longer this time around for the call to cross the miles between them, but when the line finally connected, he was met with the rumbling drawl of another stranger.

“Roadman’s pub 'n inn, how may I direct ya?”

He told the man on the end of the line who he was looking for, and then there was a clatter as the phone was set down. In the background he could hear an entire rabble, most likely working men just got off from a hard day’s work. There was shouting, laughter, the occasional sound of a smashing glass. Remus imagined Tomny was fitting right in.

There was another clatter as the phone was picked up, and then his friend was shouting down the line;

“Oioi! Whatchu want—who’s this?”

“Got that many people calling you at some dingy pub, you slag?”

“LU! Oh baby, I missed you!”

Remus’ heart leapt in his chest. He could barely hear Tomny over all the noise, but he was smiling ear-to-ear anyway.

“Honestly, Tomny, the things I do for you—”

“What? Sorry’s, love, can you speak up a bit?”

“I was only saying!” Remus shouted into the phone; “That I just dialled the wrong number. Instead of the pub I just got some old bint yelling her head off and calling me Judy.”

“Eh, s’not a terrible nickname,” Tomny said. “Though, I do prefer mine. How’s it do, Lu?”

“Life’s good, Tom. Got your letter. I see your penmanship’s gotten better.”

“Oi. Just 'cause I dropped out at thirteen don’t mean I’m a total thickhead. Burrin’s had me copying out his bookie notes since before I could see over the counter.”

“Mhm, sure. So what the hell happened in Imming? Why're you in Ipswich?”

“Oh." Tomny made a sound of discontent and sighed into the phone. “Eh, bit boring really. Eventually every'fin just went tits-up and no one was gettin’ paid anymore, so a few of us packed our bags and skipped town, s'all. Place is too cold to be a summer home anyway.”

“That’s shite.”

“Eh, easy when you only got one bag. We managed to snag a ride on the railway but got kicked off near Leicester when the poncy conductor found us hiding out in one of the sleepers. From there it was shanks’ pony all the way to Peterborough, but managed to bum a ride from there. But I got another gig down at the port out by Felixstowe! We're all heading over there tomorrow actually. Me and the guys are gonna live together down by the ports."

"Do you know them?"

"We're comfortable. Better than living in a dosshouse. And it’s honest work—port’s massive, way bigger than Imming. The boys thought a bit of a celebration was in order though, so we're's just having ourselves a bit of a piss-up now." In another, another shattering glass echoed in the background, followed by a round of hearty laughter. Tomny joined in, before shouting into the phone again; "But what about'chu?! How long ‘til yer done wiff school?”

“Few weeks."

Tomny whistled. "Then what?”

“Then I’m back home, s'pose. The lads and I are gonna get a flat—find work ourselves. Maybe a shitty pub to peddle our band in.”

“Ah yes, the band,” Tomny mused. “You’re not goin’ back to yer dad’s then?”

“No. Nothing there for me anyway.”

“Too right. Get this though, Burrin knows the guy who runs the racket in the yard round 'ere, says he's gonna set me up too."

"Doing what, something illegal?"

"S'only illegal if you get caught."

"Wonder how many felons have said that."

"Cheeky. Give me six months, I'll have the entire place eatin' out of the palm of my hand."

It was jest—probably an exaggeration at best, but Remus couldn't help the way his stomach seemed to plummet toward his feet.

"Six months...?"

"Ah." Tomny clicked his tongue, and Remus' fist tightened over the postcard.

“Tom, is this your way of telling me you’re not coming back to London?”

"Now hold on, I never said—" Suddenly Tomny went silent, and Remus had to press the receiver more tightly to his ear just to make out the voices over the noise.

"Piss off, m'on the phone, ya prick!"

"C'mon, Tim-Tom, don't be stingy. I just wan' say hello to your pretty bird from back home."

"Oh, fuck you, Harv."

The tussle went on for a few more seconds until eventually Remus was answered with a new voice. This 'Harv' was clearly drunk, and had a deep Black Country accent that was impossible to miss. He laughed down the line at first, and Remus felt his patience wither.

"Ow do, luv?" He drawled. "You one 'ah the girls our Tim-Tom's always chatting up from back home?"

"Shut up, Harv!" Tomny called; "It's my fuckin' brother, orright? Now give me the bloody phone!"

Another clamorous scuffle began, and distantly Remus heard the barman from before warn the two about messing around in his pub. In the end it was Tomny who won, shooing his friend off as he sighed into the phone.

"Sorry 'bout that... S'just Harv. Pretty sure he took one too many hits to the skull as a kid and it's left him a moron."

"No, it's my bad. Didn't realise I was clogging up the line," Remus scoffed. "I should let you go, let the 'pretty birds' have their turn."

"The git's lying! I barely have a second to myself, ain't no time leftover to flirt."

"Sure, Tim-Tom."

"Okay, I'd say your cheek's hit full for one phone call, don't cha think?"

Unable to help himself, Remus smirked and began absentmindedly twirling the phone cord around his wrist. "You called me your brother."

"Yeah, and?"

Remus' smile widened.

"I am coming back, y'know," Tomny said eventually. "Can't stand coming home every day stinkin' 'ah fish guts and oil forever. M'just... Well, I'm just gonna see how this works out first. But I'll be back. One of us still owes the other a warm meal, innit."

Remus sighed. "Yeah, alright."

"So you gonna finally tell me what's new or am I to stand here listening to you mope forever?"

"I found out I have a godmother."

"No shit?"

"And she's my teacher."

"Fuckin' 'ell!" Tomny exclaimed. "Your life sometimes, I swear... Are you happy about it?"

"Yeah, sorta. But it's still confusing, mostly."

“Family always is. I only ever had mum, and she was more than enough to deal with. I used to think she was a bit daft, but she was just some girl, and ya don’t get fancy things like ‘godparents’ when yer born a low-rent. Now how’d you find out about this god-mum of yours?”

“It’s a long story.”

“Maybe you tell me when I see you next then. Since you’re moving back for good?”

Remus brightened a bit. “Yeah, definitely! I can't wait for you to meet the others, properly this time. And you should meet Mary and Marlene too. They all know about Sirius and me now, all of them.”

“It’s a date,” Tomny agreed, then; “And you can tell lover-boy I said so."

"You shouldn't tease him."

"Why not? It's a big brother's job—giving the new boyfriend a hard time."

"Yeah, okay. I'll see you when we're both back then?"

“You know it. Make sure you give me the bell once you’re settled in. I'd like to pop by and catch one of your little shows.”

"They won’t be little forever. Who knows, maybe one day I'll be inviting you to Wembley.”

"As long as you'll be there. Now I'll be seeing you, Lu. Stay safe, enjoy yourself. You've earned it, posh-boy."

When Tomny hung up, all the sounds of his rowdy pub fell away and Remus was left alone in the quiet hallway of his school dorm. Nearby the common room was flush with groups of kids trying to enjoy what was left of their evening. No one noticed, but Remus' cheeks had started to burn even before he hung the phone back onto its hook. A part of him wished he hadn't mentioned Wembley Stadium in the first place; he blamed Sheila for ever putting the thought in his head—Me? Play Wembley? As if—but then again, Tomny had never been the sort to trample on other people's dreams. All Remus could do now was trust his word; that Tomny would be back as soon as he could, and everything would be alright again. And so he resolved himself to push the entire thing from his mind, at least until they were all back in London and ready to do something about it.

Turning to face the front doors, Remus picked up the Fender's case from its spot along the wall and pulled up the collar of his jacket as he walked out into the crisp night air. There was no time to fret over Tomny anyway.

He was late for band practice.

* * *

Monday 5th June 1978

Lily stood in the doorway of their dorm room, squinting down at the tape recorder Sirius had just unceremoniously dropped into her arms. She and Marlene had really only come over to get their notebooks back after James and Peter had borrowed them for self-study, but Sirius had been quick to waylay them before departure with talk of their latest bright idea.

"I don't understand…" Lily said; "You want us to do what with it?"

"Pick a song—one that really means something to you—and record it on this here tape. It's set up for you already," Sirius instructed, scooting in closer. "This is the record button, and there's the stop button—basic stuff. Just hit the record, play your song off whatever radio, and then hit stop again. Easy-peasy."

"But why?" Marlene asked, peering over Lily's shoulder.

"It's for the time capsule," Remus said.

Both girls stared back in surprise. "You're making a time capsule?"

James' voice carried from inside the bathroom; "It was Sirius' idea!"

"But Moony thought of the tape!" Sirius added excitedly. "We're gonna put everything into a capsule of our own and bury it—right here on campus! Then, in twenty years when we're either rich and successful or fat and balding, we can come back and dig it up again. Relive our glory days, as it goes."

"Wouldn't it make more sense for you guys to record your own songs?" Marlene asked, reaching over Lily's shoulder and tapping a fingernail along the tape recorder's keys sceptically. In answer, Sirius and Remus exchanged a smug look.

"We already did."

The girls' jaws dropped. "You did?"

"Finished it this morning in fact," Sirius beamed proudly. "Wormy's over in the AV room right now, getting those lads to piece it together for us. It's not perfect, but when he's done we'll have our very first amateur demo."

"So this is what you've been doing with all of your time for the last month!" Lily huffed. " 'Studying' my arse—you four were just shut up in that bloody music room, working on your riffs instead of working on your marks!"

"Don't worry, we're still passed all our exams," Sirius preened. "Some with flying colours, I hear." He glanced coquettishly at Remus, who had already done more than his fair share of bragging; which was of course only well-deserved. Their final reports had come back the day before, and he'd been very pleased to find that he'd made top marks in not only English but Classics as well. He tried not to gloat, but even Professor Bilshin had praised his work, and it was a well-known fact that that old sour-puss had never praised anyone.

"Well," Lily breathed eventually, "this is all brilliant then. When should we expect to hear this 'demo' of yours?"

"You won't," Remus said, leaning against the open door shyly. "We swore we wouldn't listen to it until 1998."

"1998?" Marlene gasped; "But that's twenty years from now!"

"We know. It's going in the capsule."

"And there will be room for you and yours," Sirius assured them, "just pick a song—get Mary and Lottie in on it too. It's an eight-track tape, and there's eight of us. Honestly, I couldn't think of anything more perfect."

Lily and Marlene smiled, obviously softened by Sirius' show of inclusion, and nodded their heads in agreement. "Alright," Lily said, "but you're not allowed to make fun of our choices."

Sirius put a hand over his heart. “I solemnly swear to not make fun of the songs you ladies choose… Even if they are absolutely grating on the ears.”

Contented, Marlene reached out and pinched Sirius on the cheek, before both girls turned to go.

“Make sure you give it back soon,” he called down the hall after them. “We’re gonna bury it after the tournament!”

Once they’d gone and Sirius had come back inside, Remus shut the door and raised his arms up in a stretch. “You think it’s silly?” He asked. “The tape idea?”

“Of course not,” Sirius smiled. “I can't think of anything better. The rest of you might be embarrassed of your music taste in twenty years, but not me. Bowie’ll always be timeless.”

“So you picked a Bowie song? I should’ve known.”

“Practice what you preach, right?"

"Right."

"What song did you pick then? You never said.”

“Sorry, not telling.”

"Uh-huh, nice try," Sirius scoffed. “No go on, fess up!”

“You're the one who said it should be a secret."

“Yeah, but it’s me!”

“Even more reason not to tell,” Remus said snidely, “you know far too many of my secrets already.”

“Ugh. You're no fun.” Stopping long enough to stick out tongue as a show of opposition, Sirius crossed the room to the bathroom door and promptly banged his fist on the wood. “Dammit, Prongs! How long you gonna be in there for? The rest of us need to piss every once in a while too, ya know.”

“Do you mind? I’m shaving!” James called back. “Call me when you get more than two hairs on your chin!”

Sirius kicked the door. “Wanker.”

Disinterested, Remus returned to his corner of the room. He had Hope's white trunk open on his bed, which he'd been slowly filling as the days went by. It was mostly books, spare socks, the odd essay he'd thought worth keeping, but there were also a handful of photographs, courtesy of Lily. She'd given them to him in an envelope only a few weeks before, and when he peered into the collection of polaroid photos he'd found more than he'd thought he would. Apart from a few chance moments, he could scarcely remember Lily toting the camera around with her at all, and yet the evidence was right there, dated and captioned just for him.

Some of them were priceless, like the ones of all four of them on Sirius' seventeenth birthday, standing in naught but their pants at the very end of the dock. Even now Remus could still recall the cold. Then there was Peter missing an eyebrow, and Sirius in Mary's tube tup at the end of twelfth year, and James on his birthday with that stupid party hat they'd made him wear. Those ones were definitely worth a good laugh, but there were also simpler ones;

Mary and Marlene cuddling each other on the sofa; a concentrated Peter in art class; Lottie waving in front of the Three Broomsticks; James and Sirius smiling for the camera, a tight-lipped Professor McGonagall standing between them; and finally four girlish faces squeezed into a single frame and an unsuspecting Remus passed out in the background. If he squinted hard, he could just make out the fresh tattoo on his chest.

They'd really had so much fun at school.

Each photograph had unlocked a memory for Remus that he'd almost thought forgotten, but it was the one of him and Sirius in the common room that had really gotten him. It was dated as March 24th, 1977, just a few days before James' birthday. Sirius had Andy's guitar in his lap, his eyes shut as though he were lost in the song. And Remus... God. He was smiling like a sop, wasn't he? Staring at Sirius as though the sun rose and set on him. He supposed it did. For whatever love he'd had for Sirius in that moment, it had only tripled since.

"I don't know why you're packing now. We don't leave for another week and half," Sirius said, appearing over Remus' shoulder and glancing down at the trunk. With a soft smile, Remus tucked the photographs away and turned to him.

"Your hair's finally grown back," he said, tucking a lock of it behind Sirius' ear for him. "It looks like it did before."

“Does it?” Sirius thumbed his fringe. “Doesn’t feel like it.”

“You could probably even braid it again.”

“Would you do it for me?”

“If you wanted me to.”

"And if I wanted you to do... other things?"

Remus tongued the inside of his cheek. "Now that would have to be negotiated."

"I think you'd find it to be a waste of time," Sirius tsked. "After all, I always get what I want. In the end..."

"Do you now?" Remus arched a brow. "Why don't you prove it."

For a moment it appeared as though Sirius might rise to the bait. He smirked at him, even grinned and ran the tip of his tongue across his teeth to tease. And Remus might've been satisfied with just that, but then Sirius sighed and turned away, as though the game did not interest him in the slightest. Remus didn't even think; it was instinct to reach out and grab him, haul Sirius back with every finger hingeing in the waistband of his trousers—and Remus got his due the moment he spun Sirius back around and spotted that smug look on his face.

"See?" Sirius purred. "Want you? Got you." Then he grabbed Remus round the jaw and kissed him hard on the mouth. It was something Remus never got tired of. Sirius was a bombshell—a firecracker come to life. He made everything exciting, no matter how many times they did it. The idea of one day having to share him with the rest of the world made him endlessly nervous, but Sirius was too big a star to ever be contained. They'd see him, they'd love him, but never like this. This belonged to Remus alone.

"I want this," Sirius murmured, kissing Remus' mouth; "and this—" his cheek; "and this—" his eyes; "and this—" his neck; "All of it."

"All of it?"

"All of it."

They ended up on Remus' bed, Sirius straddling him as Remus slid his hands up beneath his shirt. He'd just made it to the top of his ribs when Sirius grabbed one wrist and brought Remus' hand up toward his face. Instantly Remus thought to grasp his neck and bring their mouths back together and—kiss, kiss, kiss—but then Sirius was sucking a finger into his mouth, biting him round the first knuckle.

"Careful," Remus moaned. "Much more of that and I'll—"

Before he could finish his eyes fell sideways, right over Sirius' shoulder, to where James was stood frozen next to his own bed in little more than his sport shorts. Remus screamed—"AUGH!"—and shot upright, just as Sirius was leaning back down to kiss him. Their foreheads collided with a dull thump and instantly Sirius had collapsed back on the bed.

"Fucking—CHRIST!" He groaned, as the two of them writhed on the bed, clutching their newly-formed bruises. "Moons, what the hell?!" Sirius rolled over, and Remus knew he'd spotted James as well when his arm shot out.

"YOU!"

James laughed once, and gave an awkward wave. "Sorry... Didn't mean to interrupt."

"It's always fucking you!" Sirius howled, snatching up a pillow in one hand and sending it soaring across the room to smack James upside the head.

"I was trying to get by without you noticing!" He wailed back, fixing his glasses. "But the bloody door's between your beds! What was I supposed to do?"

"You were supposed to stay in the fucking toilet!"

"That's not fair. How should I know that the two of you were out here eating each other's faces off?"

"Oh, I'm sorry! Next time we'll moan louder!"

"Yeah, yeah," James scoffed, pulling on his t-shirt. "Give it a few weeks, we'll all be out on our own... No more sharing a room then."

Still clutching his forehead, Sirius looked to Remus, who shrugged haplessly, rubbing his own.

"Fine," Sirius huffed, clambering off the bed; "Suppose the mood's gone anyway… Anyone feel like music?"

"Anything to drown out the sound of you sticking your tongue down Moony's throat."

"Don't be jealous, Potter. Macdonald says it gives you wrinkles."

As Sirius crossed back to his own bed, Remus stood and righted his mother's trunk, which had ended up on the floor in their haste to make room on the tiny four-poster. By the time he'd picked all his things up off the floor, Sirius had a Bad Company album playing and was lying upside down on his bed, tossing a tiny rubber ball up in the air.

"Big game's coming up, Potter," he said. James didn't reply at first, and Remus glanced over to find him lying back on his own bed, hands clasped over his chest and staring up at the ceiling as though he were lost in thought.

"Potter?"

"Huh? Oh... Yeah, it is."

Sirius tossed the ball up again. "You and McKinnon decide what it is you're doing for the tournament yet?"

"Sorta."

"Alright, be stingy then." Another toss, and another, and then; "Blimey, where is Pete? It's just one tape, can't be that hard—"

James sat up on his bed; "When you two kiss each other, do you ever think about how you're kissing another bloke?"

This time Sirius missed the ball. It hit him square between the eyes before bouncing off and rolling across the room and beneath Peter's bed. By then James had earned himself an incredulous look from both of them and Sirius had sat up so quickly he'd nearly taken a spill off of his covers.

"Pardon me?"

"Like, does it feel different from kissing a girl?"

Sirius made a small choking sound in the back of his throat. "From a girl—why yes, I expect it's a bit different!"

"Better different...?"

"That's probably up to the person, Prongs," Remus said, while Sirius leapt up from the bed and pointed yet another finger at his best friend.

"You been kissing other blokes, Potter?!"

"What? No!"

"Then why the sudden interest?"

"I was just curious!"

Remus suspected that if James could've blushed easily he would've been red from top to bottom. As it was, he merely let out a nervous huff and began organising his already-spotless bedside. "I've just been thinking about it, that's all," he babbled, tossing his arms out and rubbing the back of his neck simultaneously. "A lot's happened since you told us! Like—Like the shit with Pete, and—and Marlene! She's a lesbian, you know."

"Yes," Sirius scoffed; "We know."

"Well, I... I've been talking to her about it."

"That'll get you every time," Remus mumbled. It made Sirius smirk a bit, but James didn't seem to notice.

"She said she's always known," he continued; "That she—you know, liked girls. And I was just wondering... was it the same for you guys? You know, since you... 'like guys'."

He used air quotes, and Remus' jaw just about fell off his face.

"James, could you... I mean, do you think you could like—"

"Men?"

James looked up when he said it, and both Remus and Sirius seemed to be gripping the edge of their seats, but in the end James only laughed.

"Ha, no! Don't be stupid, you two, I have Lily."

"What does that have to do with anything?" Sirius demanded.

"Well, I have a girlfriend."

"Moony's had girlfriends!"

"So has Sirius."

James shook his head. "No. No, you're wrong. It's nothing personal, I'm just... you know, not. Like, when Padfoot and I kissed I didn't feel anything at all."

Sirius made a retching sound. "Please, don't ever bring that up again. I have nightmares about that day."

James rolled his eyes, and Remus came across the room to lean gently against one of the posts of his bed.

"You know, Prongs, having a girlfriend doesn't much have to do with your sexuality. You could still... 'like' people."

"I like Lily," James replied staunchly. "I wanna be with her forever."

"O-Okay."

James glanced between the two of them; Remus who kept rubbing his neck, and Sirius who wouldn't meet his eye. "I shouldn't have said anything," he chuckled, the humour not meeting his eyes. "Things are just different now, is all. Exams are pretty well finished, we're all about to leave school... It's just curiosity, right?"

"It's alright to be curious," said Remus.

"Yeah," Sirius shrugged. "Like, if you really wanted to know what it's like to kiss Moony you could've just asked."

"Really?"

"No!"

James grinned, then stood up from his bed. "Aw, Pads, no need to be jealous. You want a kiss too? C'mere, I'll make it up to you!"

"Piss off!"

But James didn't. He sprung forward like a cat, grappling Sirius even as he was playfully beaten and slapped. When he failed to reach his lips, James turned and hugged Remus instead, which only made Sirius want to pry him off even more.

“Don't be stingy, Padfoot! I want some boyfriend love too."

“Too bad! This one’s mine, go find your own!”

Sirius shoved him, and Remus was unable to stop it as they all fell back onto James' bed in a tangle of limbs. By then James was laughing —that great infectious guffaw of his that always brought a smile to each of their faces. Sirius laughed, then Remus too, and they were all done for. The laughter was still going even several moments later when their bedroom door opened and Peter strolled in.

“It's done, lads!" He cried. "Tape’s all fin—Oh, Jesus fuck... If this is your way of telling me that you’re really a part of some homoerotic triad I might actually have to kill myself.”

Sirius flung James’ arm off and sat up. “Nah, we wouldn't leave you out, Wormy! Here, let Daddy Padfoot give you a big ol' smooch.”

The next day, as they made their way down to the church for that morning’s communion, Remus kept the small tape clutched tightly in the palms of his hands. He hadn’t let the thing out of his sight since Peter had finished it, it was too valuable. They’d actually done it—it was real!

Their very first demo.

When Remus had first suggested they record a demo of themselves that day in the classroom, he had no idea just how good it would be for the four of them. It was the perfect way to reconcile after the Peter fight—instantly nothing mattered more than the music. Not relationships, not A-Levels, not even sleep—only the band.

And it was exactly what they’d promised! Each of them put in their fair share of long hours at the music room, perfecting every lyric and every melody until Filch was all but chasing them out with a pitchfork, and even then, they never fought once. It was almost a miracle. Figuring out the recording bit had been tricky—there was only so much room on the tape and more than once they'd ended up taping right over their already finished work—but after finally getting the hang of it, things had just come together. The demo had a little piece of all of them—Sirius’ bombastic ‘Downtown Girls’, James’ incessantly cheesy ‘Letter to a Lily’, even an entire three-minute drum-solo spearheaded by Peter.

Initially Remus had been a bit hesitant, but the tape's final draft also included ‘Tonya’s Song’, though... only as an instrumental. He quite couldn't bring himself to sing the words, and though Sirius had offered, it just felt better this way. Tonya was a plaster he still wasn't quite ready to rip off, but thankfully his friends' intrepid love and talent made up for it.

"Almost seems a shame, leaving it in a box for twenty years," James yawned, stretching his arms up over his head as they filed into the pew. For the most part the church was empty; they'd made the mistake of coming down to the church early after James had forgotten to do headcount the night before. He'd spent all morning rushing around, ensuring that all of the Godric boys were alive and counted for. Watching him almost made Remus feel sorry for every dorm monitor that'd had to put up with the likes of them over the years. They'd probably given poor Kenny a few premature greys.

"We'll make another one," Sirius vowed, taking a seat between James and Remus. "Next one'll be even better than the last, you'll see. We can rent a real studio! In London, even."

"Are you sure?" Asked Peter. "I find it hard to believe that just anyone can waltz in off the street like that."

"You can if you have the cash."

"Dad'll kill us if we just buy our way up, you know. He says—" James stopped for another yawn. "He says it's not how it's done."

"Only because rock stars so often start out as dirt poor," Sirius drawled, "but yeah sure, we'll 'work our way up'."

"With what job?" Remus asked, tucking the tape away. "Gotta get one first. And you're about as work-hardy as a spring daisy."

"Look, it's a bloody job, okay? I'll get one—work at a pub or something. How hard can it be to pour a pint for a couple 'a old codgers."

"Mum's got a friend who runs this real fancy restaurant in the city!" James said. "She figures she could get me a gig waiting tables. Want me to ask for you as well?"

Sirius made a face, then shivered. "Thanks, Prongs, but no thanks, I got cousins in the city, Andy's family. And I'd rather spend the entire night scraping gum off bar stools in Hackney than risk having to fetch them their 'lemon water, no ice'."

"He says, having never done a day of work in his life." James craned his head. "Moony, how 'bout you?"

“Uh…”

“Nah, no way!” Sirius cried, grabbing Remus by the shoulders. “Hundred pounds says this guy’s gonna end up working at some twee little bookshop. ‘Pardon me, son, have you seen any copies of “Das Kapital” sitting around by chance?’—‘Oh, yes sir! That’ll be aisle twelve! And if you’re looking for some nice, light reading, may I suggest “Mein Kampf”? Very inspirational, that’.”

"You are an idiot," said Remus.

“Swotsaidwhat?"

Remus hit him with a bible, and James laughed as he watched Sirius bitterly rub his shoulder.

"What about you, Pete?" Remus asked, turning to his other side. "Got any plans?”

“Yeah, wanna work at a fine London bistro together?” James offered enthusiastically, pushing Sirius' head out of the way. Down the row, Peter looked away, mumbling under his breath;

“Erm… Yeah well, about that… Dad called yesterday actually. Called it an 'ultimatum'. Says if I’m not going to school, then I have to work with him at the press.”

"What crap!" Sirius cried, before raising his arms up behind his head and slumping down in the pew. “Sounds like he’s trying to bloody indoctrinate you.”

“I thought he was fine with you taking a year off?” Remus asked.

“He was, but guess he decided he doesn't want me slumming around and doing nothing.”

“Music’s not nothing,” Sirius tsked.

“You try telling him that.”

“S’alright, work the job, Wormtail,” James said. “Show him you're dedicated. We can make the band work on the weekends.”

It wasn’t the news that they’d wanted, but Sirius managed to keep his mouth shut and no one said anything more on the subject. Eventually a swirl of chatter began filling the air as more and more students arrived to find their seats. Next to him in the pew, Remus felt Sirius begin to wiggle as though he couldn't get comfortable. He turned to him and raised a brow in question, and Sirius just shrugged half-heartedly before gesturing to the front of the church.

"You'd think they'd have taken it down by now," he muttered. "It's such an eye-sore."

The eye-sore in question was the large statue of Christ, still hung up at the front of the church but now covered from view. It'd been several months since Sirius' outburst—the only that had left the statue without a nose. They'd all been hoping the school would remove it, but instead a while sheet had been draped over top of the statue and was to remain until term ended and the God-son's nose could be repaired.

"At least you don't have to stare at it anymore?" Remus offered.

Sirius shrugged grumpily. "Wonder if Reg knows I did it." He nodded his head to a busy pew a few rows ahead, where Regulus was sitting with Barty. It was with great pleasure that Remus spotted Trish on his opposite side, their shoulders nearly touching. As he watched, Barty reached around Regulus and yanked a fistful of Trish's hair. It would've given Remus cause enough to intervene, had Trish not immediately retaliated by scooping up one of the bibles and thumping Barty over the head with it. He could see Regulus snapping at the both of them afterwards, probably telling them to act their age, which they'd both refuse—snidely.

"Imagine you hid someone behind it," Remus mused, pointing to the sheet and attempting to improve Sirius' mood. "And then the priests go to take off the tarp and end up scared shitless."

The corner of Sirius' mouth tweaked upwards. "You could jump out in the middle of the service."

"Wearing a robe and wig."

"Or naked."

Remus laughed, and imagined Regulus telling them to act their age. Then he laughed harder.

"You look as though you're having a good morning," Lily smiled, as she and the girls appeared in the row behind them. She kissed the top of James' hair before sitting, and Sirius immediately swivelled around in his pew to face them.

“Evans, McKinnon! You two tell them about the tape yet?”

“Let us wake up a bit first, Black,” Marlene said, still rubbing her eyes; “Yes, we told them.”

“Brilliant idea, right?” James grinned.

“Uh-huh, I love it,” said Lottie. “Our own time capsule! One to replace the shitty one they unearthed last term, right Marls?”

Marlene nodded in agreement.

“I think the tape’s a cute idea too,” Mary agreed. “I’m still undecided on a song though. Like, do I want to go with the expected choice, which would be amazing regardless, or should I try for something more interesting—more éblouissant? Which would also be amazing too. Obviously. Hm... Maybe I should compile a list.”

“Pick whatever song you want, just don’t tell us what it is,” Sirius said.

“Why not?” Lottie asked. “I thought we were putting it on the same tape.”

“We are, but it’s supposed to be a secret. At least until we play it.”

“Which will only be twenty years from now,” Marlene scoffed.

“Exactly! Now you’re getting it, McKinnon.”

Still stroking James' wild hair, Lily smiled and sat back in her pew. “Seems a bit silly, why wouldn’t we just play it together now? I want to know what you chose.”

“Have faith, Evans,” Sirius smirked, giving her a final wink.

The Marauders’ plans became reasonably predictable after that. They kept up with their band practices, and Remus continued to meet with Sheila on the regular. She was ecstatic when he told her that they’d actually managed to piece together their own tape, but when she asked to hear it, Remus had to stupidly refuse. He did consider sneaking it away just for her, but the demo had already proved to be too much of a temptation. For days they went back and forth over whether or not to listen to it, torn between pride over something they created and also entirely too nervous that even a single listen would point out all of their mistakes. They'd never listened to a recording of themselves before; and so, to settle the debate, Sirius had taped the demo to the ceiling of their bedroom, where it might be seen at all times and they could each hold the other accountable. In the very least, it was certainly one of their most questionable decor choices yet.

With their demo done and summer growing ever nearer, most students found themselves free to do as they pleased. Even the teachers seemed to have already checked out for the holiday, but Hawkings itself was in a tizzy preparing for the hosting of the final football tournament. Meanwhile rumours of parties and celebration swirled about campus, egged on by the idea that Remus and his friends had yet to unveil some grand plot that would put all of their previous marauder-ing to shame. Though whenever asked, all four Marauders appeared to playing dumb. Firstly because they didn't want their plans to be foiled before being brought to fruition, but also because they'd yet to make any. Sirius had claimed that a regular old leavers party would be boring and not in line with their usual end-of-term tomfoolery at all, but so far none of them had been able to come up with anything better than the usual 'chickens in the dorm room' gag.

While they hummed and hawed, the days passed until there were hardly any left. The tournament would be on them before they knew it, and there wasn't much else to do aside from look forward to whatever was coming next. It felt odd that none of them would be returning in the following autumn, but it didn't mean there wasn't any excitement in the air. Remus and Sirius would be returning to the Potters' until the four of them could find a place big enough on their own, and come September Lily would be joining them as well. While they worked and peddled their band, Lily would be starting a criminal justice degree at the University College of London, where she hoped to one day earn herself a spot in their faculty of law.

To no one's surprise, Mary had decided to study French at a London university as well, where she would be living separately from her family and taking voice lessons at a local conservatory on the side. She had tried to convince Marlene to move in with her, but the flat Mary had her eye on was in South Kensington, and the weekly rent alone would've been more than Mr. McKinnon made in a month. Lottie, meanwhile, would be returning home to live with her parents for the first time since she was a little girl. Her boyfriend Roger had been overseeing his father's holding company out in Reading for several months and was expected to remain until the following year, and so Lottie had made plans to attend a women's bookkeeping course in the city for a few days during the week, so that she might be able to take the train and see him on weekends. Marlene still maintained loose plans to throw her lot in with various charities and not-for-profit programs, though more recently it had come out just how badly her parents disapproved. Their wish for Marlene was that she attend a women's college closer to home, but when Marlene refused over Easter, the family's relationship with their only daughter had begun to deteriorate. Apparently rumours had started swirling at the McKinnon's church ever since it'd come out what sort of charity programs Marlene had been looking into. Most of them focused on helping young women and single mothers, but others had to do with more... social issues. Racial empowerment and queer rights were among the most condemned.

After that Marlene had decided that she would be moving out of her parents' house and into a shared living space in Southeast London. The flat itself was already being rented out by a few of the people who'd helped organise her trip to Morocco, and Marlene seemed excited for the change, despite her family's disapproval. Mrs. McKinnon threw a terrible fit when she heard, distraught over the soiled state of daughter's chastity and mortal soul. She began calling Marlene every night in a desperate attempt to get her to reconsider, but Marlene was resolute. Not only would she be moving out, she also told her mother that she would no longer be attending church. Afterwards Mrs. McKinnon said that she would pray for her, and that she was going to hell.

The eight of them spent a lot of time during those last few weeks exchanging plans and celebrating each other's big and small victories. As it turned out, Remus' friends weren't the only ones with exciting plans either. Jillian Stewart was off to Leeds to study economics, while Davey Gudgeon was heading into finance and starting off with an impressive internship at some large bank in Manchester. Several of Lottie's girlfriends were going abroad, while a few kids they knew from music class had been granted placement at various conservatories all across the country. Frankie Vasile, president of the school's photography club since his eighth year and someone whom Remus barely ever spoken to, was apparently headed to New York to intern for an American magazine. Even Moira was excited to share her news—that she was London-bound as well, and would be attending St. Mary's University. Apart from the general news of admission, there was talk of scholarships too. One of the lads on James' football team was set to play for the University of Northumbria—though Sirius had kindly added that this was purely because his father sat on the school's board of directors. James took it in stride, but there was no denying the little boy inside who still dreamed of being a football star.

“Don't be down, James. You could’ve gotten a top-tier scholarship if you'd wanted,” Peter told him kindly. “You’ll probably still get offers after the last game! McGonagall’s invited scouts, right?”

“Yeah, but I’m not so sure the scouts’ll be all that impressed.”

“And why wouldn’t they be?” Demanded Sirius.

Instead of answering, James shifted his gaze to Marlene, who looked positively red-faced and maybe just a little bit guilty. The eight of them were sitting around the common room together, soaking up what was to be one of their final evenings all in the same place. The girls still hadn’t finished with the tape (Mary kept changing her mind on what song she wanted to put on it) but they were still on track to bury the time capsule after the football tournament, which was now only a day away.

With all eyes on her, Marlene sighed and finally relented;

“They won’t be impressed because Potter, here, has decided to play the rebel. The tournament board has refused his request to allow us girls play on the winning team, so he's decided to throw the whole thing."

"You mean you're not going to play?" Lily gasped.

"Of course we're gonna play," said James. "Didn't you lot hear what McKinnon was saying? They won't let the girls play on the winning team, but if we don't win then their rules mean bupkis!"

“I don't follow," Peter groaned. "Why wouldn't you want to win?"

"Alright, hear me out then." Looking very giddy, James spread his hands out on the coffee table he was sitting before, as if he were about to orchestrate a team play-by-play. “The board’s exact words were ‘no team eligible for an on the podium win may employ players of the opposite sex’. Well, actually they said ‘secondary sex’, but we already knew they were a bunch of misogynistic dickheads anyway... But don't you see? They can’t stop us from playing, only placing. We may not get their stupid trophy, but we could still win the whole thing!”

The rest of them were clearly astounded. Win but not win? Somehow it was as fitting as it got. As James beamed at them, Marlene continued her role as the realist and clarified; "Ms. Hooch is still negotiating our claim, so we won't know for sure if we can play until tomorrow when the match starts. If they refuse, us girls have already voted that the boys play. We'd rather sit out than see anyone else take first place."

"This is so wonderful," Lily said, still utterly gobsmacked. "And no offence Marls, but James... Are you sure you want to leave school without even placing? It's your final year, you've worked so hard."

"All of us have," James insisted. "And it's been for the better! So much has changed on the team since McKinnon and the girls started playing with us—the whole attitude is different! I have guys who used to make jokes about hiding under the game stands to peek up girls skirts, now speaking up when other prigs make nasty comments in class. They're actually calling their mums on their birthdays and being kind to their sisters, and five of them have already been approved as prefects for next year!"

"Yeah, they're practically feminists now," Marlene said snidely. "Did you hear that the other girls have given Potter a nickname? 'James the Good'."

"It's you girls who are the good ones," James told her. "You try, which is more than any of us can ask for. The team would be lesser without you, and I'm not the only one who knows it."

"Damn," Mary said, sniffling dramatically as she turned to Lily; "If you don't marry him, Lily, I will."

"So what does McGonagall think of all this?" Lottie called, busy painting Sirius' toenails a dark black.

"I'll bet she's on board, right?" Sirius laughed, watching Lottie paint.

"No, she's just giving Potter the benefit of the doubt," Marlene said. "She probably doesn't think we'll actually do it."

James grinned. "Well then, McKinnon, just imagine the look on her face when we do."

* * *

Wednesday 14th June 1978 — Day 1 of the Tournament

As per usual, James Potter was awake and shining before Remus could be legally considered a living person. Perhaps it was easy for him, knowing that he was about to break every sacred law known to competitive football, but justice came when the thick idiot decided that it was his job to make sure that his roommates also had to be up with the larks.

“C’mon, Pete, my good man. Up and at 'em! Here, I've brought you some milk."

Remus heard Peter grumble back distantly, and the faint whooshing of James opening his curtains. He almost wished it to be a dream, but the sure-found feeling of Sirius’ breath on the back of his neck told Remus that it was definitely real.

“It’s game day, you guys!” James continued. “Don’t you lazy lard-farts want to come out and support your friends?”

“Nhgnnn… five more minutes, Mum…”

“Typical... Oi, Black! You get up too! You promised to record the team’s drill times.”

There came the sound of padding feet, but instead of crossing to Sirius’ bed, James had strode directly up to Remus’.

“Alright, that’s it! It's been three years, Moony, and today is finally the day! You keep sleeping in like this and one day you’ll be ten feet tall and we’ll have to bend you sideways just to fit through a—AUGH!”

Before he’d even finished his rant, James whipped back the bed curtains, blasting Remus and Sirius with the sun’s bright morning rays and nearly pissing himself in the process. Clearly he hadn’t been expecting to find the pair of them together in bed, which made sense.

Up until that moment they’d been sure to be careful not to be caught, but they’d all stayed up late the night before playing card games with the girls and practising their early-life alcoholism. Only James and Marlene had abstained, wanting to be in top shape for the game, and on their way to bed Remus had stopped in at the loo only to find out later that Sirius had slithered his way under the covers, and well… he hadn’t the mind to tell him off.

As the pair of them wriggled back and forth like half-naked vampires sizzling in the sun, James slapped a hand to his forehead. “Sirius—what are you bloody doing in there?!”

“Well, I was sleeping, you twat!”

“But—But this is Moony’s bed!”

“Really? Shit, thanks for letting me know, mate. Now will you kindly piss off!?” With an irritated grunt, Sirius sat up and threw a pillow at James, who was still standing there, gawking.

“Right, sorry—! Didn’t mean to intrude on your and Moony’s—erm… horizontal tango.”

Remus, who had been warding off the brightness of the room with an arm over his eyes, promptly turned over to face the wall. “Fuck off…”

“Tell you what, Potter,” he heard Sirius grunt, “how ‘bout you take Wormy down to the pitch with you for warm up, and Moony and I can actually get to tangoing.”

James gave a very exaggerated sigh, but finally pulled the curtains closed again and doused them in darkness.

“Remember, Black, my bed’s off-limits!" He warned. "Otherwise I start telling everyone the story about how you had your first wet dream during that time you spent the night in the infirmary with the nurse.”

“I was delirious with fever!”

“Yeah, that’s what they all say.”

Chuckling despite himself, Sirius turned over and pressed his face into the crook of Remus’ neck. “Hear that, Moons? Three beds left.”

"… You fuck off too.”

It took some time, but eventually James had Peter dressed and was ushering him out of the room for a very early breakfast.

“Why don’t they have to go?” Peter whined.

“ ‘Cause they’re in love," said James.

“This is discrimination.”

“That’s… not what discrimination means, Pete…”

The door clicked shut and Remus resolved to go back to sleep, only the thought lasted for about as long as it took for Sirius to run a teasing finger over the shell of his ear.

“Mooooooonyyyyyy…”

“Ugh… bloody menaces, all of you… What time even is it?”

Some curtain rustling, and then the rattling ting of his alarm clock being lifted off the side table. “Half past six.”

“I’m going to break his legs.”

Sirius set the alarm clock down and curled back into Remus, pressing gentle kisses to the top of his spine. “Oh Moony…” Kiss. “Dear Moony…” Kiss. “Lovely Moony…”

“Whatever you’re trying to do—" Oh damn; "won’t work…”

Kiss. “Shall I sing to you then?” Kiss. “ 'You are my moonshine, my only moonshine…” Kiss. “ 'You make me happy, when skies are grey…” Kiss. “ 'You’ll never know, dear, how much I love you…” Kiss, kiss, kiss. “ 'Please don’t take my moonshine agh—WAY'!”

> > >

In one deft move, Remus had flipped them both and held Sirius against the covers in a cage made from his own body. He didn’t bother waiting for some witty retort that Sirius had been inevitably plotting for the last month—just simply kissed him, silencing his stupidly beautiful voice with his own tongue. As he did, their noses knocked together and Remus could feel the shape of Sirius' morning erection against his lower stomach, driving him insane.

When they finally broke apart again, Sirius was panting, but Remus wasted no time.

“Show me.”

Licking his perfect lips, Sirius grinned and quickly grasped the waistband of his sleeping shorts, pulling them down and straight off. There was no shirt to be removed—it being June—and as Sirius raised his leg into the air to remove his shorts, Remus caught his calf and pressed his lips to the muscle of it, before nipping at the skin with his teeth.

“Now you,” Sirius urged, reaching out to tug at Remus’ pants himself. They came off without much effort, sliding to Remus’ knees as Sirius cupped all of him into his palm and squeezed. Sucking in a breath through his teeth, Remus fell forward again and Sirius chased his lips, sneaking several quick kisses just as Remus turned and buried his face into the crook of his neck, inhaling all of him.

While Remus set to marking up his lover's neck like a map, Sirius kept his hands tight between the both of them, using the full extent of those clever fingers of his until they were both an inch from completion.

"There! Move a little—yeah, there, just there."

Sirius said nothing, just bit down on his bottom lip as they moved in tandem. Finally Remus fit his arm between them, pushing one of Sirius' hands away to cup them himself. Sirius' skin tasted sweet when they kissed, still clumsily washing over one another until they were little more than a tangle of sweaty limbs. With his free hand, Sirius reached around and knotted his fingers into Remus' hair, pulling his head back until it stung at the roots. From there every part of him was tight—pulled to the utter edge, and when it was over Sirius had to silence him with another kiss. He shivered as the tip of Sirius' tongue traced the ridges of his palate, and Sirius made a little noise that would've undone him all over again were he not already spent.

"Again...?" Sirius breathed. "Wanna touch you."

Remus didn't need telling twice.

> > >

When their appetites for each other were once again sated and the sun was no longer staring them straight in the window, Remus turned over in bed and let himself drink in the image of his boyfriend as he laid beside him. Sirius was smiling up at him, still haloed by the dishevelled bed sheets. He used one painted finger to trace the hint of stubble around Remus' jaw, then his lips. Inside his mouth, Remus' tongue felt thick; he could still feel the faint sting of little crescent shapes Sirius had left along the tops of his shoulders. Bliss, actually.

"Seems a shame," Sirius said, his voice husky from sleep and sex's soft rasp; "to go out there and pretend as though I didn't just reduce you to… this."

"Oh, you reduced me, did you?"

"Yeah, I mean look at yourself. You're a mess, Moons."

Remus kissed his swollen lips. "We could always go again. Give me a chance to catch up."

“Is there time?”

“There’s always time.”

Sirius chuckled, and it turned into a brazen purr as he sat up and took Remus’ hand, pressing two of his fingers to the pad of his own mouth. Remus watched, utterly entranced, as he turned it this way and that; sliding his tongue between the digits, nibbling each knuckle and swathing them until they glittered with damp.

"What is the time anyway?" Sirius finally asked, kissing each knuckle. With a disinterested grunt, Remus detached himself from Sirius and pressed up onto his elbows to fumble for the clock sitting on his bedside. Unfortunately it slipped, hitting the floor and skittering over to Peter’s bed with a sharp rattle.

“Uh… it’s late m’sure.” He sighed and flopped back down amongst the warm covers. “Suppose we should get moving…”

“Suppose we should.”

“Then again... don’t really want to.”

Sirius wrinkled his nose with a smile. “Me neither.”

“Shit," Remus smirked. "The things we do for our friends.”

By the time they made it down to the stadium, the Hawkings team was nearly finished with their warm up. It became obvious straight away that they were the only ones on the pitch with boys and girls on the team. Already Remus could see the others huddling around, eyeing James and his crew as they ran drills up and down the grass. A large table had been set up at the edge of the green for the tournament directors and scouts to watch. Beyond them, the vast stands were bustling with staff and students. Plenty of students had dressed up in the school’s colours of maroon and gold to show their support while some had even brought homemade banners bearing the names and player numbers of each of their friends.

Remus and Sirius didn’t bother finding a seat, and instead made a beeline for the players’ bench, where they found James chatting with Ms. Hooch, occasionally tossing nervous glances over his shoulder at the row of scouts.

“Ready to kick some ass?!” Sirius barked, the moment they’d approached.

“Leave the language for after the game, Mr. Black,” Ms. Hooch chastised, before patting James confidently on the arm and strolling off in the direction of the directors’ table.

“About time! Though to be honest I'd already put you two down as likely to miss the first half,” James said. He looked like a right dish in his brand-new football shirt, though the sports goggles he had to wear in lieu of his glasses were slightly unfortunate. But it was James; bloody tosser could make anything look good.

"Yeah, I'm starving," Sirius complained. "Got anything to eat?"

James shook his head, then handed them each a protein bar from the player's bench. Ripping away the wrappings, Remus bit into his and grimaced. Ugh, like sawdust.

“Have you had any trouble yet?” He asked around his chewing. “About the girls, I mean?”

“Nah, not yet. Reckon they must think it’s just for warm-up. A few of the other teams were cracking jokes earlier about cheerleaders, but at least they seem plenty distracted.” James cast a look over his shoulder to where several boys in opposing sports shirts were mulling about, busy watching the girls as they put in their drills. Across the field, Remus caught sight of Marlene barking orders and leading the team in a round of jumping-jacks.

“McKinnon already kicked one of them in the balls for making some dumb comment, but it was off the field so the refs couldn't do nothing. It was kinda awesome."

“Man, what I wouldn’t have given to see that,” Sirius agreed.

“You might have seen it," James pointed out; "if you weren’t so busy getting your rocks off."

“Sorry you didn’t have time for a morning shag, Prongs. Maybe if you had, you’d have less to whinge about.”

“You would know. Honestly, I'm surprised the both of you fit on that tiny bed.”

“We make it work. Positioning is key, Potter.”

"I'll remember that. But in the meantime, I'm sorry to say you've been replaced. Pete's volunteered to be water-boy this year, so you two'll have to sit in the stands with the girls."

“Bollocks, there goes my streak,” Sirius tsked sarcastically; "But it's fine. Moony and I were gonna get high under the stands anyway.”

“Nice. Really feeling the show of support.”

“You guys’ll be out here all day,” Sirius scoffed. “Make it to the final game and maybe we’ll bother with showing up.”

James promptly punched him in the arm, and Sirius moaned, holding his shoulder. “Moony, he’s abusing me!”

“Think you deserve it this time.”

“Damn you, Potter, you’ve turned my own Moony against me.”

“I told you last time, he's our Moony!”

“What’s this about our Moony?” Mary echoed, coming up behind them with her friends in tow. Lily had James’ shirt number, #8, painted on both cheeks in bright red, while Mary was sporting Marlene’s #9 on hers. Similarly, Lottie had gone with the crowd and painted both cheeks maroon and gold, with sparkling eyeshadow and lipstick to match.

“Nothing,” Remus finished, just as Sirius said; “Don't you guys look festive.”

“Shall we do yours?” Lottie offered.

“Yeah, go on then!”

Looking giddy, Lottie produced a pan of face paints and got to donning Sirius' cheeks with red and gold hearts. When she’d finished, Sirius turned to Remus and batted his eyelashes.

“Do I look pretty, Moony?”

“Pretty stupid.”

"Love you too."

Smirking, Remus leaned down to allow Lottie to do the same to him. She’d only finished the first cheek before Ms. Hooch came rushing back up, flapping her clipboard.

“Ladies and gentlemen, ladies and gentlemen—I have news!”

“From the directors?” James demanded. "What did they say?! Have they shut us down?! But our loophole—!"

"No, no, Mr. Potter. I'm afraid I only bring good news! Now where is Miss McKinnon?"

Turning very quickly, James cupped his hands around his mouth to holler Marlene's name across the field. She—and everyone nearby—turned to look and quickly Marlene jogged over to meet them.

“You’ve got the verdict then?” She demanded, breathless.

“I have pleaded your case fervently, and you should know that although the directors are positively livid, there is nothing in that flimsy old rulebook of theirs that says women are not on the field. So if you're all quite sure, I'll say just this—you may not be eligible to win today, but you will certainly play.”

“Fuck yeah!” Sirius cried, before clamping a hand over his mouth. “Oops—sorry Hooch.”

The coach shook her head, while Marlene and the girls squealed in their excitement. None were as loud as James though, who grabbed Marlene and swung her around with a hoot of victory.

"We did it, McKinnon, we did it!"

“Yes, now get out there!” Ms. Hooch told them. “Get out there and show them that a person's sex does not determine champions.”

After James had kissed Lily goodbye and Marlene stopped to hug all of them, the pair took off across the field to tell their team the good news. As the crowd settled in and got ready for kick-off, Lily nudged Remus and beckoned him up the stairs.

“You coming? We have seats near the top.”

“Be there in a sec,” Sirius said, taking Remus by the arm.

“How many games do they have to play today?” Remus asked, as they turned and began walking behind the stands.

“Two today, and the final tomorrow if they make it,” Sirius said, already rifling around in his jacket pockets. It made Remus laugh.

“I don’t know why you insisted on wearing your leather jacket. It’s June.”

“Looks cooler. Gotta impress these townies from outta town. Plus, how else am I to hide these?” Cheekily, Sirius pulled the collar of his jacket back to reveal several hickies that had formed along his collarbone. Seeing them, Remus tried not to be too pleased with himself as Sirius went back to padding down his pockets.

“Shit. Where’d I—ah-hah! There we are...” Sirius produced a baggie of several joints, which he'd most certainly nicked from Remus' drawer. “What?" He said. "You thought I was joking? I never joke about getting high, Moons. And besides, are you really going to be able to make it through an entire day of football sober?”

Remus considered.

The answer was no.

“Come now, my eternal conscience," Sirius laughed, "we’ll be back before they even drop the first ball."

They ended up skirting around the back of the stands as promised, ducking between the overgrown grass and leaning against one of the support beams. Remus was already properly stoned by the time they were caught. Luckily it was not a teacher, but a group of boys from another school. They wore matching dark green sports shirts and football boots; two of them were more lean and lanky, like the average secondary boy, but the one in front could’ve passed for a Clark Kent body-double. He was handsome, with green eyes and a dimple on each cheek.

"Sorry," he said, "didnae mean tae interrupt. We're looking for the toilets."

"Won't find 'em here," Sirius teased, making Remus laugh enough to start coughing around the end of his spliff.

“There’s always a few at ev’ry school," the handsome boy mused, already nudging his pals. "Even the ones for dreary English loons. Suppose yew were trying tah hide then?”

“That was the plan,” said Remus. "Congrats, you caught us."

“Hard not to. A'body could follow the smell."

Sirius took another drag, humming contently. “No one's paying attention, and 'sides we know our way around. What school you three from then?”

“Brentford, in Aberdeen.”

“Brentford? I remember you, you’re the ones that nearly beat our school in the tournament last year."

"You heard that?"

"Our best friend’s the team captain.”

“Is he now? That'd be Potter, right? Yeah, they put up a hard fight. Too bad we’re looking tae actually win this year,” the handsome boy grinned, then gestured to himself. “I’m Cal, team captain myself. This is John and Nut.”

Remus snorted. “ ‘Nut’?”

“Short fer Nutley,” one of the others answered.

“Sirius Black.” Sirius held out his hand to Cal. “This here’s Lupin.”

“ ‘Lupin’?” Nut echoed.

“Short for Loopy,” Remus answered, grinning around his spliff.

“Nice tae make yer acquaintance,” Cal said. “We’ve—erm… seen yer team actually. Ye’ve got quite the line-up.”

“That’s right,” Sirius said, then; “Isn’t Brentford a boys school?”

“Aye."

"Must be pretty boring, that."

"We have our moments. Still, ne’er seen a team with girls on it participate in an official tourny.”

“The future is now, Cal. Those girls are gonna have their own professional league one of these days. Today though, they'll settle for kicking your ass."

“Guess we'll have tae see.” Cal gave them the same smirk and nodded.

“Tell Potter good luck. We expect tae see him ‘n his motley crew in the finals t’morra.”

“Will do.” Taking the joint from Remus, Sirius held it out in offer. “But how about a hit for the road then? You know, as friendly competition.”

Cal considered, before finally caving. “Why the fuck not, we’re nae playing right awae.” He took his drag, before passing it along to his mates, and finally back to Sirius. “Thanks fer that.”

“Anything for a couple ‘a sods about to lose.”

Suddenly the feedback from a microphone echoed around the stadium, and the announcer—some twelfth year from the AV club—cleared his throat.

“HELLO FOLKS! Welcome to the first game of the 1978 Inter-School Cup! First on the pitch today is the home team of Hawkings and visiting team, Baldragon. Now let’s put our hands together in a warm welcome as the Baldragon team takes to the pitch!”

There was a dull roar, and Cal straightened up. “Should be getting awn then. First half's the best time to scope ‘oot the competition. Be see ye, Sirius Black.” He nodded at Remus. “Loony.”

Remus nodded back, curt and uncharmed.

“Oh and, crackin’ makeup.” Cal pointed to his cheeks before waving Sirius off and joining his teammates in heading toward the pitch. As soon as they’d gone Remus turned on Sirius, who was touching the face paint on his cheeks as though he’d forgotten Lottie had put it on him.

“What was that?”

Sirius dropped his hands. “What?"

"That."

"I was just being cordial, Moons.”

“You were not! You had your flirting face on.”

“My what?" Sirius stopped to cackle. "That's it, you’re totally high. Seeing things, even!”

“Hmph. Seeing things. Right.” Remus stood and began ambling off in the direction the boys had gone. Sirius stood too, attempting to hobble after him while also stubbing the spliff out on the bottom of his boot.

“Oi, where you going then?”

“To find my own athlete to flirt with!”

“Well, hold on—wait for me! I wanna watch!”

As it turned out, Sirius was right; watching football while high was much more preferable to the usual sort. Once they’d stumbled their way to the top of the stands, the girls made room and they both sat, giggling about something Sirius had said but Remus couldn’t even remember.

“You two stink,” Lily complained, waving a hand in front of her nose.

“Not possible, this one showers like twice a day,” Remus said, nudging Sirius and making him laugh harder.

"Gotta keep the mane glossy, Evans!"

They’d made it in time for kick-off, but the bit that came after was mostly a blur. Sirius had an easier time keeping track—knowing more about football than Remus ever would—but Remus made sure to continue cheering when the crowd did so he wouldn’t stick out. He recognised that when Mary shouted a little louder than the rest it meant Marlene must’ve done something smashing, but then again Mary was always cheering. When she wasn’t, she was having an imaginary screaming match with the referee.

“DIDN’T ANYONE SEE THAT?” She bellowed. “THAT ARSE-FACE TOTALLY TRIED TO TRIP HER! REF WHERE ARE YOUR EYES?!”

Remus thought about asking when she’d suddenly gotten to be such a sports expert, but then their team scored and everyone was leaping to their feet again as the announcer’s voice cast about the stadium;

“That was a score by Hawkings’ own Marlene McKinnon! Hawkings now leads with three-to-one! I’ve gotta say folks, these girls are really something!”

“Go Marlene!” Lottie shrieked, clapping her hands over her head as Mary did the same.

"That's my girl!"

Remus squinted to keep his eye on the ball. It whizzed about the field so quickly he could barely keep track, but when James got full-on body checked by another player, they all felt it. The entire crowd erupted into various 'oooooh!' s and quickly followed with booing until the ref finally blew his whistle and held up a yellow card.

"Potter goes down hard! That's one penalty against Baldragon for intense pushing."

"Get up, Potter!" Lily shouted. "Walk it off! Don't be a pansy!"

As if he could hear his girlfriend's verbal abuse, James did so, and several of his teammates rushed up to help dust him off while the crowd cheered.

"Potter's been awarded a penalty kick. Let's see if he makes it worthwhile…"

"Nah, James is killer at penalty kicks, he won't choke!" Sirius muttered passionately.

Everyone seemed to be holding their breath as James lined up at the edge of the opposing team's goal line. Even Remus was clenching his fists, barely clinging to the edge of his seat, but there was never a need for worry. The moment James' took off—leaping toward the ball with impossibly-long strides—it was clear he was undefeatable. His foot connected with the football and sent it spinning directly into the upper-corner of the net. The Baldragon goalkeeper didn't stand a chance.

"Potter scores! Hawkings now holds a four-to-one lead! They are certainly a team to watch for sure!"

The crowd instantly rallied, and Remus cheered as both Sirius and Lily threw themselves over him in celebration.

When the final whistle blew, it was Hawkings on top. The roar of the crowd could've been heard for miles, and no one was immune to it. Even Professor McGonagall celebrated—dancing around the edge of the field with Ms. Hooch. Remus, along with everyone else, threw his arms up and cheered until he was blue in the face, though if he could've heard himself, he might've been more embarrassed;

"WHOO! YEAH, GO EVERYONE! Blimey… are we done then? I'm fucking hungry…"

They didn't have to watch the next game since their school wasn't playing, and instead all of them rushed to congratulate their friends.

"Anyone see Marlene?" Mary demanded right away, using her vicious elbows to fight her way through the crowd of students mulling at the bottom of the stands.

"There. She's with Nicole," Lottie pointed.

Mary's face fell slightly as she spotted the other two girls, hugging each other out of happiness. They broke apart fast enough, almost looking a bit bashful, but Mary didn't hesitate. She walked straight up to the girls, congratulated Nicole on the win, and hugged her friend.

Off to Remus' left, James appeared, sweaty and shining like some golden sun god, and ripped off his sports goggles. "Daisy, we did it!" He cried, scooping Lily up as she threw herself into his arms and showered him with kisses. The show of love was sickening, and Remus thought snidely that if this was how they reacted after their first win, that James would be proposing by the end of the final match.

The team took their break at the dining hall, which was extra-full with the addition of the other school's players, and afterwards they all went outside to sprawl across the lush lawns. Content to pamper her winning players, Lottie offered Marlene a shoulder massage, but when it was James' turn, he humbly declined and Sirius got to accept on his behalf.

"Wormy, I swear, your sister's got magic hands," Sirius moaned, face-down in the grass. Next to them, Peter grimaced.

"So what's the plan for the rest of the day?" Mary asked, sucking on an ice lolly from the cafeteria. "Which team do you play next?"

"Hevershire College," James answered, eyes closed and head still tucked in Lily's lap. "But they're not that good, so should be a shoo-in. They'll still place as though they beat us because of the tournament's barmy rules, but we'll get to be the ones in the final game tomorrow."

"And who do you think you'll be facing?"

"Brentford, definitely. They're tough, but I reckon that if we keep on like we have been we'll have a real chance!"

“Can’t be that tough,” Remus muttered, munching on his egg and cress sandwich. “Their captain’s a bit of a tosspot.”

“He is not,” Sirius sniggered into the grass. “You just didn't like him. Not that I care, I love jealous Moony—ohhh! Yeah, right there, Lot!”

“You’ve met him? Is he proper fit?” Marlene taunted.

“Ixnay on the aptin-cay,” Remus shushed. “Just make sure you beat them tomorrow, okay, Potter?”

James saluted. “Aye-aye."

Everyone giggled, and as Lottie finished with her massage, Sirius rolled over, stretching and popping everything back into place. His face-paint was so smeared now that he looked as though he’d been hit with a red and gold glitter bomb. It made Remus nervous to think what his own cheeks looked like.

“I mean it Lot,” he sighed, “you’re like a magician. A wizard.”

Looking well-pleased, Lottie checked her nails. “Comes in handy with Roger too.”

“You do know you’ve only seen him in person like ten times,” Peter chirped. “That’s like once for every year he was alive before we were even born!”

“Some of us mature more rapidly than others, Petey.”

“Yeah, right. You just want to be his trophy wife. You know, I'm not even sure your relationship is legal.”

“Are you quite finished?" Lottie snapped. "Because you’re boring me.”

“Speaking of finished…” Sirius sat up, cracking his neck once more. “Don’t forget the tape. It’s going in the time capsule tomorrow after the game.”

“Already done," Mary announced. "I’ll give it to you at supper."

“Let me guess—ABBA?”

“You can find out in twenty years.”

Sirius smiled and reached over to kick the bottom of James’ football boot. “I suppose all that’s left is for you guys to kick ass in this tournament. Do try your best, I'd rather you not be mopey during our last day."

"Oh, we'll win alright," Marlene answered for him, "gotta put Remus' new arch-nemesis in his place, after all."

"He's not my arch-nemesis," Remus grumbled, patting his pockets for his cigs and a light. He'd just gotten one of the fags lit when Sirius scooted up to his side, reaching and grabbing him by the chain necklace he wore around his throat. Using it as leverage, Sirius pulled Remus in close and leaned into the cigarette, taking a long drag right off of his fingers. When he was finished, he mouthed the words 'I love you' and then exhaled the rest of the smoke with a silly grin.

It was enough to leave Remus blushing for the rest of the afternoon.

When lunch was over they all headed back over to the pitch to watch the final match. The rest of them got first dibs in the stands when James and Marlene went to warm up, and it was clear not even ten minutes into the game that Hawkings would take it. To be polite, Remus waited until half-time to split off to the loo, and on his way back, spotted little Sam Sheridan sitting beneath the stands on his own. He had a book with him, as Sam often did, and feeling rather candid, Remus ducked low beneath the metal bars to join him.

"Hey, Sam. What're you doing under here?"

Sam glanced up from his book, pushing his glasses up his nose. "Hiding," he said.

" 'Hiding'?" Remus licked his lips to cover a laugh. "From who?"

"From Fiona," Sam replied grimly.

"Ah, I remember her. She invited you to that dance on Valentine's, didn't she? I'm guessing it didn't go well?"

"It went terrible. She thinks I'm her boyfriend now."

"Are you?"

"No! It's mental, I don't want to be her boyfriend!"

"Have you tried telling her that?"

"Yes! ... Or, no." Sam sighed and Remus got a distinct feeling of déjà vu. "I tried staying in my room, but our dorm monitor wouldn't let anyone younger than sixteen stay behind on their own, and I hate playing sports—or watching them. So I hid here..."

Chuckling, Remus took a seat across from the other boy, stretching out his long legs amongst the weeds. "I'm not much one for sports either. You live in Piaget House, right?"

Sam nodded. "And you're best friends with our school's team captain, aren't you?"

"Yeah, that's James. He's playing now actually."

"He's nice. Last year some kids stole my glasses at lunch... He got them back."

"Sounds like James," Remus smiled, before nudging the toe of Sam's trainer. "What's that you're reading?"

Suddenly Sam grew very nervous. He snapped the book closed, then flipped it over in his lap so Remus couldn't see. Unfortunately for him, Remus had spent his fair share in the library, hunting for answers to a very queer set of questions. He recognised the back cover as well, and the writing on the spine; Maurice.

Suddenly Remus felt terrible. Sam was biting his thumbnail, face an angry red like he'd been caught doing something he shouldn't. He stood up, like he was going to run away, and Remus reached for him.

"Sam, it's alright."

"I-I don't want to talk to you anymore," Sam stammered. "We—We're not f-friends."

"Well, that's a shame. Since I sort of hoped we were."

Sam softened then, and Remus gave him what he hoped was a comforting smile. "I like 'Maurice'," he said. "It's a good book."

"You've read it?"

"Yeah. Twice, actually."

Sam's mouth opened in shock, and Remus beckoned for him to sit.

"It's alright to be nervous, you know. Or afraid," he told him, when Sam was back to nibbling his thumbnail in the dirt. "I'd say it's normal, even. People can be mean and they don't always understand."

"My dad thinks people like... Like Maurice are disgusting. He spat on a man once because he saw him holding hands with another man."

"I'm sorry that happened," Remus said. "But not everyone's like that, I promise."

"Do you think I'm a queer?" Sam murmured.

Remus smiled softly. "Do you think I'm a queer?"

He stared at him, with those big brown eyes, and ever-so-slightly, nodded.

"And do you think I'm disgusting?"

This time Sam shook his head. Suddenly Remus felt very light.

"Sam, how would you like to come watch the rest of the game with me and my friends? I know you don't really like football, and I can't really guarantee Fiona won't be there..."

"I'll come!" Sam chirped, already shoving the copy of Maurice into his bag. Grinning, Remus stood up and together they crawled back out from beneath the stands. Sam got a good laugh after Remus narrowly avoided smacking his head against one of the beams, but by then the game's second half had already kicked off.

As they rounded the end of the stands that faced toward the great green pitch, Remus slid an arm around his young friend's shoulders.

"Hey, Sam, have you ever heard of Queen?"

Chapter End Notes

A 'dosshouse' is a cheap lodging, often used by poor folk or those without a proper home.
If you're having a 'piss-up' then you're drinking a lot of alcohol.
'Taking shanks' pony' means to walk.
The Black Country accent is found in the West Midlands in England, near Birmingham.

There's only two (TWO!!!!) more chapters left of the school years. I almost can't believe it. My little babies are all grown up cries

Chapter 95: Here's to the Music

Chapter Summary

It's the final day of the tournament, and plots are being buried and hatched...

Chapter Notes

I edited this chapter while fully prone because I found out this morning that I have covid 💀 Not really in a serious way, more like an "are you fucking kidding me" sorta way, so if there are any glaring mistakes pls forgive me and just drop me a line or whatever.

On a lighter note, this week's chapter is dedicated to Charlotte. I consider her a dear friend, even if I'm always yelling at her for the UK's lack of appropriate synonyms ("lorry", "bin", "cupboard" I NEED MORE THAN THAT). She does like to say that I talk funny ("you say vague so weird" - Char, September 5th, 2022) but she's thinks Justin Bieber's voice is sexy (it's not) and she's actually a Scot so she sounds much funnier by default.
Also, she ships snily
No CW for this chapter. If you notice something that should be tagged, please let me know x

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Jenny said, when she was just about five years old,
“You know, my parents are gonna be the death of us all,
Two TV sets and two Cadillac cars,
Well, you know, ain’t gonna help me at all";

Then one fine morning, she turns on a New York station,
She doesn’t believe what she hears at all;
Ooh, she started dancin’ to that fine, fine music,
You know, her life was saved by rock’n roll;
Yeah, rock’n roll…

- “Rock & Roll” The Velvet Underground, 1970

Thursday 15th June 1978 — The Final Day of the Tournament

As promised, the Hawkings football team beat out their second opponent in a nail-biting 2 to 1 match. The team from Aberdeenshire was still guaranteed a spot near the top of the podium, but no one was celebrating yet. To win, Hawkings' first-ever co-ed team would have to beat out Brentford in the final game. The boys team had managed it the year before with no meagre amount of effort, but so far Brentford had been dominating on the field, with a startling 6 to 1 win over their previous opponents. Now with a few girls now thrown head-first into the fray, the championship game went from being about school pride to self ego—which in their current state, was worth far more than any ruddy trophy anyway.

Unfortunately, ego often made sickly monsters out of everyone.

“It’s bloody ridiculous. A mockery of the sport!"

“They can’t even place! Who would give up the chance for a first place trophy just to have a bunch of manky girls on the team...”

“Brentford’s gonna ground those henpecked bastards into the dust.”

“Bunch of bloody contrarians... They must think it's gonna get them noticed, but no league scout wants a player who’s gonna break the rules just to for the hell of it. Pointless...”

“Yeah, plus they all look like blokes!"

“Ha! Maybe these lads like blokes.”

“Heh! They should change their name—instead of Hawkings they can be ‘Arsemongers’.”

Remus wasn't entirely sure but he almost thought he could feel his blood boiling. The slander had been going on ever since their school's team had taken to the field the day before, but now that it was confirmed that Hawkings was to be playing in the final game, all bets were off. Every player in the tournament—loser or not—had come out to watch, and the stands were packed nearly to their bursting point. As James and Marlene led their team in a warm-up, Remus stood off to the side of the players' bench with Peter, helping him as he refilled water bottles. Down from them, a group of boys from another school had formed a circle at the edge of the pitch, mostly to shit-talk the other teams. And Remus might've been able to handle it, were they not speaking loudly enough that anyone within a twenty feet radius could hear them.

"If you had to pick one, which would it be?"

"Mm, one on the end I think, with the brown hair."

"Her? She's got shoulders bigger than my Pa. And no tits."

"Alright then, the one next to her. Though, might have to put a bag over her head first—heh."

If Remus had sleeves, they would've been pushed up to his elbows by now. Peter must've noticed this, as he came around the bench and got between Remus and the boys.

"Don't listen to them, Lupin. They've already lost, they just wanna run their mouth."

"Yeah? And how easy d'ya think it'd be to run their mouth with two fat lips?"

"There's like five of them and one of you, plus you know James'll kill you if you got kicked off the field for fighting right before their final match."

"I like my odds." Remus ground his teeth together. "And 'sides... Potter's halfway across the pitch, what he don't know won't kill him."

"Oh c'mon, Moony..."

As Peter sighed, one of Marlene's girls, an eleventh year named Summer, came trotting up to the bench for a sip of water. When she was finished, she set the bottle aside and returned to the field, only to be jeered and whistled at by the rival team on her way.

"Yeah, go on girl, bit faster! Can't quite see those knickers under those shorts!"

"If you aren't gonna give us a show then you could at least turn around so we can see the front!"

Poor Summer baulked, shame-faced as she covered her chest with her arms. She ran the rest of the way back to her team with the boys' laughter nipping at her heels, but the final straw for Remus was when one of the boys turned around and smirked.

"Ha... Frigid bitch."

They went on mocking her, holding their hands to their chest and poking their fingers outward like a pair of nipples as they laughed. Summer was sixteen, she just wanted to play football.

"Right, that's it." Dropping the armful of water bottles he'd been clutching, Remus side-stepped Peter, who tried meekly to haul him back. "Oi!"

“Shh! Lupin, don’t—!”

“OI!”

It got their attention.

As Peter hung back, looking around nervously for a teacher, Remus strode right up to them.

"What do you want?" The first of them asked, looking up at him with a disinterested scowl on his face.

"I wanna know what it is you think you're doing," Remus spat.

"Nothing."

"Nothing? You call harassing a bunch of girls 'nothing'?"

"It's just a bit of friendly pitch-talk," said another. "If you Hawkings freaks can't handle a little laugh, then maybe you shouldn't be playing in our tournament."

The boys all shared a smirk, as though they were waiting for Remus to concede defeat in lieu of their cleverness. Too bad Remus never really did learn how to quit.

"Can I borrow that?" He asked, pointing to the football one of them had tucked under his arm. The kid glanced dubiously at his friends before ultimately handing it over. They watched as Remus took the football and spun it between his hands several times.

"Do you even know what you're doing with that?"

"Nah, not really. Not all that good with my feet, to be honest." Remus stopped the ball, looking up. "But I am good with my hands... Know a game, even. Wanna know what it's called?"

The group shared a look, and then all jumped as Remus surged forward and grabbed the front of the first boy's sports shirt in a single fist.

"It's called, you piss off, or I'm gonna be shoving this football so far down your throat, you'll be shitting it out in an hour."

"Now that sounds like a fantastic game! I always did say these things didn't do enough to help us get to one another. Pity."

The voice came from behind them, and a second later Remus felt a pair of hands snaking up his back and over his shoulders.

"Hello, lads," Sirius purred. "Having a good time, are we?"

No one said anything, and finally Sirius smirked and gestured to the boy Remus had by the collar.

"Lupin, you can let go of him now."

He didn't want to, but the slight squeeze Sirius gave to his shoulders told him that he probably should. To the boy's credit, he was brave enough to try and take his football back, only to recoil when Remus flinched sharply toward him.

"There, that's better, isn't it?" Sirius grinned. "I recognise your shirts. You're from 'Cow-poo', aren't you?"

"It's Caldew," one of them moaned.

"Right, right. The school from Carlisle! You're the ones who lost in the first rounds, to—oh sorry, I seem to be forgetting..." Sirius stroked his chin a moment, before snapping his fingers. "Oh! Right, to us! You lost to us. Man, that must sting."

Remus sniggered quietly, and each of the rival boys shot him a dirty look.

“Listen," sighed Sirius, "I did overhear one of you using the word ‘contrarian’ correctly, so I suppose not all of you have brains falling out your arse, but I’d still watch out if I were you. I mean, you already lost miserably to a bunch of 'manky girls'—how long do you really think you could last against Lupin, here?"

"Long enough!"

Sirius shook his head. "I don't think so. You see that scar on his nose? He didn't get that fighting a bunch of teenage brats from Dalston and Cumbria. You see, Lupin here, is our headmistress's big rehabilitation project. You take a kid from the streets and give him a place to live, clothe him, feed him 'til he's strong, then you release him back and hope he's learned enough not to kill anyone. Doesn't always work though... Sometimes they reject the education. Sometimes they've just got too much of the ol' killer in 'em."

"You're full of shite!"

"Maybe. Shall we let Lupin open you up and see what you're full of?"

None of them seemed eager, and either because they believed him or because Sirius' ramble had bored them enough to lose interest, each of the group finally turned away. The last, the one who was missing his football, waited a second longer until Sirius had snatched the ball from Remus and held it out.

"You want it? Fine. Go—get it!"

With a purposeful smirk, Sirius kicked the ball straight up into the air and let it soar toward the edge of the stands. The Caldew boy chased it for a moment, until he realised just where it was going to land. All morning, Filch had been shambling across the field, collecting rubbish and muttering to himself about the 'lazy, ungrateful ingrates' he was forced to pick up after every day. When the football came down over his head, it smacked him dead-on, nearly knocking the nasty old caretaker right off of his own knobby knees. When he'd recovered enough to look up to see who'd hit him, Filch spotted the guilty-looking boy and let loose a well-deserved shriek.

"You! Get over ‘ere now!"

"That was quite the speech back there," Remus said, after they'd turned and made their escape toward the middle of the stadium. A few kids who'd watched the entire affair from their seats, cheered as they passed, and Sirius threw his arms up to receive them.

"You loved it!" He called, still waving excitedly as they started up the metal staircase. The crowd was huge now, supplemented by the addition of various classes from the elementary campus and all of the teams that had been knocked out before the finals. Lily and the girls had taken their seats in the dead centre—even Sam was there, trying to flag Remus down like a jet on a runway. The field was fuller now too, and as they got higher into the stands, Remus could see that the Brentford team had already taken to the pitch for warm-up, led by their annoyingly handsome captain.

“I told James to kick Brentford’s arse today, right?” He called over the noise.

“Yes! About three times before breakfast.”

“Good. I hate them.”

Sirius laughed and pat his shoulder. “Okay, Moons.”

They’d reached the midway point of the open-air stands, and Remus shot a wave at Lily, who had joined Sam in trying to get their attention. “Remus, here!” She shouted, gesturing to the two empty spots next to her.

He went to follow, already muttering an ‘excuse me’ to the kids at the end of the row, when suddenly Sirius had grabbed his arm, pulling him back into the aisle.

“Hold on, Moons, your almost-brawl nearly made me forget. I have a genius idea.”

"For what?"

"A prank, of course."

Already intrigued, Remus stepped in close and watched as Sirius slid a small cassette out of his pocket, holding it up for him to take. “Found that behind my bed yesterday when we were packing up the rest of our crap,” Sirius said. “It’s Mary's, thought I’d lost it ages ago.”

Carefully dodging a few kids on their way further up into the stands, Remus turned the tape over. “The Runaways?"

Sirius nodded keenly. "You've listened to them then?"

"Yeah, once or twice. But why’re you showing it to me now?”

“Turn it over, ya numpty," he tsked. "Read the first track.”

Remus did as he was told, and a second later he felt a bemused smile spread across his face. “Really? Bit on the nose, don't you think?”

“I think it's perfect, actually! And the band’s made up of all chicks. American ones. Think McKinnon will like it?”

“Maybe. Or she'll bash your head in."

"That's a chance I'm willing to take." Humming gladly, Sirius plucked the tape from his fingers. “I thought we could play it as the team takes the field. Really amp up the crowd—like how they do it during the Cup.”

“Alright, but your stereo’s a bit quiet to be heard over the crowd.”

“Who said we were gonna use my stereo?” Smirking, Sirius jutted his head to his right, and Remus glanced up to spot the announcer’s box sitting at the top of the stands.

“Oh no. They’re never gonna let you do that.”

“Well, we won’t know unless we try, right?” Elbowing him, Sirius turned and quickly began skipping up the steps. Taking a moment to glance back at Lily, who had her arms raised in question, Remus shrugged and followed, catching up to Sirius at the very top. It was colder at the top of the stands, and so high up that peering over the backside of the stands made Remus feel a bit woozy. Down below they could see the referees begin to clear the field.

"Best be quick if we want this to work," Sirius called.

“But how are you even going to convince them to let you play it?”

"Do you really have so little faith in me?" Sirius scoffed, then flashed him a wink; “Watch and learn, love.”

Sliding tape out of its plastic case, Sirius opened the door to the press box and strode inside. The interior of the tiny room was covered in wires and control panels, each of them snaked around each other in a never-ending tangle. Remus’ only had about a foot's worth of clearance over his head and the entire thing looked like a fire hazard, but luckily for them, there was only a single other person inside. His name was George Kelley. He was sitting in the announcer's seat when they walked in, scribbling urgently in the margins of his notes. The three of them had taken nearly two years of forms together and George had always seemed nice enough, even if he was a bit of a suck-up.

“Hey Georgie,” Sirius called, as the heavy door slammed behind them. In answer, George spun around in his chair, his headphones sitting idly around his neck.

"What are you two doing in here?"

“We've got that track from McGonagall for ya," Sirius said, quite simply.

“What are you talking about? What track?”

“I dunno, I assume it’s for the game’s intro. She just gave it to me and told me to pass it off to you, that you’d know what to do with it. Reckon she didn’t want to do all the stairs—you know, with her knees.”

Sirius pat his own knees keenly while George stared at them, squinting as though he didn't quite believe it. When Remus offered a kind nod, he appeared less sure and glanced back at his notes, quickly flipping through each paper.

“But… I just talked to Professor McGonagall this morning, and she didn’t mention anything about music.”

Sirius pulled a face. “Then why would she make us walk all the way up here to give it to you? I mean really, don’t you know it’s customary for the home team to be introduced with their own song?”

“Well, sure, but I—”

“How long you been doing this gig, Georgie?”

“It’s my first year,” George answered indignantly.

“That explains it.” Sirius turned to Remus. “He has no idea what he’s doing. Ah, c’est la vie. C’mon Lupin, we’ll just explain to McGonagall that Georgie here doesn’t know how to work the stadium’s stereo.”

“I know how to work the stereo! Ugh, just hand it over then...”

Remus had to swallow his own smile as Sirius shot him a delighted look and quickly passed the cassette along to the other boy.

“It’s just the first track,” Sirius said quickly, earning himself an irritated glance from George as he rolled his creaky chair over to the battered sound system and pushed the tape into its slot.

“The game’s gonna start any minute now, so you two should get to your seats. I don’t like people coming and going during the intros, it’s too distracting,” George said, snapping the tape deck shut and punching a few buttons into the large audio control board to his left.

“Do you mind if we stay and watch actually?” Sirius asked, peeking over George’s shoulders. “Just for the intros. I mean, it’s just so cool—that you're doing all of this. Do you really know what every one of those buttons does?"

At the praise, George puffed up slightly. "Sure, I do. I've been part of the AV club for six years running."

"That's right! Pete mentioned you were even named president this year. So cool... What's this one do?" Sirius pointed to a set of dials.

"That's a channel. It splits the sound and directs it around the stadium."

"Oh shit, like a soundboard in a recording studio!"

"Kinda… except we're not recording anything here. It's all about output."

"I see, I see. And that knob there?"

"It's the microphone's gain. Means volume."

"Wow, you are so knowledgeable, really. Does that mean it's separate from the stereo's?"

"Yeah, the stereo's gain is here. But don't touch it. Everything's carefully balanced. Even a single nudge could throw it all out of whack."

"No, of course. Hands to myself... Now what's that button over there do?"

As George kept on, all too happy to show off his vast knowledge to his upperclassman, Sirius shot Remus a pointed look and gestured his head in the direction of the controls. Remus didn't need to be a mind-reader to understand what he wanted.

"Hey Georgie," Sirius interrupted, "you sure you put the tape in correctly? Looks backwards."

"What?" George wheeled the chair back over to the stereo. As he did, Remus reached forward and dialled the stereo's volume up to max, before quickly putting his hands behind his back again.

"Oh sorry," Sirius said, when the tape turned out just fine, "my bad. You clearly know what you're doing, I'll stop pestering ya now."

George waved him off and checked his watch before cursing; "Game's about to start. Remember, no talking."

Sirius nodded, zipping his lips and throwing the invisible key over his shoulder. Pleased, George returned to his seat and set his headphones over his ears, pulling the microphone towards himself. It truly was a wonderful view. Soon the players would be taking the field, Remus just hoped that they'd find what they were about to do as funny as they did.

A few moments later, a timer began to chime loudly, and George silenced it before clearing his throat, one hand on his papers, the other on the microphone. When he was ready, he took a deep breath, and hit the button on the mic's base.

"GOOOOOOD MORNING, FOLKS! And welcome to the final game of the 1978 Inter-School Cup! Today's match may not be deciding who takes home the trophy, but it will determine who has bragging rights for the following one-hundred and ninety-two school days! Now please put your hands together to help me welcome our visiting team—BRENTFORRRRD!"

The team began to take the field, and George listed off their names and numbers while the crowd whopped and clapped excitedly.

"Good show! Good show! And rounding out the Brentford team, we have its loyal captain. Number four and defensive midfielder, Captain Cal—"

"AH-CHOO!"

George spun around in his chair, and Remus wiped beneath his nose, giving a rather convincing sniffle. "Sorry, allergies."

Downright sputtering into his hand, Sirius bent over to hide his laughter while Remus wiped the smug look from his face and George turned back around with a huff.

"Ahem—that'll be Captain Callum McAllister… And here they are, taking to the pitch. Good show, lads! Now let's all put our hands together in a great Hawkings welcome to the Brentford team!"

As the crowd cheered, Sirius nudged George from behind.

"The tape, Georgie, the tape!"

"Jesus christ, I know!" With one hand covering the mike, George reached over to the stereo and let his finger hover over the play button. "Now, guys and gals, let's get ready to welcome today's home team to the field—let's hear a great cheer for HAWKINGS!"

The button was pressed. The stereo gave a great purr, and then a single click echoed, before the entire stadium was assaulted with the sound of an electric guitar. The stands rattled in face of such volume, while bodies flinched and hands flew to cover sensitive ears. Those closest to the press box spun around in their seats just in time to see Sirius wrestle a horrified Georgie from his chair, Remus standing delighted behind them. The entire crowd had turned rigid out of shock, and their friends on the field had become statues as they gaped up at the speakers.

It was marvellous.

"Can't stay at home, can't stay at school—
Old folks say, 'You poor little fool';
Down the streets I'm the girl next door,
I'M THE FOX YOU'VE BEEN WAITING FOR!"

"It's too loud!" George wailed over the speakers, his headphones getting knocked askew as Sirius struggled to restrain him. "You big fat liars!"

"GEORGIE—GEORGIE—! Just hold on a minute, man! Look around you—you're gonna be a legend!"

"I'M GONNA GET EXPELLED!"

"McGonagall's not gonna expel you for something like this!" Remus promised. "If she did, we'd have been gone years ago!"

"HELLO DADDY, HELLO MOM—
I'M YOUR CH-CH-CH-CH-CH—CHERRY BOMB!
HELLO WORLD, I'M YOUR WILD GIRL—
I'M YOUR CH-CH-CH-CH-CH—CHERRY BOMB!"

Remus dearly hoped someone was getting this on camera.

Still wrapped on the floor, George gave a great moan as he finally stopped struggling and Sirius was able to straighten up, pushing his hair from his face as he stared out over the stadium. Most people still looked baffled, but others had started to laugh, and a few students could even be spotted mouthing the words or pumping their fists. Down below, the Hawkings team was cheering, and Remus could spot Marlene by her blonde hair—hands over her mouth in what he hoped was delighted shock.

"C'mon, Moons!" Sirius urged, as the second verse started up again. "Might as well take the credit."

"You guys suck!" George wailed, scrambling for his headphones. They laughed, and Sirius bent down to give the other boy one last pat of confidence.

“Don’t touch that volume, Georgie-boy, and I promise you’ll be hailed as a legend for the rest of your days.”

Grabbing Remus’ hand, Sirius whipped the door open and they spilled out of the press box into the sun. Outside the booth the music was even louder, and the moment they were spotted, further cheers went up, as if everyone had been betting on who was responsible. At the noise, Sirius clapped and drove his fist up into the air, before throwing himself down the stairs and rapping his hands on the metal railing in time with the drums. Remus went with him, beaming even as his gaze met Lily’s and she shook her head in disbelief.

“HELLO DADDY, HELLO MOM—
I’M YOUR CH-CH-CH-CH-CH—CHERRY BOMB!
HELLO WORLD, I’M YOUR WILD GIRL—
I’M YOUR CH-CH-CH-CH-CH—CHERRY BOMB!”

They flew down the stairs toward the pitch, slipping past teachers and accepting high-fives from other students as the drum fill hit and literal moans started coming through the speakers. Blimey, Remus thought; American women were truly something else.

“Hey, street boy, want some style?
Your dead end dreams don’t make you smile;
I'll give you something to live for—
HAVE YOU AND GRAB YOU UNTIL YOU’RE SORE!
HELLO DADDY, HELLO MOM—”

Sirius’ feet hit green, and he threw up his arms. “ ‘I’M YOUR CH-CH-CH-CH-CH—CHERRY BOMB’!”

The team erupted, charging forward and surrounding them with cheers and praise. The girls were ecstatic—even Marlene was smacking Remus fondly on the back with the entirety of her strength. As the two-minute long bender slowly came to an echoing end, they continued to chant; “CHERRY BOMB! CHERRY BOMB!” until the Ms. Hooch and the other referees had blown their whistles and stepped in to break them up.

“Alright, that’s enough, very funny—back to your benches, all of you!” Hooch was shouting to no avail. "Sirius Black, what were you thinking?! What if the entire team was punished for this?"

"C'mon, Hooch, what's the worst they can do?" Sirius bleated; "They've already lost the tournament!"

She huffed at him, but as she turned and made her way out of the crowd, Remus couldn't help but think that she was secretly smiling.

“That was amazing!” Nicole said, pushing her way to the front and throwing herself over Sirius' arm. “Can we walk-on like that for every game?!”

“Look at the other team’s faces!” Another boy cried.

“Did you pick that song on purpose?” Marlene was asking Remus.

"Of course we did," he answered, just as James came streaking up to them.

“I can’t believe—You’re insane, you are!"

“I know! And you two better win!” Sirius ordered, jamming a finger into the centre of his best friend’s chest. In answer, James grabbed his face and planted a wet kiss on his cheek, bold enough to leave even Sirius blushing. After that the team surged back in with more cheering and laughter, and Remus was able to put an arm around Marlene. They'd just taken up their chant again; "CHERRY BOMB! CHERRY BOMB!” when it was all cut short by another booming voice;

“SIRIUS BLACK—REMUS LUPIN! COME HERE THIS INSTANT!”

“Oh shit,” someone squeaked. "It's the headmistress!"

She approached quickly, narrowing in on them like a shark to blood. Of course Sirius didn't seem nervous; their stunt in front of hundreds had put him on top of the world, no way he was coming down for anything.

“Two days,” Professor McGonagall hissed; “Two days left of school, and here I’ve got a prefect and another leaving student pulling pranks at the Inter-School Cup! What do you suppose I should do about this?”

“We just wanted to hype up the crowd a bit, Minnie."

“Yes, well I’d say you’ve managed that quite perfectly.”

“Was it the song? Are you more of a blues-rock fan?”

Remus elbowed him; “Shut up, you dickhead.”

McGonagall pressed her lips into a thin line. “I’ll assume you roped Mr. Kelley into helping you then?”

“Nah, we tricked him,” Sirius conceded. “Don’t blame poor Georgie for our misdoings.”

"It was all you then? No one else?”

They nodded. Might as well.

She gave them a long, hard look, before clicking her tongue and checking her watch. “Ms. Hooch? Where is Ms. Hooch?"

The gym-teacher-turned-football-coach scurried forward immediately, and Professor McGonagall rounded on her with a sigh. "Ms. Hooch, please apologise to the referees for the disruption. Tell them we're ready to begin at their leisure, and that I've apprehended the rabble-rousers."

"Really, it was more like we came to you," Sirius pointed out, earning himself another elbow.

"Mr. Potter?"

"Y-Yes, Professor?"

"I trust you to show your friends to their seats?”

James came alight, eyes nearly twinkling behind his sports goggles. “Yes, ma’am!” He chimed, grabbing both Remus and Sirius by the arm.

“And I’ll expect you to stay there!” McGonagall said sharply. “It’ll give me time to decide what to do with you."

"Be gentle with us, Minnie—" Sirius started to say, before he was promptly grabbed by the arm and marched off.

As McGonagall set to dispersing the crowd at the edge of the pitch and George's nervous voice chittered back through the stadium's speakers to finish introducing the team, James led them toward the team's bench, where Peter was waiting with a sea of water bottles and no small amount of praise.

"Everyone loved it. You should've seen Brentford's faces when the girls started screaming."

"Probably looked a lot like they're about to when they lose," Sirius said, holding a palm out to James. "Now get out there, Potter, and kick their arse already."

Taking a moment to look at all of his friends, James smiled down at Sirius' hand and slapped it without hesitation.

"Just try and keep your eye on the ball, lads."

* * *

In the end, Hawkings took the game in another decisive two-to-one win. Both teams had been clinging desperately to a tie since the second half had begun, but it was Marlene, their best striker, who'd ultimately broken it within the last twenty seconds of the game. Backed by James and several others, she'd charged the Brentwood team and made one final, heroic leap toward the goal that sent the football rocketing into its upper corner. The bell chimed, indicating a goal, and that's how they'd all known that they'd won.

The crowd had gone absolutely mad, screaming so loudly that George's announcement could barely be heard.

"THERE YOU HAVE IT—MARLENE McKINNON SCORES IN AN ALL-TIME NAIL-BITING FINAL MOMENT! HAWKINGS WINS! HAWKINGS TAKES THE TOURNAMENT!"

Remus had never been hugged by so many people. And for once he didn't even mind.

“Given any more thought about becoming a football fan, Moony?” Peter asked. Remus put an arm around him, his other fist beating the air in celebration.

“I wouldn't hold my breath, Pete.”

James, who had been busy accepting congratulations from every person who could get within ten feet of him, helped Sirius raise Marlene into the air, and together they and the team carried her around the stadium for a full lap. Better sports than Remus would’ve given them credit for, a few of the Brentford players even joined in, and when they’d rounded the pitch, he watched as Cal shook hands for James and they clapped each other on the shoulder.

“Mm-hmm! He is proper fit, isn’t he?” Sirius said, reappearing at Remus’ side, slightly out of breath from all the running.

“Now you’re just doing it to be a dick,” Remus laughed, too happy to really be bothered.

“Ah, don’t worry none, babe, I much prefer the skinny and scrawny type anyway.”

“Yeah, and I like them short and unfunny apparently.”

“Low blow, Moons. Low blow…”

Cal turned away from James and caught their eye, giving each of them a friendly salute before jogging off to join his own team. They took with them the tournament trophy, but none of the Hawkings’ players seemed the lesser for it. Especially not when one of the sports scouts broke away from the rest and strode right up to James.

“Would you look at that,” Mary said, coming down from the stands to join them. “Looks like Potter’s got some prospects after all.”

Twinged with nervousness, Remus glanced at Sirius, but the look he gave him was not that of distress. “I’m not worried,” Sirius said; “He deserves to be recognised.”

Afterwards, while the team was doing their celebratory sweep of the grounds and the girls had gone off to prepare their additions to the time capsule, Remus and Sirius were ordered to serve their punishment by clearing up the stadium stands of all leftover rubbish. Most of the prefects had come together as volunteers as well so there didn't seem much point in complaining, but in actuality Remus was not a happy camper. The June sun was sweltering, and bending over the benches to collect the rubbish was turning his back achy and his mood grim. It didn't help that Filch insisted on barking orders from the bottom of the stands, but at least things weren't entirely boring.

“Do you think they’re actually dating?” Sirius asked, as Remus shoved an empty crisp packet into the bin bag he was holding.

“Who d’you mean?”

Sirius gestured further down the stands. Regulus and Trish—both prefects—were side by side, plucking styrofoam cups and other rubbish into black bags of their own. They didn't look suspicious, though every now and then Trish would say something that made Regulus smile, and he would hide it by turning his face away so as to not let anyone know he was actually enjoying himself.

“Well," Remus smirked, "stranger things have happened."

“I always sort of thought that if Reg was going to reproduce it would be asexually. You know, like a starfish. Break off one arm, and a new annoying little cunt grows in its place."

"I really hope that's not how you reproduce. Couldn't handle two of you."

Sirius cracked a small smile. “It’s good though… that he could find somebody.”

“Shall I let Regulus know you’re happy for him then?" Remus offered. "We have that prefect party tomorrow. They'll both be there.”

“Nah, bet he’d just get all riled up. Better to leave him be.”

Remus dropped an empty can into the bag, then turned away to reach for another. “Wow, is that restraint I hear? This punishment must really be sinking in.”

“You’re not the only one capable of subtlety, alright?” Raising his foot, Sirius tapped him lightly on the arse. When Remus spun back around to do the same, he found Sirius staring down at his brother, a wistful look in his eye.

"It was his birthday last week, wasn't it?" Said Remus.

"Yeah. Turned seventeen. Bit outrageous, that. I mean, he's getting so old. What if he grows taller than me? Bet he'd do it too, just to spite me."

Remus smiled to himself. "Did you get him anything?"

"Oh, you know... this and that. A few records." With a guilty smirk, Sirius began grinding the toe of his trainer along the metal bench. "Ones we didn't listen to, or... or like. Mum'll probably take them when he goes home, but I thought he should have something to remember me by, since I'm leaving and all."

"I hope he visits," Remus said. "I think Regulus would like London. You'd have to force him to come though."

"Mhm, yeah, I know." With a sudden twist, Sirius went to thump Remus in the arse again, only this time Remus caught his leg and pushed him back onto the bench. Sirius accepted the loss, and instead sat up coyly, one leg over the other. “When are you gonna tell me what song you put on the tape by the way?”

“I'm not."

“Don't be stingy, Moons. Bet you could guess mine. Come on, we can make it a 'I'll show you mine if you show me yours' sort of thing."

"I think you'd just as likely 'show me yours' anyway, Padfoot."

"Calling me a slag, are you?" Sirius huffed, and slumped down on one of the benches, flapping the bag back and forth between his knees. “Fine, whatever. I’ll get it out of you eventually.”

“And just how do you suppose you'll do that?” Remus asked, picking up half of a torn 'Go Hawkings, Go!' poster and stuffing it in his bag.

“Plenty of ways. I could fuck up your tuning before every practice. Or purposely forget to change the bog roll every time it’s out. Or eat cream crackers in your bed—I know you hate the crumbs. And if I’m feeling particularly nasty, I could even tear out the last page of every one of your books. Leave you endlessly wanting for more, in a sense.”

“That’s your plan? You’re just going to annoy me until I tell you which song I chose?”

“I could. Or I could do something else... Something nice... Something like that thing where I kiss down your chest and your stomach, and then your thighs, and all around…” Sirius trailed off, which was probably a good thing, because while they were busy having one of their cheeky back-and-forth, a group of boys had scurried up the stairs toward them.

They were panting slightly from the climb by the time they'd stopped, though it hadn't managed to wipe the suspicious grins from their faces. At the front of the small back was Bobby Johnson, the kid who'd made the toilet roll firecracker that'd gotten them in trouble with Filch during Remus' first year. Sirius had been hailing him as a certifiable genius ever since, though he and Remus rarely ever ran in the same circles.

“Sirius! I–I mean, Mr. Black, sir!” Bobby started, looking a bit too excited.

"Hey, Bob," Sirius grinned, while Remus nudged him with his foot.

“You get them to call you ‘sir’?”

“Shush," Sirius ordered, before turning on the boys. "What can we do for you, lads?”

“Just wanted to congratulate you on the awesome prank!” Bobby said, while his friends nodded along enthusiastically.

“Why thank you. That's very kind.”

“We also wanted to know if we could be in on the next one," asked another.

Remus and Sirius shared a glance.

"The next one...?"

"Well, yeah!" Said Bobby. "Whatever you've got planned for the end of the year, we want in on it. Bet it's gonna be brilliant—and we'll do anything! Just wanna help pull it off, really."

At their enthusiasm, Sirius began to look equal parts thrilled and flustered. There was no way he was ready to admit to not having any grand schemes planned, especially when faced with such sheer devotion, but they'd yet to think up anything 'brilliant' or worth celebrating. Most people were only interested in a leavers party, and unlike the year before, no one had spread any suicidal mother rumours so there was no revenge to be had. Perhaps the Marauders were finally spent.

“You wanna help plan other pranks, do ya..?” Sirius echoed, only to be returned with a chorus of 'yeah!' and 'of course!'. Peering again at Remus, who had no answers, Sirius ran an anxious hand through his dark hair and finally looked up.

"I'm humbled, Bobby, I really am."

"Does that mean you're planning something?"

"Er—of course! We always have a few things on the go, Lupin and I. It's just that right now it's all very much in the malleable stage, but when we've got something concrete, we'll be sure to let you know."

"Cool!" Bobby exclaimed. "In the meantime, we have a few ideas ourselves if you'd like to hear them. Nothing huge, but..."

"No, no," Sirius coaxed, jumping on the opportunity; "Let's hear 'em, we're all ears."

Without any hesitation the boys began launching into various ideas, practically tripping over each other to get the words out.

“We could all ride our mattresses down the steps of Castle Hall!”

“And I could always make more fireworks! I perfected this new recipe a few weeks ago—the smoke blows red and yellow! There’s also this other one that makes a cracking boom! I’ll bet you could explode a few toilets with it! Call it the diaper-bomb!”

“And Professor Kettleburn’s got some Madagascar hissing cockroaches in his office!”

“He DOES?!” Sirius interjected. “Blimey, wish I’d known that.”

“We could totally let ‘em loose in the girls’ dorms!" The boys tittered. "Imagine the chaos...”

"A-And we could get others in on it too! Only those we trust, of course."

“Oh-ho-ho, you boys are evil!" Sirius cackled. "I’m so proud. Moony, what do you think—aren’t you proud?”

“I think I’m not going to get any sleep tonight,” Remus yawned.

Jumping to his feet, Sirius tossed his half-filled bin bag aside and leapt up onto the bench above him where he could stare out over the great green pitch. With one hand on his hip and the other pressed thoughtfully to his chin, Remus could practically see the cogs moving inside his head. He knew it; Sirius Black was plotting.

“I'll be honest," Sirius called out eventually, "up until this moment, the Marauders have been running on empty. All of our other plans have felt rather pedestrian, not at all up to our usual standards—but your spectacular show of gag-dom has motivated me to try again. I think that if we can get enough people together, then perhaps this will be a leavers' party to remember after all."

"You mean you have an idea?" Remus asked.

"I have many! You even gave me one of them, Moons. In fact, I'm feeling rather inspired now."

Before Remus could ask what it was he'd given him, Professor McGonagall appeared inexplicably on the staircase above them. “I hope that inspiration leads to more cleaning and not more trouble-making, Mr. Black," she said, spooking Sirius so badly he was nearly propelled into a forward roll.

"Crikey, Minnie! You shouldn't sneak up on people like that, you're likely to give someone a heart attack."

Ignoring Sirius' sass, the headmistress came down several steps and stopped to regard Bobby and his friends with a stern eye.

“Gentlemen, shouldn’t you be heading down to supper?”

“Yes, Professor McGonagall,” they all chirped, before promptly high-tailing it back down the stands. They were replaced a second later by the headmistress herself, who stood in the aisle and peered down at their nearly-full bin bags in satisfaction.

“I see that clean up is going well."

"Yes, we are but humble servants," Sirius drawled, picking up his own to swing around. "Really sorry about the music earlier, Professor. We just assumed everyone would enjoy it as much as we did, honest."

Behind their spectacles, Professor McGonagall's eyes narrowed. "That little performance of yours almost caused a riot. Poor Professor Flitwick had to be wheeled out on a trolley after being practically trampled trying to get down the stairs. You'll be glad to know he was not seriously injured."

"I am glad!" Sirius nodded. "And hey, maybe next time he can sit with a group closer to his height. Like the fourth years!"

Remus threw an empty drink can, which bounced off the back of Sirius' head and rattled down the stairs. When Sirius rounded on him, he was frowning and rubbing his fresh bruise, but the moment he laid eyes on Remus his expression changed, becoming that of eager delight.

"Oh, Minnie!" He cried, spinning back around. "Since it's only just occurred to me that we won't be seeing each other next year, there's something I have to ask you before we go."

"And what is that?"

Clapping his hands together like a pleading beggar, Sirius fell down to one knee and cleared his throat.

"Will you marry me?"

"Oh, Jesus christ," Remus muttered.

He was expecting further accostment, or at least a good telling off, but for whatever fury and frustration he had put her through over the years, Minerva McGonagall must've still held Sirius in high regard. Flashing him one of her rare smiles, she sighed and shook her head.

"Sirius, just because you are leaving school for good does not mean you have to turn our final days of peace into a spectacle."

"Oh, Minnie," he echoed; "Dear, sweet Minnie... You don't really believe that, do you?"

Another sigh, and she'd turned for the stairs. “You boys are going to do great things one day," she called, "I just hope that for your sakes, your children will take after their mothers, rather than their fathers.”

Sirius shot an amused look at Remus, who only cringed in embarrassment, and then cupped his hands around his mouth.

“Oh, I don’t think you have to worry much about that one, Minnie!"

"Goodbye, my 4A boys," Professor McGonagall waved. "You will be sorely missed."

* * *

Later that night...

It was their second-to-last night at school—ever—and Remus could feel the nerves and excitement radiating off of his friends like stink off a boys' changing room. After dinner, they'd all agreed to finish any last-minute packing and then meet back at Godric just after curfew, where they could then head out together to bury their time capsule. They'd already scoped out the perfect spot; just a little ways into the trees, in the same place they'd managed to pull off the most magnificent Halloween prank known to man. (Or the worst, if you were to ask the girls.)

The ground where they'd chosen to plant the capsule was soft and it'd been easy enough to dig through the damp mulch. Originally their main worry had been how they were supposed to store the capsule so that it'd stand against any elements it might encounter while underground, but when Peter had had the bright idea of "borrowing" the school's capsule from its exhibit in Castle Hall, they'd all pitched in to help nick it. It'd taken less than an hour to smuggle the metal canister back to their dorm, and now all that was left was to bury the memories and forget about them for the next twenty years.

After spending the better half of the evening packing their things away into it, James had just returned from his nightly headcount when a knock on their door made everyone look up.

"I'll bet it's Minnie!" Sirius cried, throwing himself over the stolen time capsule as though his body alone could hide it. "Knew she couldn't resist me for long. She must've come back to accept my proposal."

"Or to expel you on your final night!" James said, doing the same. "She's found out what we did and has come to stop us!"

"You guys are so lame," Remus said, getting up to answer the door himself. He opened it just a crack at first, and rather than finding an angry, capsule-less Headmistress, he was met with another boy, yawning and holding out a letter.

"Post for you, Lupin."

Remus took the envelope and shut the door. He noticed strangely that there was no return address, but his name had been neatly printed across the front, and the stamps were all marked correctly.

“Who’s the letter from, Moony?” James asked, shoving Sirius off the time capsule and tugging it to the edge of his bed.

“Dunno… Giles, probably.”

“That driver of yours worries more than both of my parents put together,” Peter said, shutting the capsule’s lid and tossing a sheet over it as a poor disguise.

“You can call him in the morning," Sirius said, grunting as he and James lifted the heavy capsule between them. "Meanwhile, our ladies await."

Remus turned the letter over in his hands. Up until a moment ago, he’d been completely ready to rush out into the night with his friends, but now he found himself hesitating. The lack of a return address had made him suspicious. Could it really be? Could it actually be from Tonya?

Quickly, he hid the letter behind his back. “You three go on, I’ll catch up. Just need to use the loo.”

“And you guys say I have the shitty bladder,” Peter said, opening the front door.

“Don’t be too long, Moony,” James chided, as they manoeuvred the large container through the door. "Don't want to miss the burial!"

Remus waited until the sound of his friends’ footsteps had faded down the hall, before scurrying over to his bed. Tearing into the envelope, he found two carefully folded papers, each written on thick paper. For a split second he let himself hope, but when he unfolded the top half of the first page, he did not find a letter from a lost love. Instead, the words ‘Faculty of Humanities—University of Manchester’ stared up at him in black ink.

Remus’ breath caught. Slowly he unfolded the letter the rest of the way.

Dear Remus,

We have received your application to The University of Manchester’s Faculty of English Language and Literature, and are pleased to offer you a seat for the incoming 1978-1979 school term. Competition for September’s intake has been fierce, but we were highly impressed by your strong application and clear plans for the future. Below you will find a concise outline for what must be completed in order to secure your seat for this term's intake. We look forward to your arrival.

Remus lowered the letter. To his knowledge, he had not made any application—and certainly not any plans for a future at the University of Manchester.

Furiously, he tore open the second letter.

Remus,

I debated fiercely whether or not I should write you this letter, but after pulling some strings with the head of admissions at Manchester University, I decided it was worthwhile. I know you and I have never had the best relationship, but I want the best for you, and I would see it done if I can. I had never envisioned a life for you as someone who reads books and argues ethics as a career, but if it is to be that or a life without point, then I would have you in school. I implore you to look past any feelings you have for me and see sense. Remember, I do this for you, and I swear to not ask anything else of you if you agree to attend.

The world wants you, Remus. Don't let it down.

Lyall Lupin.

He'd signed the bottom, as he might've signed a notice to another legislator. Two great swooping 'L's, wrapping up a string of 'I' statements that made his stomach turn. 'I debated', 'I decided', 'I implore' … Despite the bitterness, the letter might've been the kindest thing Lyall had ever done for him.

And Remus hated it.

Not just because he was angry, but because it made him hesitate.

While his classmates had attended lessons and informational sessions on how to properly apply to and navigate university life, he had found every excuse to skive off. He hadn't wanted anything to do with any of it. All he'd wanted was to be Remus Lupin of the Marauders. Not "Remus Lupin of Manchester University". But he could be now—couldn't he? The ticket was right there in his hands. All it would take was one call, and his entire future would be different. It didn't mean that he had to forgive his father, or even speak to him. He'd be in Manchester after all. Two-hundred miles between him and anything that might trigger even the slightest memory.

You could leave it all behind, that traitorous voice said; Be a completely new person. Actually make something of yourself.

Why would I ever want that? I have a place here. People that I love.

Sure, they love you now, but what about when all that rubbish about a band fails? What about when they realise that it's all a fool's errand and everything blows up in your face? What about when they become bitter, and angry? And when you start fighting—go your separate ways like all adults do? What will you have left? James and Peter have back up plans—Sirius has his inheritance. But what does Remus Lupin have outside this one thing? An almost-godmother? A father? Two? Lyall could so easily take you out of his will—leave you with nothing. He just might, if you blow this.

We can do this, he swore. We can! I want this band.

For now…

Remus squeezed his hands into fists, crushing the twin letters in his grip. He knew he should burn them—try to erase all of it—but there wasn't time. Before he could decide what to do next, Sirius was opening the door, stepping in expectantly.

"Finished with the toilet?" He asked, one hand still on the doorknob. Quickly, Remus stuffed the letters into his back pocket, but it didn't matter; Sirius had seen, even if he was trying to play it off by looking elsewhere and casually rubbing at his eye.

"So... who was the letter from?"

Remus' shoulders sagged. "No one—just my dad."

"Ah. Good or bad?"

"Neither… Pointless."

Mouth quirking upwards at one corner, Sirius held out his hand.

“Let’s go do something worthwhile then.”

He wasn’t sure how it was possible, but Remus instantly felt better.

Screw you, he thought as he took that hand, This is my future. If the world wants me so bad, I’m gonna decide what it is they get.

They found their friends waiting for them outside the dorm, school shirts and ties hanging open for the last time. Marlene smiled at Remus as they walked out, and took his other arm.

“And they say it takes girls forever to get ready.”

“Sorry. Nice goal today, by the way.”

“Thanks. Didn't win us a championship, but it still feels pretty good.”

"You'll always be a champion in my eyes, Cherry."

"Sop."

With James and Sirius splitting the load, they all made their way down the dark street, dodging street lamps and being careful to hide from any late-night trolleys or large groups of passersby.

“Do you think we’ll all really still be friends in twenty years?” Peter asked, as they made their way toward the treeline. "Statistically speaking, most childhood friend groups barely make it to late-adolescence. If we're going by that standard then we've already expired."

"Expired? Way to bring the mood down, Wormtail," Sirius huffed, half struggling under the weight of the capsule. Remus noticed and came forward to help, only to be waved off with a steady; "I got it, I got it."

“Of course we'll still be friends,” James said afterwards. “We’ve made it twelve years already, what’s twenty more?”

“I’ve only been here for three,” Remus pointed out.

“But you’re so stubborn, Moony. Couldn’t get rid of you if we wanted to.”

“And we don’t want to,” Lily added keenly.

“Speaking of getting rid of,” Mary started, “Potter—what’d that scout say to you earlier on the pitch? You never said.”

Immediately, several heads craned in his direction, and James fell to a stop on the edge of the forest. “Well… If you must know... He offered me a contract.”

Peter’s mouth fell open. “No way.”

“What sort of contract?” Remus asked.

“He means a team wants to sign him,” Marlene said, equally stunned.

“Just as a youth recruit,” James amended. Not discouraged by this fact, Sirius promptly dropped his end of the capsule, making James stumble while Sirius reached over to shake him by the shoulders.

“What team, you lunatic—what team?!”

“L-Liverpool!”

Sirius’ eyes grew two sizes. “What?! I thought that Liverpool never took people outside of the academies? And you! You’re already eighteen!”

“I know,” James said, “but McGonagall wrote the team and they sent a scout. It’s… It’s pretty crazy.”

“It’s more than crazy—it’s brilliant!” Marlene trilled. “What’d you say?!”

“I said no, obviously.”

That shut everyone up.

“You said no?” Lottie echoed.

“Mhm. Told him thanks, but I already have plans of my own.”

“Does this mean you've told your parents?” Lily asked.

“Yep. Called dad over dinner.”

“And surely he shouted some sense into you?” Peter demanded.

James just shook his head. “Maybe he was a bit disappointed, sure, but he told me to do what I thought was right. And that he’d support us no matter what we chose.”

“Wow…” Mary said. “Is he looking for a daughter?”

James laughed then, but it was Sirius who stepped forward. “You do know that Liverpool’s been in the top three teams of the division for the last six years running, right?”

“ 'Course I know, but what do I need with a top three English football team? I’m gonna be in the biggest band in the world.”

Sirius paused, and then raised a knuckle to his mouth to hide his smile. “Aw, alright—c’mere, you bleedin’ tart!” Throwing his arms around him, Sirius clung tightly to best friend while the pair of them laughed, and all it took was a single beckoning hand for all eight of them to be hugging again. As he held his friends, Remus pushed all thoughts of Manchester and university from his mind. He didn’t need it, and he didn’t want it.

Everything he wanted was right there.

When they eventually broke apart, Lily kissed James on the cheek (as did Sirius, though his was much more passionate) and they picked up the sheet-covered capsule to trek further into the trees. Guided by the light of the girls’ torches, they walked until the path started to look familiar again, and soon enough the darkness gave way to a small clearing with a large pit dug out in its centre.

“Let’s make a pact,” James suggested as he and Sirius set the capsule down at the pit’s edge. “Even if we aren’t friends anymore, we’ll all agree to come back and open this thing together.”

“What if by then I hate your guts?” Sirius teased, wiping sweat from his brow.

“You still have to come, it’s part of the pact.”

“We could always drag him back by his hair,” Mary suggested, setting down her own bag. "That'd get him moving."

“Won’t have to drag me back,” Peter said, unzipping his school pack and pulling out a large handful of comic books—copies of Eagle, Spider-man, and Captain Britain among them. “Man, I’m really gonna miss these issues.”

“I’m still not convinced they’re gonna be worth any money,” said Lottie.

“Shows what you know. One day they’re gonna start making these into movies or something, and then you’ll be eating your words.”

“Guess we’ll find out in twenty years,” Sirius interjected, stepping between the two squabbling siblings to tear away the sheet, revealing the old metal capsule.

“Oh my god,” Marlene gasped straight away; “Is that…?”

“Oh, that’s right, you girls didn't hear. We may have snuck out and robbed your favourite display over at Castle Hall, McKinnon. Kept the capsule for more personal reasons though.”

“What’d you do with the rest of it?”

“It’s perfectly protected, don’t worry. Filch’s office makes for a great storage space.”

“Figure it’ll take them years to find it in there,” James grinned.

Lily’s mouth dropped open into a very shocked ‘o’. “You mean you actually stole from the school?!”

“As if it was the first time,” Peter snorted.

“That time capsule was half a century old! It was part of history!”

“Sexist history!” Sirius rebuffed. “Or were you not there when McKinnon was having kittens over the whole thing?”

“I was there,” Lottie chimed in, making the rest of them snigger.

“We made sure to dig through it first though,” James said, busy rooting through his pocket; “Even managed to find this.”

Extending his hand, James gave Marlene a faded piece of an old school article, dated all the way back to November of 1927. While the other girls crowded around, Mary slipped in a small patch of mud and nearly dropped her torch.

"Fucking woods... Can't see anything out here!"

"Just read it aloud, Marls," Lily urged.

Taking a second to clear her throat, Marlene raised her torch; “ ‘This year, the top student award in an academic standing goes to Margery "Midge" Williams, who shattered over five academic records that had been previously set by her peers. Miss Williams is described by her professors as a 'brilliant mind with limitless potential' and is on course to attend Oxford University this coming September, where she will be studying medicine in hopes of being among the first female graduates to pursue surgery. Pictured below is Miss Williams, holding her certificate while shaking hands with Headmaster Dippet'. Good work... Midge'."

As Marlene lowered the notice, she found Sirius and the other boys grinning at her.

"We thought you should see a bit of female Hawkings history for yourself," he said. "Do you like it?"

Marlene nodded, before sniffing and wiping her eyes. "God—I think I'm gonna cry."

"Awe, Marls!" Mary hugged her, and Marlene held her arm while sparing Remus a sheepish glance.

"Look at me while I'm crying and I'll punch you."

Remus shrugged, and hugged her too.

"Okay, I'd say it's about time to get this show on the road," James said later, when Marlene had recovered enough to dole out several punches. "Time to load 'er up, ladies."

One by one, each of the girls stepped forward and began pulling small items from their bags. When it was her turn, Lily produced an entire photo album, of which she stopped to show Remus—pointing out a small series of photographs featuring four boys with flowers in their hair.

"I made sure to make copies," she told him, "but I think it'll be nice to open this up when we're older and see our younger selves again."

"Our 'younger selves'? Way to blow my mind, Lils."

Mary added several items herself, such as the Rowena patch from her old school jacket and a collage of her favourite celebrities that she'd made out of glitter and magazine clippings. Marlene included the game line-up of the final tournament as well as Midge's article and a diary she'd been keeping throughout the year, and Lottie slipped in a letter she'd written to her future self, a list of every boy she'd ever kissed and their rating out of ten, as well as a tiny clay sculpture of the Goddess Aphrodite, which she'd made in art class when she was fourteen.

“What the hell you putting that in for?” Peter asked.

“To remind me of the beauty of the female form.”

“It looks more like a gnarled tree trunk with a face.”

“Tell you what, when we take it out again in twenty years, I’ll celebrate by smashing it over your head.”

It went on like that—letters, photos, a single badly produced demo track—until the case was nearly full. At one point, James remembered that he'd left something in his other pocket, and pulled out a blue baby bonnet, along with a torn stred of a label bearing the words Baker's Favourite Bleacher Flour.

"Poor Prongs Junior," he moaned, kissing the paper label. "Gone, but never forgotten."

He tossed the label and bonnet in, while Sirius rolled his eyes. "And now for something actually worthwhile..." With no further prompting, he produced the single 8-track tape they’d made and held it aloft for all of them to see. “Here's to the music,” he said, “and to all of our favourite songs.”

“You mean we’re really not going to play it?” Lily asked, sounding disappointed. Sirius tipped his head wryly in her direction and smiled.

“Have faith, Evans. I'm sure when you listen to it, it'll feel like no time's passed at all.”

And then he tossed the tape into the capsule with a short clatter. It was full after that, officially completed with a part of each of them. To Remus the capsule felt like an accumulated treasure trove; a collective effort of who they were, much like how all the best songs and albums they would go on to produce would surely feel, though they didn’t know it then.

Equal parts of all of them, equal parts in the charade, equal parts in the end.

With the capsule full, James went to shut its lid, and Remus remembered what he’d been hiding in his back pocket.

“Hold on, Prongs. Got one more thing.”

Untucking the letters from his pocket, he smoothed them out in his hands and felt his fingers begin to shake.

"Remus, what's that?" Lily asked, laying a comforting palm on his arm.

A chance? He wondered, then;

No.

A cage.

"My dad wants me to go to school," he told them, passing the letter around for each of them to take a look. "More than anything else, he wants me to make something of myself. He would rather me buy my way into a decent life than take the risk of an extraordinary one... But he's never understood me, don't think he's ever really wanted to. And I don't hate him for who he is to me—he can't help it any more than I can. But... I want different things, and I'm gonna do it my way, not anyone else's."

"I think that's an admirable thing," Lottie said softly, passing him back the letters. Remus stared down at them for a while, doubting—until he remembered Lily's hand on his arm, and the thought of all of his friends' faces washed it away.

Remus took a breath, and on the exhale, he tossed the letters inside the capsule and watched as James shut the lid up tight.

They struggled a bit getting it into the hole, and it took a while to rebury, but as Sirius pat the final shovelful of dirt into place, Remus knew he'd made the right choice. As they all dusted the dirt from their clothes, Mary and Marlene began passing around tiny styrofoam cups from the dining hall, which they filled generously with whisky from Sirius' flask.

"To us!" Sirius declared, raising a toast.

"To friends!" James added. "To love and care and all the other bits!"

"And to staying together," Remus finished, giving Sirius a very fond look.

" 'TO STAYING TOGETHER'!"

They knocked their tiny cups together over the freshly-buried hole, toasting each other and themselves, and polished off the booze.

“Whoooo… burns so good,” Sirius coughed, before crushing his cup in his hand. “Now I suppose it’s a good time to tell you all about my plan for a final prank.”

" 'Prank'?" At least three of them echoed.

"Woah, don't all start applauding at once."

“What do you mean 'prank', Sirius?" Lily exclaimed. "I thought that thing back at the tournament was your final prank!”

“What? No, are you crazy? A final prank has to involve all of us, or it’s not a Marauders’ prank at all.”

Lily covered her face, but James and Peter looked on, appearing far too eager.

“What’d you have in mind, Padfoot?”

Sirius began stroking his chin thoughtfully. “McGonagall’s holding our grand end-of-school send-off in the Great Hall tomorrow, right?”

They all nodded.

“Great. Now how many chickens do you reckon it’ll take to make her rethink her choice of location?”

As Sirius’ smile turned absolutely wicked, Lily peeked out from behind her fingers;

“Oh no.”

“I think you mean, oh yes." Sirius wiggled his eyebrows, before slinging an arm around James and Peter and drawing them in close. "Ladies, lads, best drink up, ‘cause we ain’t sleeping tonight…”

Chapter End Notes

I feel compelled to put here that my dear friend Charlotte does not actually ship snily (or does she? 👀)

I am still planning on putting the final 'school years' chapter out next week, but if my illness persists/gets worse, it might have to be post-poned. Should I decide to do that, I'll put out a post on tumblr (@motswolo) as well as make an edited note here. Otherwise, see you next week for our final school chapter ever <333

Chapter 96: The Great Last Day

Chapter Summary

I am dedicating this chapter to all of you who love music as much as Remus Lupin. To all of you who are as kind as James Potter, and as wild as Sirius Black, and as dear as Peter Pettigrew. To everyone who's kept up with this story for as long as they have, and for all of you who've just discovered it.

This one is most certainly for you <3

Chapter Notes

There is really no reading this chapter without the music.
None.
Zip.
It won't work.
And so I advise you to resist until you have a moment alone, where you can play our songs and think about these boys in all of their foolish loveliness.
HERE is a link to a “tape” of songs the characters will be listening to in fic. My advice: have it queued for the final scene of this chapter, when all the students have moved back down to the football pitch. I promise you will not regret it.

Also, one very special shout out to Anita, who came to me all the way back in April and asked if I could put the song "Ballroom Blitz" into the fic. Even then, I had the wonderful pleasure of telling her, that I already had <3

PS: A lovely tumblr follower has also decided to start translating the fic into Russian. You can find that linked here.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Two of us wearing raincoats,
Standing solo in the sun;
You and me chasing paper,
Getting nowhere on our way back home;
We’re on our way home,
We’re on our way home,
We’re going home…

- “Two of Us” The Beatles, 1970

He was far too drunk. How could he not be? It was the eve of their last day at school ever.

Ever.

The thought hit him like a train. Once he would've killed to say as much; back when he was younger, angrier. Back when all he wanted was to live in The End with Tomny and be anyone else. It'd been easier then, in some ways. Less rules, less people to disappoint. Less friends to hold him when he was feeling ill. And he had been ill, for a long time. Wouldn't find out how ill for a long time yet, but still... they made things easier.

After they'd buried the time capsule and christened the earth with their empty bottles, all eight of them set themselves to Sirius' plot of insanity. It took nearly all night, but when they were finished Remus and the boys shambled back to their dorm with their hearts thrumming in anticipation. It was an unspoken truth that they'd be alone; that the girls would depart on their own for a few precious hours longer in the room they'd grown up in. There'd be plenty of opportunities to fall together in a drunken pile later on, for now everyone had their own memories to say farwell to.

"Goodbye bed," James blubbered, pressing his face into the maroon curtains. "Goodbye side table, goodbye lamp. Goodbye mysterious piece of gum that's shaped like Winston Churchill."

"Go on, Pot," Sirius said, swaying dubiously as he helped his friend into bed. "There'll be other beds."

"Not like these," James whimpered, still clinging to the curtains.

"Here, then."

Sirius peeled the stale wad of gum from the bedpost and handed it to James. At first the expression on his face had read as horror—the gum had been an unspoken companion for as long as they'd lived in the room—but then James simply started crying again.

"Sirius, you're so nice," he whimpered, as Sirius nodded mechanically and brought the covers up over him. "I love you, man. Really!"

"Yeah, yeah. You too, mate."

"Sirius, will you tuck me in too?" Peter moaned, legs half hanging off of his own bed.

"Bloody christ... Do I have to do everything around here?"

As Sirius wobbled drunkenly toward Peter's bed, Remus sat crouched beneath his own. He had his mother's case open again, and was gently moving the last of his belongings from his bedside into it for safe-keeping. He hadn't meant to leave things to the last moment, but life had just been so busy lately. As he packed away the tapes boxes and the cigarette boxes—some of them empty—he eventually came across the final photo in his collection, still rumpled and creased from the days it'd spent living in his pocket, and all the lives it'd lived before that.

Finished with Peter, Sirius turned around and gently nudged Remus' thigh with his foot.

"What about you? Need tucking in?"

"I'm okay."

Sirius crossed his arms. "Well? Aren't you gonna ask me if I need tucking in?"

Remus shook his head, regretting it only when the room began to spin. "Be there in a tick."

Sirius retreated genially, and Remus turned back to the tiny white trunk and the photograph in his hand. April 23rd 1954, it read. They smiled at him, the same way they had the first time he'd ever held it. It'd almost burned him back then. It didn't anymore. Yes, the ache was still there, but like most hurts, it'd grown dull over time. Perhaps eventually it wouldn't bother him at all.

"Moooooooony..."

"Coming, Pads."

He held the photograph for a moment longer, and could swear he was lighter. For the first time he thought that yes, he did look like him. Tad. Once that would've bothered him too.

It didn't anymore.

I don't need you, he thought; but I'm glad you exist.

Before shutting the trunk, he slid the photograph into one of his books. He'd forget come morning which book, but it'd be protected and that was all that mattered.

Peeling away the day's dirty clothes, Remus lifted Sirius' bed covers and climbed in next to him. Sirius' arms were warm around him. His hair, like spilled ink, was dark on the pillow.

Remus buried himself in it; the warmth, the dark, and shut his eyes.

* * *

Friday 16th June 1978 - The Last Day of Term...

"Right, now it's two o'clock, and you all know what that means. I'm afraid our final music lesson has reached its end."

There came a chorus of groans—twenty-five unhappy nine year-olds, each disappointed by the idea of having to let go of the only cool teachers they'd ever had. Little Dominic Henley honked his trumpet indignantly, while the whole of the percussion section began banging their drums and ringing their bells in protest.

"Come on now," Remus tried, shouting over the noise; "Surely you wouldn't want our last day to end on such a sour note?"

He surveyed them, their tiny, forlorn faces, and felt pride begin to bubble up in his chest.

"I never thought I would miss this, but I will. And that's okay. You all have come so far, if you keep practising then I'm sure you'll be blowing Bach out of the water one day. You should be very proud, all of you—well done."

He clapped for them, and they clapped too, but it was clear what they were all waiting for.

Or who they were waiting for.

"Any parting words of wisdom, Mr. Black?"

Despite Remus' speech, Regulus did not look impressed. He stood behind the teacher's podium with his usual uniform of Salazar green and a frown.

"Honestly I'm disappointed," he said. "Eight months and not a single one of you can manage the introduction to ‘Für Elise’. You've no discipline, lack general motivation, and there's simply no relying on you to do any of the work on your own. It's almost as if you think people play music for fun. Well, you wanna know what I have to say to that?"

The entire class baulked as Regulus turned to the tiny drummer boy sitting off to his left.

"Jacob, tell them what I have to say!"

The boy raised his drumsticks dubiously, and then brought them down again in three sharp strokes;

BA-DUM-TSSS!

"I say job well done."

The children erupted into fitful bouts of laughter, each squealing their delight. They came to him in a rush—first the girls, then all the rest—hugging his legs, begging him to stay. They loved him; even with all the prickly demeanour he could muster, they loved him. And Remus loved to watch.

When the chairs had been stacked and all the instruments had returned to whence they came, Remus tucked Sheila's guitar back into its case. He'd kept the photograph of her and his baby-self at the christening, and now it hung taped to the inside of the lid. Little victories...

"They have gotten better," he called, smiling down at the guitar. "Mrs. Bean told me they're the best sounding class of fifth years she's ever had."

"Not best behaved, though."

"Yes well, who'd take 'well behaved' over smiles like those."

There was a pair of snaps as Regulus shut his violin case. He had his back to him, but Remus imagined him smiling too. Just a little.

"You're really very good with them," he said, leaning casually back against one of the desks. "Think you'll do it again next year?"

"Without you?" It was a scoff more than it was a question.

"Why not? I think you'd be good at it. Good enough to be a teacher yourself, if you really wanted."

Regulus turned on him then, and where Remus expected dismissal, he found hesitation.

"I'm not the one who's good with them, you are," he huffed. "You're the patient one, I just know all the notes. If you're seriously telling me that that's the only thing you need to be a qualified te—"

Remus held up a hand, head shaking. "No, you're right," he mused. "It takes far more than just knowing a few notes to run a music class. You've got to keep them in line, make sure they listen. Then you've also got to excite them—make them want to learn. You have to comfort them when they struggle, celebrate them when they overcome... And that's exactly what you've been doing, Regulus. Now, I'm no expert, but I'd say that makes you more than qualified."

A flush began to creep up beneath Regulus' collar. "But you're the one who started it," he said, busying himself by tapping the stack of sheet music into a neat pile; "They follow you."

"Maybe. But look, you can be as 'sacrificial lamb' as you want about this, but you didn't need me, Regulus. Not for the important bits. Those you did all on your own, for eight whole months. You can be proud, you know."

"My father always said pride is man's number one downfall."

"Mine always said I was his kid. Parents can be liars."

The look Regulus gave him was incredulous, but Remus only shrugged.

"Makes it easier if you joke about it."

They lapsed into silence, and Remus glanced at the clock hanging on the classroom wall. Already the others would be down at the church, setting up what would be the final show of their entire school-career. It'd been hard going in the beginning, but with the help of Bobby and the other lads, the plan was shaping up to be the prank of the century. Best get a move on before one of them accidentally blows their fingers off.

Picking up his guitar, Remus wrapped his school bag over one shoulder and prepared his goodbye;

"I'll see you later, then?" He called. "For the party and the tour with the new seventh years?"

Regulus nodded. "Remember, we're meeting at the dining hall, then outside the Great Hall for the tours. Don't be late."

"Wouldn't dream of it."

Smirking, Remus turned away but stopped just short of the door. When he glanced back, he found Regulus staring down at the stack of sheet music.

"You can be whatever you want, Regulus," he told him. "But I think you'd make a pretty great teacher too."

Regulus looked up at him, his usual aloofness having returned.

"Yes, well... I suppose if you could do it, anyone could."

Remus shrugged. "You got me there. See you."

Outside the sun was shining. Heaps of kids had taken to the lawns, playing games and enjoying what was to be their last full day on campus. After supper McGonagall was set to give her leavers speech, and come morning, the class of 1978 would be parting for good. That wasn't to say they weren't going to get a few good laughs in first.

On his way to the church, Remus passed by the Great Hall in all its exuberant finery. Normally the hall was reserved for large events, such as exams and the odd theatre performance; all other days it tended to sit empty, but not this day. Today it was mayhem, and everyone knew it.

Chickens! Chickens everywhere!

They were spilling out of the hall's main doors like flood water, squawking and preening for what might've been their first and only taste of real freedom. As it turns out, the barnyard fowl had mysteriously appeared in the Great Hall overnight, leaving behind a mess that could've turned even the strongest of stomachs. The stench was foul, and Remus could see teachers and school workers holding handkerchiefs to their noses as they ran about, desperately trying to corral the beasts. Feathers and muck scattered the lawn, and while a large group of students stood by to gawk, Professor McGonagall hung furiously around the top step with a very pursed look on her face.

"I don't understand where they all came from, Minerva!" Professor Flitwick cried, letting out a strangled yelp as one of the chickens soared overhead and clipped him with its feet.

"Tricky things, chickens," came Professor Kettleburn, the old agricultural teacher with only one eye. "They've been known to open doors, you know. Why, once in the middle of the night, I found one swimming in my bathtub, I did! Figured a storm blew its coop open."

"This was no storm," Professor McGonagall thundered.

Quickly, Remus turned and legged it the opposite direction.

It was still mid-afternoon by the time he made it down to the chapel. He'd had to dodge a few passing priests on their way out of the parsonage, but after they'd advanced to the other end of the courtyard, Remus creeped up the church's front steps and slipped inside. The main foyer and the sanctuary were both empty, but Remus made sure to keep quiet as he cut across the back of the room and darted up the balcony's staircase. It felt a little silly to be sneaking around in broad daylight, but he wasn't there to confess his sins. If anything, he was orchestrating them.

Flinching at every groaning stair, Remus finally emerged on the balcony's landing, where hence he found James and Sirius arguing over how to fit the stage platform together. It'd taken them nearly all night, but somehow they'd managed to haul everything from the music room up to the church's second floor veranda. All of their instruments sat piled up along the balcony's far wall along with the several speakers they'd borrowed from the AV room, though they all paled in size when compared to the church's mighty pipe organ. A tool in their initial prank all the way back in Remus' first year, the grand instrument was now perfectly outfitted to play the backdrop for their final one.

Remus could hardly wait.

"No, no, no—you gotta put the pin in one notch higher," Sirius hissed, as he and James struggled to fit two brackets of the stage together.

"I'll notch you," James grumbled back. "Why don't you lift the bloody thing higher then? Maybe that way I could put the pin in instead of supporting the whole thing myself."

“I am lifting it!”

“Are you sure? ‘Cause the lack of strain in your bicep says otherwise.”

“Fine. Ugh—This enough for you?”

“Is that you actually flexing?”

“Oh fuck off.”

Remus almost laughed. Clearly the lack of sleep was getting to them.

“Oi,” he called, “be any louder and the Heavenly Father Himself might overhear you.”

Not expecting to find anyone behind him, Sirius nearly dropped his end of the platform, causing James to hiss as his fingers got caught beneath. “MOTHERF—NGH!”

There was a clatter as James dropped his end and wheeled away. Remus winced just watching.

“Oops. My bad."

Huffing, Sirius set his half of the bar down and went to his friend. “Sorry. Your hand okay?”

“Yeah, s’fine,” James said, grimly sucking on his thumb. “You finished with your kiddie lessons then, Moons?"

"Yeah. Regulus says hi."

"Really?"

Remus made a face. "No?"

James turned away, still sucking grumpily on his thumb, while Sirius stepped up and took Remus' guitar from him.

"This place is looking good," Remus said, glancing at the stack of amps behind stage-right. "Think it'll be ready for later?"

"Only if Pete can sort the electrical on time," Sirius said. "He's downstairs, working on that ancient plugboard in the cupboard. Say, you got that...?"

In answer, Remus raised his wrist, showing off one of the hair bands he'd pawned off of Mary that morning.

"Ah, bless'm," Sirius said, removing the hair bauble and kissing Remus' wrist on the way. “I didn’t even hear you come up the stairs," he said, mumbling around the elastic as he gathered the rest of his hair into a ponytail. "You think we should be keeping watch?"

"If you haven't been caught so far then I'd say we're alright. They found the chickens, by the way."

Sirius lit up. "Really?! How'd it go? We've never used that many chickens before—was it a total mess?"

"Worse. I'll wager that if McGonagall spots any of us she'll let Filch skin us and wear our hides as a coat."

"Well, I think I'd make a very handsome hat, don't you?"

"Yeah. I think that hair of yours would just about pass for raccoon fur."

Sirius smirked bashfully, and just then a tremendous blast of noise came soaring out of one of the amps. When they spun around, they spotted James with his guitar strapped across his chest, leaning down over the balcony railing.

"SOUNDS GREAT, PETE!"

"Potter!" Sirius lashed, rushing forward to slap his hand over the amp's off switch. "Are you trying to get us skinned alive?"

James threw his hands up, offended. "What? Gotta test the equipment before the show, don't we?"

As the two set back to bickering, Remus adjusted the strap of his bag and began backing toward the stairs. Sirius caught him just as he was about to slip away;

"Off so soon, Moons? Suppose you've got your perky little prefect party to attend."

"Just say you're jealous, Padfoot!"

"Pull my own teeth out first!" Sirius hollered. "Have fun with MacDuff and my brother, traitor! We'll be here, setting up the prank of a lifetime!"

"Miss you already!"

"Wanker. Oh, and don't forget—the field! Tell everyone you see the party's happening on the field! After the show!"

Remus waved behind himself, dropping down into the foyer below. As he did, he heard James hiss;

"Oi, Black, what happened to being quiet...?"

"Don't be a hypocrite, Potter. You used to moan from the back of the classroom during silent study."

"That was always your idea!"

It was hard not to laugh. Even when the days of exams and pranks were long behind them, would those two always be so JamesandSirius, Remus wondered?

He hoped so.

It was harder to avoid any teachers and staff on his way back toward the dining hall. When he walked in, Remus half expected to find Professor McGonagall waiting for him with mediaeval shackles in her hands, but instead all he found were the other prefects, each of them dressed nicely and swarmed around a table ladled with cake and pudding. There was music going—a lot of Wings and Paul McCartney —but no one complained when he showed up in plain slacks and his Sex Pistols t-shirt. In fact, judging from their reaction, they'd expected it. Word must've already spread regarding the chickens, and Remus was immediately bombarded with questions regarding the stunt and whatever else the Marauders had planned for that evening.

"Is it true we're throwing the leavers' party on the football pitch?" Asked one of them.

"Yeah, so tell all your friends," answered Remus.

"Was it really you guys who put the chickens in the Great Hall last night?" Demanded another.

"Now where'd you hear a rumour like that?"

"I heard you were the ones who put the trolley in the lake!"

"Er..." The questions were coming faster now.

“Is it true you nicked more equipment from the AV room again?”

"No way, where'd you put it?"

“Yeah, do you need help hiding the stereos this time around?”

"I want in!”

“Remus, are you really leaving school to be in a band? Like really, really?!”

He could barely keep up; but it was good to know that his friends had succeeded in spreading the word. Remus just hoped that none of the teachers had caught wind; it would've been disappointing to put a stop to a party before it'd even started.

“Just make sure you bring all of your stuff down to the pitch tonight,” he hushed to everyone. “Tell everyone in our year to bring blankets and torches."

"And bug spray," sniggered one.

"Can people in other years come too?" Whispered another.

"Yeah, 'course. It's just for fun anyway."

In truth the camp-out had been James’ idea, but even Lily had gotten behind it in the end. They’d all agreed that sleeping out under the stars seemed the perfect way to end their final day at school, and judging by the looks of fascination Remus was getting from the other prefects, they were right.

When he was halfway through his pudding, he was approached by a friendly boy named David Alcott. Remus had only ever spoken to David a handful of times, but he seemed perfectly eager to be in on the plot when he strode up to Remus and tapped him on the shoulder.

“I heard another little rumour going around, Lupin. Word is, that you and yours are hosting a private concert, that true?”

“Ask me after church later.”

“Why, what’s happening in the church?”

Remus swallowed the giddy instinct to blab, and instead did something very un-Remus-like; he pulled David in close, as if they were friends, and smiled. “Can I trust you to keep a secret, David?”

The consensus was positive and Remus eagerly bent his head in closer so that he might begin explaining everything. Afterwards he and David shared a fist-bump, and Remus withdrew his arm.

“Remember, get as many kids into the centre aisle as you can. Tell others if you like, so that we can fill it up. We don’t want any of the teachers or fathers to catch on too early otherwise they'll ruin everything. When it's over we'll all meet down at the pitch.”

“You can count on me, mate. Can’t wait to see this—it’s gonna be absolutely legendary!”

Smiling, Remus had just turned away when a camera flash caught him across the face, leaving him momentarily incapacitated.

"Sorry, Remus," Jillian cooed, flapping the fresh polaroid through the air. "I just needed proof."

"Proof of what?" Remus grumbled, rubbing his eyes.

"That I knew you before you were a famous rock star. This could be worth a lot of money someday, you know. After all, not all prefects can get away with having piercings and tattoos.”

“It’s one tiny tattoo, which I received against my will. How do you even know about that anyway?”

“Girls talk,” she shrugged, before popping her chewing gum. "Now chop-chop. We've still got a few kiddies to show around campus."

It was cutting it close, but Remus didn't have a proper excuse to get out of doing the tours. He figured that at least if McGonagall were to find him there, she'd have to consider his generous contribution to the school when sorting out a punishment.

“This—is the Great Hall!” Remus hollered, stopping his group of seventh years just below the hall’s main steps. “You’ll write all your examinations here, but they also use it for drama lessons, team-building exercises, and all the other stuff no one cares about.”

There was a second holler as one of the kids through their arm out in a point;

"CHICKEN!”

Sporting several fresh scratches to his face and neck, Filch had appeared at the top of the hall's steps with a single chicken tucked under one arm. He scowled when he saw the kids, and the bird promptly pecked at his shrivelled, old hand. It made the caretaker yelp, and he promptly dropped the bird, only to have to chase it back into the hall again.

"Oh, well yes," Remus said, as everyone laughed. "Apparently it's a popular spot with chickens too."

They continued on with the tour, passing Castle Hall and weaving in and out of the science and arts blocks. A few of the more dutiful eleven year-olds were scanning their campus maps as their guides called out to them, while others just drifted this way and that, looking about as excited as Sirius in detention. Near the back, Regulus had busied himself with regularly scolding a pair of boys who had thought it funny to use the side of every building as target practice for their spit wads. A small group of girls stuck close-by, whispering to each other and hiding small giggles behind their maps. Regulus didn't seem to notice.

"You're becoming popular," Remus said to him, when they made a tour toward House Lane.

"You're crazy," Regulus said, then, more boldly; "I've always been popular."

"Oh my god, was that vanity? Coming from our Edge?"

"I can't wait until you leave Hawkings, Lupin."

Regulus went on ahead, ushering the students past one of the main trolley depots and doing his best to help them understand the different routes. While he did so, Remus fell into step with Trish, who was lagging toward the back and absent-mindedly balancing an unlit cigarette between her nose and top lip.

"Well, if it isn't the great Remus Lupin," she mused, moving the cigarette behind her ear, "breaker and mender of hearts."

"I don't remember breaking your heart, Trish. Does that mean you have one for me to mend?"

He'd meant it as a joke, but after seeing the smile slip from Trish's face, he instantly grew to regret it.

"He's not that good-looking," she muttered, eyes trained on the front of the group. Remus didn't have to ask who she meant. "Looks more like a bastard, if you ask me. A gommy, self-important little bastard."

"Shit, Trish... I'm—"

"Ah, shut yer puss, Remington. I'm not killing ma'self over it. Just a bit upset, is a'h."

"Did he say something to you? Was he rude—"

"Nah, nah. Now it's last day, dinnae fash yerself."

"How can you say that? If he said something foul, then you deserve a chance to return it, tenfold!"

"But he didn't." Trish smiled quietly, kicking a stone from her path. "I told him I fancied him, 'n that dobber... That fucking dobber... He said that I was the prettiest girl he'd ever had the pleasure of talking to."

"He did."

"Mhm."

"Then why...?"

"Because." And then she looked up at him, voice almost a whisper; "Ain't it obvious? There's someone else."

Oh.

Trish looked him up and down sceptically, before finally sighing and moving the cigarette down to her lips. "So I told him how I felt 'n he didnae feel the same, big whoop. He could've laughed at me, but he didn't. Instead he..." She cleared her throat. "Have ye got a light, my dear gowk?"

He did, and so as the tour group grew further away, Remus bent down and lit the cigarette for her.

"He never said wha 'twas, in case ye were wondering," she muttered, almost dismissively. "Just that it couldnae work. Guess we're both losers in love."

"You're not a loser, Trish. You're..." He looked down at her; her tartan dress and gleaming dress shoes paradoxed by the large tear in the knees of her stockings. "Well, you're..."

"Go on, dinnae break your neck."

"You're cool," Remus amended. "I mean, I like you, so..."

"And that's supposed tae be a compliment because, what—you dinnae like anyone?" She laughed then, heartily, hand over stomach. "I should be so humbled. Too bad you're about as sprung as a daisy in June."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Oh come on, Remington. You... Black..." She made a 'go on' motion with her hands. "I ken I have a funny accent but I'm not an eejit."

Suddenly Remus felt a lot like pitching himself off of a roof.

"You think that I...? That me... That Regulus and I could ever—?!"

"No! Fuck, in th' name of the wee... I meant older Black! Bigger Black! Wolloping Sirius!"

"Ah."

Trish laughed again, nearly dropping her cigarette. "Dear Loonarny, you always did have a habit o' assuming people were in love wi' you."

"How'd you find out?" He asked, grimly. "Was it... obvious?"

"Obvious? Nah. Nae until ye straight told me, that is."

"I, what?"

"You told me! Dinnae ye mind? It was that day down by the loch. We were talking 'n then Sirius showed up. I was mostly joking, but you—you cried him yer boyfriend! Figured ye meant it, what wi' the way you two are always going along."

He laughed awkwardly. "I don't remember... Did you happen to give me any drugs?"

"Is that a trick question?" Smirking, she passed him the cigarette, and Remus took a long pull as they continued ambling down the pavement.

"Regulus knows," he said, almost surprising himself. "He figured it out too. Actually, pretty sure he figured it out before I did."

"Clever cunt."

"Yeah... But listen, Trish, you can't tell anyone."

"I ken. Figured your band's plan o' world domination might be hindered if it came out that th' lead singer 'n the bass player are doing each other behind the speaker stacks."

"Thanks for that image."

They walked on a bit further, nearing the back of the tour group just as they came to a stop ahead of the first set of dorms. Jillian was at the head of the group, lecturing about the history of each house while most of the kids meandered unenthusiastically around the lawn.

"Listen tae her," Trish chuffed, "she'd lecture to a wall if given half th' chance."

Remus passed the cigarette back, before rocking back and forth on the balls of his feet. “So... Does this mean you and Regulus are still friends then?”

“What? Like I'd just let him drop me? Nah, I spent months working on that bugger. Besides,” she ruminated, “I’m nae so easily deterred.”

“You’ll take care of him then?” Remus asked. “Sirius won't admit it, but he's worried about leaving him behind."

“Yeah, tell Black number one not to worry. I’ll stick so close, Reginald’s gonna think I’ve started growing off o' his arse.”

“Thanks, Trish.”

She took another drag, and then promptly punched him in the arm. Even as he rubbed the soreness from his new bruise, Remus knew that he would miss her too.

"That reminds me," Trish said, as she kicked another stone onto the lawn. "Find me after the assembly, I have a gift for you."

"A gift?"

"Just a wee something. You know, for luck."

Remus shrugged genially. "Oh. In that case, could always use more luck..."

"Hey! Who said you could have a smoke break?" It was Regulus, come to chide them for being useless dregs to society. "Don't think you're getting out of this so easily!" He called, practically shaking a fist at them.

"Who's smoking? I'm not smoking," Trish said, grinding the cigarette out on the bottom of her shoe. "Remington, were ye smoking? Tsk-tsk."

Regulus crossed his arms, and Trish came forward, tapping him fondly on the chest. "Dinnae be such a wee clipe, Reginald, I'm coming."

She twirled around him, humming cheekily, and when she was gone, Regulus gave Remus the eye.

"Did she say anything to you?"

Remus shrugged. "Dunno. She talks so funny I can't understand her half the time."

It was enough to earn him an indifferent eye-roll, and as Regulus marched to the front of the group, Remus followed feeling distinctly pleased.

“This is Byron House,” Regulus called out; “It’s a boys’ dorm. Next door is Finch House, for girls. The secondary campus has a total of ten dorms, and next year you’ll be living in one of them with three other roommates. And you better learn to like them because they're the only ones you're going to get. Now, if you’ll follow me, we’re going to have a tour of the inside so you can get an idea of where you might be living for the next seven years. Girls, follow Stewart and MacDuff into the ladies' dormitory, boys, follow Lupin and me. And don't try and sneak off. If you do, we'll know."

The kids all eagerly followed, and Regulus stopped to hold the door open while ushering them inside. Remus made to do the same, but drew to a halt when he felt a gentle tug on the back of his jacket. Turning around, he found one of the boys had hung back behind the rest and was watching him with an anxious expression. His name tag read, Milton.

Already feeling sorry for the kid, Remus knelt down.

“Feeling okay there, mate?”

Rather than answer, the boy glanced around nervously and gestured for Remus to come even closer. “The other man said we’d have to share a room,” he murmured.

“Yeah, you’ll have roommates, but no more than three," Remus said, counting each off on a finger. "I was nervous too when I first came, but my roomies ended up being pretty cool. Reckon you’ll like it eventually. And if anyone gives you any trouble, you can always talk to Professor McGonagall. She’s pretty nice, I'm sure she'll help you out.”

This didn’t seem to make Milton feel any better. He continued fretting with his fingers, and finally leaned in to whisper in Remus’ ear.

“What do you do if you still wet the bed?”

“You… oh.” Remus cleared his throat. "Milton, do you mind if I go get my friend Regulus? 'Cause he's really good at dealing with stuff like this..."

* * *

Later that evening...

Sirius’ plan had worked, it seemed. With the entire Great Hall smelling of chicken faeces, the whole of the secondary student body was shuffled into the church pews for their final assembly. The crowd seemed rowdier than usual, though most of it was chalked up to the anticipation of summer holidays. Remus couldn’t help but think that they’d also had something to do with the open secret currently rushing from student to student, but that was no one else's business really.

Upset that their precious sanctum of supplication was being bombarded so late in the day, the priests insisted on holding a short service before McGonagall was able to take her place behind the podium. Unlike normal mass, no one had bothered taking roll-call, and so therefore no one would be noticing the four missing boys from room 4A. Rather, Remus got to watch from his hiding spot on the organ balcony, peering through the gaps in the railing while his heart thundered restlessly in his ears.

Th-thump! Th-thump! Th-thump!

Was this what it would feel like—being on stage in front of hundreds —no, thousands of people? Maybe not, considering the entire thing was a prank and they weren’t even supposed to be there... Bleeding christ—he wished he hadn’t let Sirius talk him into wearing makeup, and that he’d told Lottie to buzz off when she’d started layering those curlers in his hair. They'd just left him looking like Bob Dylan, and not even the cool weed-smoking Bob Dylan from his electric days. More like the hippie turned born-again Christian—ugh! And where did Mary even get these slacks?! They were leather, at least a foot too short around the ankles, and were so tight he was sure his bits would fall off come the end of the night.

Glancing back over the railing, Remus was positive.

He was going to throw up.

“I think I’m gonna throw up,” he whispered to James, who was hunkered down next to him, clinging to his guitar for dear life.

James shook his head furiously. He was also wearing trousers two sizes too tight, but that was because they belonged to Sirius. His gelled-up do had returned from the summer prior, though now it was longer and the frantic curls looked about three seconds from bursting free.

“N-Nah, s’good, we’ll be jus’ f-fine,” he stuttered. “W-We jus’ hang tight for S-Sirius’ signal and… Oh god, I’m gonna throw up too.”

“Do us a favour and don’t vomit over the balcony,” Peter murmured, appearing from behind them and almost making Remus jump. Throwing himself down next to James, Peter squinted to get a look at the crowd down below.

“Are Bobby and the lads in place then?” James asked, busy flapping the collar of his jacket. He wasn’t even wearing a shirt beneath—Sirius had convinced him that if Jimmy Page could go shirtless in a bedazzled suit jacket, so could James Potter.

“Yep,” Peter answered, “they know their cues. Should be a real blast.” He chuckled at the pun, before calmly stretching out his neck. Like the rest of them, Peter wasn’t exactly dressed for the usual sneaking or pranking either. He’d refused any eyeliner, but Lottie had somehow swindled him into wearing one of her blinding gold lamé shirts. Remus didn’t say it, but he looked a bit like a walking Christmas tree topper.

“Do you think people will actually cheer for us?” Peter asked.

“Forget cheering—we’ll be lucky if they don’t throw rotten tomatoes,” James yammered nervously. “How are you so damn calm anyway?”

“I did some breathing exercises before the show.”

Remus began to laugh, and then covered his mouth to stifle it.

“Breathing exercises, right…” James peeled his hands away from the guitar neck and flexed his fingers. “Oh god… What if I forget all the notes? What if I forget the words?!”

“Then Sirius'll remember enough for all of us," Peter reassured him. "Stop worrying, Potter. We’ve been playing this song for weeks, way longer than we’ve been planning this.”

“But what if everything gets all jumbled up in my head? What if Sirius can’t even make it up here in time?”

“Then we play until he does,” Remus interjected quietly. All of the fears James was just now realising felt like old hat to him—of course they were bound to forget something, but wasn’t that just one of the many woes of live music?

Fuck, this was so insane.

“How much longer?” He asked, inevitably growing antsy again. Down below, McGonagall had just finished congratulating all the students who’d made top marks on their A-Levels. Remus’ name had been called, though he hadn’t been around to stand up and receive the applause. Suspicious.

James checked his watch. “Should be any second now. Sirius said to start near the end—when McGonagall starts thanking everybody.”

Remus crawled forward slightly, peering through the railing’s bars to get a look at the backs of all of their fellow peers’ heads. Their Headmistress still stood behind her podium at the front of the church, with all the priests and choir kids lined up behind her. Beyond that stood the covered-up statue of Jesus, its white sheet completely still and inconspicuous. If Remus were to tilt his head just right, he would be able to make out the large music amp they’d hidden behind the church’s altar for a certain someone’s grand entrance. They knew from the beginning that they'd only have time for the one song before Bobby's grand finale, which was probably for the best anyway. With the way James' hands were trembling, Remus worried they'd barely get through the first verse.

Busy squinting to see if he could get a glimpse of the white sheet moving, Remus had just managed to spot the girls when a head turned and he found himself making solid eye contact with Davey Gudgeon through the bars of the mezzanine.

“Oh shite!” He yelped, pulling back to face his friends; “Davey just looked right at me. He totally knows we’re up here.”

“Yeah, a‘course he knows, James told the entire football team,” Peter said.

“No, I didn’t,” James whispered back.

“You said you did!”

“I told them about the camp-out, not this. I thought that that’s what we’d agreed upon?”

“Well, I told the prefects,” Remus baulked.

"You did? Moony!"

"Only a few! Sirius said to make sure everyone knew to head down to the field after...”

“You really didn’t tell people about the concert?” Peter asked James.

“No! Did you…?”

Peter cringed slightly. “Uh… yeah. I may have told some people.”

James gaped at him; “How many?”

“Erm… many…”

“Oh, Wormy…”

“Too late to turn back now,” Remus said, peering through the balcony railing once more. The longer he watched, the more kids began to turn their heads. It was like a falling row of dominoes—one would turn to whisper in their neighbour’s ear and then suddenly a fresh pair of eyes would snap back toward the balcony. Some even waved. Remus couldn’t decide whether it made him more nervous or less.

I hope you know what you're doing Sirius...

“Well, Black may not be here, but that don’t mean we can’t cheers to each other,” James said, pulling a small flask from his back pocket and popping the top. “Good luck, lads,” he said, before taking a swig and passing it along to Peter.

“To not choking on stage,” Peter said, raising the flask and taking a swig. “Eugh—fuck, James, you know I hate bourbon.”

"It was all that was left after last night."

Peter handed the bottle to Remus, who paused long enough to swish the booze around and raise it for a quiet toast. “To hopefully getting paid instead of punished for this one day.”

“Here, here!”

James shushed them, and Remus grinned as he tipped the flask back. The alcohol had only just hit his tongue when his gaze passed over the front of the church and he made eye contact with one of the teachers. It was Sheila. She smiled at him—right at him—and then raised one finger to her mouth in a silent shh .

Remus spat bourbon everywhere.

“EUUGH—!”

James slammed one hand down over Peter’s mouth to stifle his moan of disgust, while using the other to gently smother Remus as he coughed and sputtered.

"Oh my god, was that vomit?” Peter groaned, peeling James' hand away. “Try giving us a bit ‘a warning before you spew everywhere.”

“S—Sorry,” Remus wheezed, trying his best to swallow the rest of his coughs.

“Here, take another sip,” James instructed, holding the flask to Remus’ mouth himself. Remus gagged heavily as it went down, but afterwards he was able to breathe again.

“Guys… I think that—ahem… Sheila—”

James grabbed him by the shoulder. “Hold that thought, Moons. I think McGonagall’s finally finishing up!”

They all craned their heads to get a look, and Remus found that James was right. Far below, Professor McGonagall was wiping beneath her eyes and clapping her hands together fondly.

“And I want each and every one of you to know how proud we are of you. You are truly a force to behold. And thank you so much to everyone who—”

Suddenly, a short whistle-screeched echoed from the back of the church, cutting off the headmistress mid-speech and making everyone jump. It was Bobby—or one of Bobby's lads—setting off the tiny whistle-cracker that was to be their cue. The end was upon them, the curtains had been raised;

Their coordinated attack had begun.

“That’s the signal!” Peter cried, already making a mad dash toward his drum kit. Remus and James did the same, scrambling for their guitars and rushing to plug them into the amps. The moment they did, a reverb echoed around the church like thunder, making everyone jump in their pews for a second time. Heads snapped skyward—even those who'd been in on it were surprised.

What in god's name—

“This is it, Pete,” James tittered, stepping up in front of his microphone and covering it with his fist. “S’all you mate!”

Peter, who was normally the first one to be shaking in his boots during any prank, had somehow come alive. He was literally vibrating with excitement, swinging his drum sticks around and clashing a single symbol loud enough to turn every head in the room. From his place on their makeshift stage, Remus now had a full view of every priest, teacher, and student in the house. They all gaped back at him, some more disturbed than others, but there was no stopping it. It was a waterfall, and they were going over.

Peter leaned into his microphone; “ONE—TWO—THREE—FOUR—!”

Just like that they were off to the races. Peter began his drum intro all on his own, a high-intensity fill that seemed to get faster and faster the longer it went on. Kids stood up from their pews to get a better look—teachers covered their mouths in shock, but nothing compared to the moment that Sirius’ voice came shooting through the speakers at the front of the church.

"Are you ready, James?”

James leaned into his mic; “Uh-huh.”

“Remus?”

“Yeah.”

"Pete?”

“Okay!”

“Alright fellas… let’s GOOOOOO!”

In one deft move, the sheet that had been covering the busted statue of Jesus for nearly half of term was ripped away, revealing a single leather-clad, makeup wearing, nail polish adorned, Sirius Black.

He sprung off of the statue like a trained gymnast, bubbling with all the energy he’d been so desperately keeping under wraps throughout the entire service. People screamed when they saw him, to cheer or to condemn; Sirius didn’t care. He had a microphone in one hand, attached to the longest audio cord they could find in the AV room, and he swung it around like it was a trophy. No one else had dared make a move toward him so far—they were too stunned to touch—and Sirius bobbed his head and whirled around the altar like it was a stage made with him in mind.

And when he sang?

Glorious.

“Oh, it’s been getting so hard, living with the things you do to me…"

Remus couldn't believe it. It didn't matter if he could barely feel his fingers, their plan was working. It was bloody working!

"—My dreams are getting so strange, I’d like to tell you everything I see…”

Sirius flashed a smile and one of the girls near the front screamed, throwing her arms in the air as if she could reach out and touch him. By then one of the priests had broken free from his horror-stricken trance and shot forward, attempting to reach the star-streaked boy as he danced around the altar.

“Oh, I see a man in the back as a matter of fact—" Sirius pointed at Professor Bilshin; "his eyes were as red as the sun! And the girl in the corner—lets no one ignore her,” then Ms. Hooch, blowing her a kiss; “ 'Cause she thinks she’s the passionate one!

"OHHH YEAH!”

“Mr. Black! Mr. Black!” McGonagall began to cry out, flapping her arms wildly as she flung herself to her feet. Undeterred, Sirius streaked away, skirting around the far end of the pew until his microphone cord had pulled all the way taunt.

“—And the music was soothing! And they all started grooving!"

“MR. BLACK!”

"—YEAH-YEAH-YEAH-YEAH!”

It was a ballroom blitz. Like flying, Sirius had launched himself over the back of the first pew, only to land straight in the laps of his peers. Hands grabbed him—hauled him to his feet—and a second later he was up again, racing down toward the aisle, straight for their headmistress. The room moved with him—McGonagall had no choice! When Sirius fell into her, she caught him suddenly in her arms and the split-second of disarray allowed Sirius to plant a firm kiss directly on the headmistress's cheek.

The church was a wildfire.

Everywhere they chanted;

“BALLROOM BLITZ! BALLROOM BLITZ! BALLROOM BLITZ!”

He must've stunned her with his candor, as when Sirius stood up to take his place out front again, Professor McGonagall did not stop him. A priest tried to lunge, but Sirius only fell back to be instantly swallowed by the crowd. Kids whooped as he ultimately abandoned the microphone and began racing down the middle aisle toward the balcony’s staircase. Then they swarmed the aisle after him, blocking the way of his pursuers.

As the crowd came apart down below, Remus spared a glance to look down at himself; his fingers were buzzing—flying across the strings of his bass guitar as though the song's rhythm was a second heartbeat. Next to him, James was absolutely wigging out; he swung across their make-shift stage, not with Sirius' grace but his own rabid desire. He shredded that electric guitar, and when it was time to sing again and Sirius was nowhere to be found, James leaned into his mic to dazzle them with a voice of his own.

Remus wondered what colours he saw.

“—Ohh, I softly call you over. Then you appear, there’s nothing left of you…”

And then, grabbing the microphone tightly, James began to howl;

“And the man in the back is ready to crack, as he raises his hands to the sky! And the girl in the corner is everyone’s mourner—” James pointed and Remus just knew it was at Lily; “She could kill you with a wink of her eye!”

“OHHHHH YEAH!”

Sirius had burst up at the top of the stairs right on cue, fresh mic in hand and a look on his face that was higher than any drug.

“And the band started leaving—‘cause they all stopped breathing!”

Coming together in the centre of the stage, James and Sirius began to wail into the same microphone. “

And the man at the back said, ‘Everyone attack’—and it turned into a ballroom blitz! And the girl in the corner said, ‘Boy I want to warn you—it’ll turn into a ballroom blitz’!

"BALLROOM BLITZ!”

The pair blew apart as if electrified and Remus took over completely, the weight of his bass notes vibrating the very floor beneath them. Down below it was as if the entire church was inhaling all at once, just waiting for the beat to drop again. No teacher had managed to get close to the balcony—there were too many students in the way. When he looked up, heart beating out of his chest, Remus spotted Lily and the rest of the girls standing on top of the pews, screaming and hollering like all the rest. Just beyond them was Barty, looking utterly stupefied, and—THERE! It was Trish—riding the shoulders of a very stressed out Regulus.

How she convinced him, Remus had no idea.

“OHHHHH YEAH!”

“It was like lightning—"

LIGHTNING!

"Everybody was frightening—"

FRIGHTENING

"And the music was soothing, and they all started grooving!"

YEAAAAH! YEAH-YEAH-YEAH-YEAH!

"Fucking go, Pete, GO!" James screamed, striking his chords as Sirius took front of stage again, clapping a tambourine in time with the beat. The crowd followed, and the clapping became a thunderstorm. Poor Professor McGonagall had all but given up reaching them—too caught between the sea of romping bodies to even make it through to the stairs. Though, Remus barely noticed;

He was too busy waiting for the real boom.

"It's—It's a ballroom blitz!"

One.

"It's—It's a ballroom blitz!"

Two.

"It's—It's a ballroom blitz!"

Three!

"YEAHHHH—it's a ballroom blitz!"

And then off it went.

BOOM!

BOOM—B—B—B—BOOOOM!

BOOM! BOOM! BOOM! BOOM! BOOM!

The screams were deafening. They drowned out all sound of the music, so loud that the noise shocked even the four Marauders up on their stage. They dropped their instruments in an instant and convened at centre-stage while kids and teachers began to scatter. The shock—and maybe fear—was obviously very real, but none of them would've ever risked their friends' safety for a gag. The firecrackers were only going off behind them, at the front of the church that had already been expertly vacated thanks to the most spectacular distraction Hawkings School had ever seen. No one was in any real danger, but as little Bobby Johnson and his friends of would-be pranksters continued to let off the cheekiest explosives they could cook up in the tenth year science classroom, Remus looked over the church and knew that they'd won.

“We love you, Hawkings!” Sirius shouted into the mike. "We will never forget you... honestly. Never."

He dropped the microphone with another boom, and just like that, began pushing Remus in the direction of the balcony stairs. It was easy enough to throw themselves into the chaos going on down below,and after a strategically planned separation—in which James and Peter went left and he and Sirius went right—Remus found himself by the row of church offices, where they could conveniently make a sharp left and sneak straight out the back doors.

“HOLY SHIT!” Sirius shouted the moment they fell out onto the grass; “HOLY SHIT!”

“I KNOW!” Remus screamed back, still trembling with euphoria. They were alone, and so he grabbed Sirius by either cheek and pulled him in for a single victory kiss. After that they were falling into each other, already losing their heads with laughter.

“Did you see, Bilshin’s face?!” Remus howled.

“He was nothing—you should’ve seen Snape!” Sirius replied.

“I can’t believe that worked!”

“Me neither!”

“Man—I totally fucked up the bridge!”

“Are you joking? Not even! I forgot the lyrics ten seconds in—pretty sure I just shouted nonsense up there!”

“Oh my god—what if I just threw up right now? ‘Cause I think I’m gonna throw up!”

“HA—I already did!”

Remus grappled Sirius into another fierce hug. Yeah, this was it. He could definitely do this forever.

“Where the fuck are Prongs and Wormtail?” Sirius demanded after, while peeking around the side of the church. “They were supposed to meet us—AHH!”

Sirius leapt backward as Sheila Buchanan swept around the side of the building, arms already crossed over her chest. Behind her, they could still hear the flurry of kids pouring out of the church. The fireworks had long since ran out, and Remus hoped Bobby and the others had escaped unscathed. Even if they hadn't, he was too preoccupied worrying over the look of severe rage on Sheila's face to be of much help.

"Do you have any idea what you've done?" She demanded. "Any idea?!"

"Yeah, we've just made history, Sheils," said Sirius, completely brazen.

"Did you, now? And would you happen to know if anyone got hurt while you were off making history?"

"The firecrackers were at the front of the church," Remus insisted. "You all were at the back—"

"Yes! Watching you! You and that insane—I mean, that stunt was just... And you! Oh, you boys! You are in so much…" She took a breath; "In so much—oh hell, I can't even be angry!"

With a great sigh, Sheila pressed a hand to her forehead, grinning as though she were in pain. Across from her, Remus and Sirius shared a look of disbelief.

"You two idiots," she moaned. "What were you thinking pulling a stunt like that on your last day?"

Slowly, the disbelief turned to relief. And Remus finally let out a breath. He was sure he'd never seen Sirius so proud.

"It's because it's our last day, Sheils! Had to do something big, didn't we?"

"You certainly covered 'big'! I mean, Jesus F. Chopin… Please just tell me that you're finished now?"

"Almost," Remus winced, happily; "We did tell everyone in our year that we're camping out on the football pitch tonight, but that's more an event… than a prank…" He stopped because she was squinting at him very harshly, but Sirius just threw an arm around his shoulders.

"So what'd you think? You're our music teacher and you just watched the whole show—we were pretty great, huh? That's your legacy—think we really have a shot of making it one day?"

She opened her mouth, then smiled and shook her head hopelessly.

“I feel I should hand over my teaching license just for saying this… but yes, you boys were pretty good. Doesn’t mean you won’t be punished, though.”

“Are you going to let McGonagall expel us?” Sirius sniggered. “Because the main idea was that she can’t expel what she can’t find.”

“I should, shouldn’t I? It’s what any other sane teacher would do.”

“But you just said you’d hand over your license, so…?”

Sheila gave them both a very hard look. “You’ll have to clean it up.”

“We will!” Remus nodded.

“All of it! The instruments, the explosives, the Christ on a cross—”

“You can count on us, Sheils,” Sirius said, giving her the two-finger salute. “It’s just… Do you mind if I change first? These leather pants are giving me a major front-wedgie.”

Remus cringed a bit, but Sheila only began to laugh. And then she did something Remus would not have expected in a million years following a prank—she reached out and hugged both of them.

“I’m going to miss you boys dearly,” she said. “Perhaps this isn’t the proper moment, but I am so proud of you.”

Remus spared a glance at Sirius over his godmother’s shoulder, and the look Sirius gave him was almost weepy. He smiled, shyly, and they both hugged her back.

“Now off with you,” Sheila ordered, sniffling slightly as she released them. “Enjoy your last day.”

Remus peeked back into the church. “But I thought you wanted us to clean—”

She flapped her hands at him. “Go before I give you a real detention!”

“You heard the lady, Moons,” Sirius declared, taking his arm and dragging him backward. They kept going, until Sirius came to another stop and whirled around. He was holding Remus’ hand now, and Sheila didn’t even blink.

“Hey, Sheils! Seeing as you and Moony are practically related now, will we be seeing you around the holidays?”

Remus pinched him—embarrassed—but Sheila only smiled.

“Goodbye, Sirius Black," she said. "I cannot wait to see all the things you will accomplish."

They turned from her then, waving their goodbyes, and as they cut across the church's back garden, Remus kept hold of Sirius' hand and gave it a little squeeze.

Me neither.

* * *

Remus did not remember paying much attention to the sky as a kid. He’d always been able to see the stars from the estate, and though their twinklings got harder to see the further he went into the city, he never once missed them.

But he would miss these stars.

They floated by like a blue river, juxtaposed to the daunting black background that made up the rest of space. It made Remus feel small, but in a good way. The night that fell over Hawkings was so vast; there was no horizon, not really, there was only sky and that place where sky gave way to treetop and blissful rolling hill. In an effort to keep things as obviously secret as possible, they’d turned off the stadium lights all save one and left the night sky alight with all its many constellations. He could’ve counted forever and still not named them all; but if the stars were to count back, then they would’ve found several hundred students, all mulling around each other on soft green turf and living out what would be their final days of youth.

“Here, Remus, in case you get cold.”

Lily knelt down next to him on the grass and draped a crochet blanket over his middle. It was June, so of course it wasn’t cold, but Lily would always be Lily.

“Do you reckon you and James will get married someday?” He asked.

She cocked her head, then gave him a funny look that was probably well deserved.

“Maybe. Why?"

"Just wondering."

"Oh, Remus." She scooted closer, until she was lying by his side. She took his arm as well, and let her head rest against his shoulder. "Don't worry. I'm pretty sure everyone's feeling a bit contemplative tonight."

"Suppose lying under the stars will do that to you."

She giggled, then; "Oh, look! Leprechaun cloud."

The party grew more rambunctious as more and more kids began to trickle down from the dorms, toting blankets and belongings and otherwise acting very excited. Some groups had chosen to set up camp on the football stands, but most took to the field and ended up scattered, waving their torches through the air like hundreds of little fireflies.

After lying with him for a while, Lily had gotten up to rejoin her circle of girlfriends, who were all sitting together and passing a thermos of sherry between themselves. Moira had joined them as well, and beyond that, James, Sirius, and Peter were kicking a football around with several other lads in their year. Remus was mostly content to watch. The pitch was full of friend groups just like theirs, with not a teacher in sight; girls huddled together to swap secrets, boys winning and losing to each other in dare games and arm-wrestling. He caught glimpses of kids attempting handstands or else dancing around with jump ropes and hula hoops, others with midnight picnics spread about the grass. There was a girl knitting, a boy with his French horn, kids blowing smoke rings, passing bottles, making daisy chains, stargazing. He saw a pair of bicycles, a tent, a girl lovingly reading her copy of Jane Eyre aloud, several mattresses, and a… a goat?

Okay, that one was unexpected.

Remus turned over onto his stomach, squinting dubiously, but the goat was real—standing several feet away and quietly munching on the grass, entirely minding its own business.

“Wonder where that handsome devil came from,” Sirius said, grinning at the look on Remus’ face as he slid in next to him.

“Could you have had anything to do with it?” Remus mused.

“Me? Nah.”

“Right."

“I’m serious! ... Heh. Pretty sure some of the tenth years busted him out for the night. Feels good—knowing that we’re leaving a legacy behind.”

“Because the time capsule wasn't enough.”

Sirius’ face split with a grin. “Speaking of that..." He began rooting around the pockets of his jacket, pulling out a lighter, his cigarettes, Mary’s eyeliner pen which he definitely had no intention of returning. Suddenly suspicious, Remus sat up on the grass.

“Is this another prank? I'm not saving you from Sheila this time.”

"I'll have you know that Sheila's love for me 'saved me from Sheila'," Sirius scoffed. "But here, since you asked…”

With a mischievous look, Sirius plunged his hand into his back pocket and pulled out a tape. Instantly Remus was appalled.

"You git, is this our demo?"

"No," Sirius replied staunchly; “That I left for whoever we are in twenty years. It's too shitty to listen to now, so if you're done accosting me, take a better look."

He handed him the tape, and Remus turned it over in his hands. Across the front was a label, bearing the words; Marauders and Co., 1978.

"It’s the tape we made with the girls," Sirius said softly. "You know, the one with all our favourite songs."

"You mean you didn't bury it?"

"Oh, I buried it, alright. After I had one of the lads in the AV club make us a copy. Even got him to mix up the order for a bit of fun. Now it's one big surprise..."

Remus scoffed. "You sneaky bastard. You told the rest of us we weren't allowed to listen to it."

"So? Maybe that makes me a liar, but aren't we all liars in love?"

Remus clutched the tape tightly, and then held it to his heart. “What songs did everyone choose?”

“Dunno, I haven't listened to it yet. But if you're that curious, we could always play it now.”

Looking sly again, Sirius jutted his head toward the stands on the far side of the field, and to the press box containing the controls to the stadium’s entire speaker system.

“No…" Remus started; "No, you’re mental. With everyone else here?"

"They seemed to like it well enough last time," Sirius sneered. Then he sighed wistfully, taking the tape back and holding it up to admire. "Though, I suppose we could always just throw it in the bin... Wait twenty years to listen to it, until we've all forgotten what our favourite songs even were... Your choice, really. But if it was me? Well, I always tend to think that nights like these are better with a bit of music.”

“You dick.”

They smirked at each other for a while, and Sirius pointed toward the press box again.

"Come on, Moony. I already checked, the door ain't even locked..."

Before Remus could give in, James' voice called out;

“Oi, Sirius! Lupin! Come over here.”

Exchanging a glance, Sirius tucked the tape back into his trouser pocket and together they meandered over to their friends. Just as they reached them, Marlene threw herself over James, taking him down to the grass in a single solid heap.

"Give-them-to-me!" She shouted, furiously scrambling for whatever James was holding in his hand. Unfortunately for her, Sirius didn't miss a beat. He swept toward James, who naturally opened his palm and let him take it. Lottie and Mary whooped, laughing while Sirius took a graceful bow and Marlene raised her fist at him.

"Black, you give those back," she said, still pinning James face-down in the grass with her other hand.

"But what are they?" Sirius pondered, holding up what appeared to be a cardboard box no bigger than a matchbook.

"They're—ugh—smelling salts," James grunted. "McKinnon lifted them from the medical tent during the tournament.”

"I did not!" With a huff, Marlene gave up trying to bury James' head in the dirt and got to her feet to dust herself off. "I was helping clean up the first-aid tent after the game and they fell out of the kits. I picked them up for safe-keeping and just forgot to give them back, that's all."

"Likely story," heckled Mary.

"And just why would I steal smelling salts?"

"For the rush," Sirius grinned, opening the tiny box and taking out one of the glass capsules.

"Don't," Marlene warned. "They're not toys."

"Sure, strictly speaking."

"They smell awful."

"Only for a second." Satisfied, Sirius tossed a second vial at James, who grinned as he caught it out of the air. Lily gaped at him, whipping her torch around.

"You aren't actually going to sniff that, are you?"

"Why not? I've always wanted to try it," James said. "Hooch once had to use it on one of the lads after he ran head-first into the goal-post. He was a beast after—said it was the best rush he'd ever had."

Lily threw her hands up hopelessly, while Mary and Lottie began to chant; "Do it! Do it! Do it!"

"There's one more vial," Sirius declared, holding it out on offer. "Moons?"

"I'm good, thanks," Remus said, pulling out a cigarette.

"Wormy?"

“Nah, I choose life,” Peter scoffed, slumped down on the grass next to Moira.

Mary and Lottie's chant carried, and suddenly other voices from nearby groups had joined in; "DO IT! DO IT! DO IT!"

"They don't even know what they're cheering for," Marlene huffed, as James and Sirius sniggered wickedly.

“So how do we do this?” Sirius asked. "Break it with your teeth?"

“Do not put that in your mouth!” Lily screeched. “Honestly, you’re both such idiots—hasn’t anyone told you that you don’t have to attempt every stupid idea that comes into your thick heads?”

“But then how would we ever have evolution, Daisy?” James laughed. “You’re supposed to hold it under your nose and break it with your fingers. Like this.”

Following James’ lead, Sirius held the little tube beneath his nose and tried pinching it. “Bugger. Can’t get it.”

“Yeah, tough thing,” James agreed. “Oh hold on, I think you’re supposed to crush this part right—EUGH!”

It was as though James’ entire body had turned to jelly. He wobbled for a second, his eyes rolling backward as he flopped down to his knees on the grass. He wasn’t exactly choking, but the noises he made were like listening to a dead fish as it flopped on the shore of a lake.

“Siri—neugh—Sirrr-us, don’t do it—”

James began coughing horribly while other kids crowded around, laughing and cheering for him. This, of course, only fed Sirius' desire to do it himself.

“Don't be such a pansy, Potter,” he laughed, still trying to break the vial beneath his nostrils. "It can't really be that bad—EOH GAUD!”

The gagging came next, and suddenly Sirius had fallen back on his arse like a dead weight. As he fell into James, both of them flopping back and forth miserably, Lily and Marlene jumped up and gave them a chorusing round of "I told you so's".

"O-Oh my god," James warbled, “I think I just smelled in triple-dee."

“It’s 3D, you moron,” Peter said, finally succeeding in making all of the girls laugh.

Then Davey Gudgeon appeared behind Remus and crowed straight into his ear-drum; "Gee, what's wrong with them?"

Annoyed, Remus shrugged and handed Davey the remaining vial of smelling salts as he took a pull on his cigarette. A few moments later, there was a little snap and Davey had joined James and Sirius on the ground.

"I think that counts as poisoning, Remington."

He turned around. "You gonna rat on me, MacDuff?"

"Not today." Smirking, Trish stole his half-smoked cigarette and began rooting through her own pocket. "Got something for you."

"Right. My 'gift'."

"Just a wee one." She winked, then gestured for him to hold out his palm. Into it, she dropped a small stone with a hole in its middle.

"Your hag stone," he said in awe.

" 'Gloine nan druidh'," Trish corrected. "To keep away yer nightmares. And fur a bit o' extra luck."

Remus closed his hand around the stone, still warm from her pocket. "Thanks, Trish."

"I'm gonna miss you, ye bloody giant. Send me a ticket tae one o' yer shows, promise I'll bring a better present."

"Deal."

He was half sure she was going to punch him again, that was until Barty Crouch had called her name.

"Fucking hell, MacDuff! You bloody coming or not? Just 'cause you're it, don't mean you can skive off!"

"Ach, yer maw!" Trish hollered back. "Get your knickers out o' a twist, lollyhead, I'll just be a second."

The insult made Barty scoff, and he turned around to his friends, Regulus and Yaxley, arms waving at her as if he meant to say 'you see?'

"Don't mind them," Trish said to Remus. "They wantae play tiggy in the trees. Wouldn't happen tae have a spare torch, would ya?"

He gave her his, and she slapped him hard—but fondly—on the chest.

"See ya around, Loonarny! And you—best run, ya fucking bawbags!"

She set off after them, giving another war-cry loud enough to spook Barty and the others back into the trees. It was dark, and Remus couldn't be entirely sure, but he hoped that the look he saw on Regulus' face was a smile.

Tapping out another cigarette, Remus went to collect his blanket and shuffled back over to Lily, who was sitting at the end of the girls' row.

"Where's Sirius?" He asked.

“Guess."

Turns out he didn't have to. The music came first, shooting out the vast speaker system and filling the entire stadium with a sharp reverb. The song was not forgiving—a blast of noise that made everyone jump. There were no firecrackers this time, no live band bursting forth from beneath the legs of a seven foot-tall Jesus statue, and yet that didn't stop the kids from cheering. It was a Blondie song, which Remus only knew when he watched Marlene leap to her feet.

"He didn't!" She screeched. "He wouldn't!"

But then he did.

Up above, Sirius and James burst out of the press box and started rushing back down the stands again while the speakers played "X Offender" at full volume. Kids, who no doubt, had been waiting for this very moment, began to point and whoop for them. The pair made it to the ground at a tie and rushed back to their friends, Sirius falling down before Remus and half-tackling him round the middle.

“Whaddya think, Moons?!”

"I think..."

'I know you wouldn't go—
You'd watch my heart burst,
Then you'd step in!'

"... I think you're amazing."

Sirius beamed at him, and was very suddenly accosted by Marlene. "You!" She cried, happily. "You stole this album from me."

"Think again, McKinnon!"

She wheeled back, turning to the other girls as realisation dawned on her face. Lily and the others still hadn't seemed to catch on, but James was grinning like the cat who caught the cream. All around, kids were dancing—having fun! And when the song changed and became a heavy blue-rock, James thrust a finger at Remus.

"Yours!" He cried. "This one's yours, right?"

"Not mine!" Remus laughed.

'Well, come on! Come on! Come on! Come on!'

Lottie screamed. Actually screamed.

"It's the tape!" She hollered. "It's my song!"

Sirius clapped his hands together. Janis Joplin was singing to them, and the girls were in disbelief.

'—But what I'm gonna show you, baby, that a woman can be tough!
I want you to come on! Come on! Come on! Come on and TAKE IT!
Take another little piece of my heart now, baby!'

Sirius looked up at Remus.

"Moons, I'm so happy."

Oh… how badly Remus wanted to kiss him just then.

It really was their tape. Disjointed, moody, eclectic, and as odd a mix as they were. Take eight different people, with eight different personalities, and one was bound to get something interesting. First it was Marlene, then Janis Joplin for Lottie—and then a Who song started and everyone once again pointed fingers at Remus.

"I-It's not mine!" He bleated, almost embarrassed.

"It's mine!" Peter declared, standing up proudly. "You guys think Moony's the only one with good taste?"

It was flooring. James leapt up to pat Peter on the back, and together he and Sirius strummed air instruments while Moira and the girls did their best to sing along. Remus might've joined in—he should've, really—but it was harder when he realised which song Peter had chosen.

Won't Get Fooled Again...

Remus shrugged it off. It was merely a good song, surely Peter didn't mean anything by it...

'Pick up my guitar and play,
Just like yesterday!
Then I'll get on my knees and pray...
We don't get fooled again!'

Mary's song came just as quickly after that anyway. And as expected, it was ABBA—though not just any ABBA... As the song began to play, Remus recalled an old memory;

Send off your grandma with 'Hasta Mañana' and I guarantee there won't be a dry eye in the room.

There was truly an ABBA song for everything.

'Hasta mañana, say we'll meet again,
I can't do without you...
Time to forget, send me a letter—
Say you forgive, the sooner the better!
Hasta mañana, baby!
Hasta mañana, until then...'

"You bitch," Marlene moaned, wiping her face furiously as tears leaked from the corners of her eyes. Mary hugged her, and they rocked gently along with the song until its very end.

"Who's song is next?" Lily asked, poking Sirius anxiously. He shrugged, then glanced up at Remus, who was sitting with his arms around Sirius' waist.

"Dunno. Got the lad who helped me tape it over to mix up all the songs. Why, what'd you pick, Evans?"

Lily covered her mouth, a blush rising in her cheeks. "I didn't think everyone would hear it."

Sirius launched upright, nearly bashing Remus in the chin.

"Now I'm intrigued!"

He needn't be; as it turned out, James and Lily were next.

An old married couple before their time, the two of them had unknowingly dedicated their own choices to each other in one final show of serendipity. Without ever being sure she'd hear it, James had picked a Mamas and Papas' song, just because he knew how much Lily loved them. And then after, it turned out that Lily had gone with a Kinks' song, James' own favourite.

Everyone began to laugh when they'd realised what had happened, but then James invited his girlfriend to dance and it didn't even matter. It was still dark, but Remus was pretty sure he'd watched James whisper the song lyrics into Lily's ear as they swayed.

'As long as I gaze on,
Waterloo sunset,
I am in paradise…'

"Hope those two are still together in twenty years," Sirius mused, watching them whisper sickeningly sweet nothings into each other's ear. "Otherwise it's going to make playing this tape again miiiiiighty awkward."

Remus squeezed him tight. "I'm sure they will be."

As the Kinks song faded, Sirius turned over in Remus' lap to peer up at him.

"I have a confession. I asked Georgie to put my song last."

Remus raised a brow. "You're saying George actually agreed to help you?"

"Well, this was before we lost him his job as football commentator, of course."

"Oh, 'course."

"You know what this means though, right?" Sirius cooed. "You're up next, Moons."

He was—he is—and Remus couldn't have been happier. Because when that song started, all the stars above couldn't have rivalled the ones in Sirius' eyes.

I...

I will be king...

And you...

You will be queen...

Though nothing will drive them away...

We can beat them, just for one day...

We can be heroes, just for one day.

His friends grinned. His friends cried out. His friends were there.

And Sirius was his.

"I knew it," Sirius gasped, pushing away from Remus and standing on shaky legs. "I FUCKING KNEW IT! You like Bowie, you son of a bitch!"

"Maybe I just like you!" Remus called back.

' 'Cause we're lovers, and that is a fact,
Yes we're lovers, and that is that...'

Sirius ran a hand through his dark hair. He covered his mouth to hide that breathless-Sirius smile. It didn't work. But then he looked at James—at all their friends and the kids who sat amongst them—and promptly turned and began walking away. Remus stared after him, bewildered. Surely he hadn't made a mistake?

Sirius stopped and spun around again.

"Well...? Aren't you coming?"

Oh.

Oh yes, please.

Marlene reached out and kissed his hand as he stood, and just like that, Remus Lupin was running.

Sirius made him work for it too. They tore across the field, toward the base of the stands, where he watched as Sirius dove beneath and disappeared out of sight. Remus followed, naturally, and felt the power of Bowie's song as it made the beams and bolts tremble with sound.

'I, I can remember—'

Hands grabbed him, his back met metal and he felt his touch in the dark.

'Standing, by the wall!'

"Got you."

'And the guns shot above our heads!'

"You already have me."

'And we kissed—'

"I love you," Remus said, against his mouth, his lips, his tongue.

'As though nothing could fall...'

Sirius said it back.

We can be Heroes.

We can be Heroes.

We can be Heroes.

Just for one day.

Maybe to some, kissing alone in the dark where no one could see would be a shame. But the fact was that he could never be ashamed of loving Sirius Black. Loving him was as easy as breathing.

"Moons."

Remus kissed him.

"Moony."

He kissed him again.

"Moony... Moony, the song's over."

Remus raised his head. The song was over, and Sirius' had taken its place.

'Mamaaa, just killed a man,
Put a gun against his head;
Pulled my trigger, now he's dead...'

Still breathless, Remus blinked at him in the dark.

"You fucking loser."

Sirius burst out laughing.

"How could I not?"

How, indeed.

They returned to their friends eventually, weaving across the field and watching the other kids. It was shocking; they knew it! They all knew the song! Arms wrapped around others, heads turned to the sky, they screamed it!

" I'm just a poor boy nobody loves me—

"HE'S JUST A POOR BOY FROM A POOR FAMILY!

"SPARE HIM HIS LIFE FROM THIS MONSTROSITY!"

Remus had never wished so badly for a video camera. They had made it back to their friends, where the girls were belting back and forth to one another. And as the song rose and rose and rose, Remus watched as Marlene set a football down in front of James.

Oh mama mia, mama mia—

Mama mia, LET ME GO!

Beelzebub has a devil put aside for me...

For me...

FOR MEEEEEEEEE—!

James kicked, and the ball slammed against the nearest stadium light with a burst of sparks.

It was mayhem.

It was magic.

It was rock and roll.

James fell into Peter and Peter fell into James and the whole crowd was singing with them. This was what they wanted, Remus knew, to affect so many people the same way they were affected. To cast a spell and see it come to life.

And afterwards, when the tempo slowed and the song soothed, they all made their own wish. For Remus, it was to stay this way forever.

* * *

They played the tape twice more that night, and each time they enjoyed it more. Kids danced, kids sang, kids lost their minds.

And they made their memories.

Later, when the songs had ended and the world fell still again, Remus turned to Sirius beneath the stars and took his hand. Distantly he could hear the sounds of James and Lily as they muttered lovely things to one another. Mary was humming, Marlene was grumbling at her humming, Lottie kept asking if they could hear the crickets, and dear Peter was singing 'mama mia' in his sleep.

"Are you alright?" Sirius whispered, gazing at him in the dark. "You look... nervous."

Remus shook his head. "I'm happy."

"You're sure?"

"Yes." But; "Everything's ending now, isn't it? It's all going away... Or, we're going away."

"To London."

"Yes. To London." But; "I'm as old as Tomny was when I left and now it's all over. You know, I used to think that was all I wanted, but now it's here and I'm already forgetting things. Maybe I'm not ready for it all to end."

Sirius leaned up on one arm, his black hair falling down over his face like a curtain.

"What are you talking about, Moony? This isn't the end."

"Then what is it?"

"It's the beginning."

Oh...

Well, I suppose you're right.

“I have one more surprise," Sirius said.

“Is it a good surprise?”

He reached up and softly pushed a curl from Remus' forehead. “I think so.”

“And what is your good surprise then?”

“I found it. I found our flat.”

“You did?”

“Mhm. Three bedrooms, in Shepherd's Bush. I already rang the old lady that listed the advert. It’s ours, nearly. Just gotta sign the papers.”

“It sounds perfect.”

“Too good to be true, actually." Sirius laughed. "Probably be completely manky inside."

"Probably."

"Still... Do you want to go with me?”

“Yes," Remus said, drawing Sirius toward him and kissing his soft lips. "Anywhere with you.”

Any way the wind blows...

Overhead, the stars watched and wished they were them.

Chapter End Notes

Songs featured in this chapter (a lot): "Ballroom Blitz" by Sweet (1973), "X Offender" by Blondie (1976), "Piece of My Heart" by Janis Joplin (1969), "Won't Get Fooled Again" by the Who (1971),

"Hasta Mañana" by ABBA (1974), "Waterloo Sunset" by the Kinks (1967), "Heroes" by David Bowie (1977), & finally, "Bohemian Rhapsody" by Queen (1975).

Author's Note:
This has been an incredible journey so far! I don't think I had any idea when I started writing this fic almost two years ago that it would balloon to something of this magnitude. Some of you have quite literally grown up alongside these characters, and I think that it's so amazing that I, in turn, got to share in a small part of each of your lives. Thank you for growing with me, thank you for learning with me, and thank you for loving these characters as much as I have. I can't say what's in store for them just yet, but trust that it'll be every bit as loving and thrilling as their time at school was. Those days might be behind us now, but there's so much more to come.

For those who are still unaware, the future of the fic is as follows:
There will be two (2) parts = Part 1 (Cadence) that covers September 1975 - Spring 1979 and Part 2 (Untitled), which will cover Summer 1979 - Winter 1999 + an epilogue.
We still have nine more chapters of Part 1 to go, and that will cover the band's 'gap year' and initial starter-dom. After the completion of part 1, I plan to go on a longer hiatus to begin writing part 2, but I will have more on that as we get nearer to the end of this fic.

Can't wait to start on the rest of this journey with all of you, xoxo
- mot

Chapter 97: #43 Knoxbridge Lane

Chapter Summary

You're a starfucker, starfucker, starfucker, starfucker, star!

Chapter Notes

TW: Brief mention of suicide by hanging—in reference to war-induced PTSD.

Oh my god, mot actually posted a chapter early???? must be witchcraft. (or a terrible fucking sleep schedule, you decide)

Anyway, it's the start of a new era! Our gap year!! Pause for dramatic effect 👀

I have no promises for gap year, it's pure chaos. It started out as a much smaller thing, then naturally grew in chaos (and size asfjk) the deeper in I got. In fact, I'm barely finished, so if there's some inaccuracies, I hope to be able to catch them later.

You can find the playlist for this gap year HERE!

For now, on with the show!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

This will be an everlasting love,
This will be the one I've waited for;
This will be the first time anyone has loved me,

I'm so glad you found me in time,
And I'm so glad that you've rectified my mind;
This will be an everlasting love for me…

- "This Will Be" Natalie Cole, 1975

They moved in at the beginning of July. It was a two story London maisonette in the middle of Shepherd's Bush that overlooked a busy street filled with shops and greengrocers. It would've been too small if it weren't for the attic that'd been converted into a small bedroom and toilet. That space would become their sanctuary; their little piece of the pie.

Their very first home.

It was the corner flat—Remus smacked Sirius the first time he called it a 'townhouse'—leaving them with just a single set of neighbours to their left, which suited them just fine, what with all the noise they were bound to make. There had been no asking price listed on the advert Sirius had shown him and so Remus had been sceptical, but it was a decent area, and as wonderful as the Potters had been to them, there was only so long he could stand free-loading before he ended up renting some seedy guest house in South London.

"You're lucky you caught my ad when you did," said the landlady, as she showed them around the ground floor. "I was going to divvy it up into separate flats, but I bloody hate dealing with contractors."

"We'll need the space anyway," replied Sirius, as he ran his fingers along the faded wallpaper in the front entryway. The landlady meandered after them keenly. She appeared glamorous, with long, painted eyelashes and a waist nearly the same size as her neck. The advert had been listed to a "Margaret" but when they'd arrived she'd introduced herself as “Peggy”. She seemed very pleased indeed when Sirius reached out to kiss her hand—even more so when he'd flashed that dishy grin at her. Remus thought the act a bit superfluous, but anything to get a roof over their heads.

“My third husband, Paul, tried to have the entire thing gutted last year,” Peggy went on. “Only got as far as the floors before he croaked, but everything’s been freshly painted."

"I can see that," Remus said, picking at a half-inch nail sticking out of the kitchen doorway that'd been painted over in a rather foul shade of beige. Peggy kept close on their heels, smoking a cigarette and looking them up and down as if she were still trying to decide whether or not they were wasting her time. Perhaps she doubted their ability to pay, judging them for their age and choice of dress like any wary forty-something with an unresolved bone to pick with the world.

"I’m looking to get at least one-forty for it," she said, pointedly.

"That's kind of steep."

"Market's facing a rent shortage, you know."

"Yeah, has been since 1965."

Sirius elbowed him. The flat was perfect, enough space for all of them and their instruments and wasn't even completely manky. Best to not bottle it.

“So you’re firm on the price?” Remus asked, testing the waters.

“Price’s firm.”

He glanced around, wondering what their odds were of being scammed. Not that he knew anything about buying a home. The walls were high—much higher than the ones back at Tomny's place. There were no water marks on the ceiling either, and all the lights worked.

“Does it get cold in the winter?”

“Oh, no. It’s all central heating ‘round here nowadays,” Peggy said. “Fridge’s been replaced too. I’m willing to let out to students but I’ll need at least three months rent upfront. Plus a deposit for anything you might break.”

"And how much is that?"

She eyed Sirius' heavy boots. "Ninety pounds."

"That's more than half a month's rent!"

"It's a proper sought-after area, you know."

Turning back from the main windows, Sirius gave her a winning smile. "Don't worry, Peggy, I'd say ninety's more than fair."

It must've surprised her, as she nodded dubiously and pulled the blue-wrapped Vogue cigarette from her lips. As Sirius flounced toward the open kitchen, Remus replaced him by the front windows and peered outside. Down below, the main thoroughfare dragged by, noisy and alight with life. It was only a three minute walk to get to the Central Line, and they’d passed a corner shop and two separate newsstands on their way over. There was a grocer’s across the street too, as well as an off-licence and a post office. Everything they needed, right within reach.

As Remus was busy watching an old woman hobble up the street with a yappy Yorkshire Terrier on a lead ahead of her, Peggy came up behind him with two fingers still primly poised around her cigarette.

"He mentioned you were looking for space," she pondered, blowing smoke from her cherry-red lips. "Space for what?"

So she was suspicious then. Or rather, she hadn't stopped being so.

"There's five of us actually. We're looking for somewhere to rent together."

"All of you men?"

"Four guys, plus our friend Lily."

"Lucky girl." She took another drag, and Remus couldn't decide if she were being sarcastic. “What’d you say you kids did again?”

Now she was veering dangerously close to the truth. When they'd returned from school, Monty had warned them how tough it would be to find somewhere in the city with enough space for five plus a rock band, but at least they all had one thing going for them now.

Real jobs.

“Sirius works the evening shift at a pub,” Remus answered truthfully, “and I’ve got managed a gig over on Denmark Street. Our friend Pete works for his dad, and the other—James, he's got a job lined up as a server. We’re not bums.”

“Or students, apparently?”

“Uh, sort of… Took a gap year.”

“He’s just being metaphorical, Peg!” The cry came from Sirius as he threw himself back down the staircase and rounded into the living room. He had his hands on his hips as he proudly announced; "We happen to have our own band."

Remus was instantly horrified. Peggy's eyes had gone narrow with sudden suspicion, and he imagined her next move would be to put them out on the pavement like the guilty dogs they were. He’d begged Sirius not to bring up the band, especially not after every other place they'd looked at had fallen through the moment the landlords heard of their less-than-reputable career intentions. No one liked a noisy neighbour, and four boys with guitars and amplifiers didn’t exactly scream ‘trustworthy tenants’.

Still, Sirius was stubborn. He took a stance of complete transparency—screw any crotchety old fools! If they were going to complain anyway, might as well get it out of the way early. Remus just wished he'd stick a sock in it until they'd signed the bloody lease.

"We won't be a bother," he reassured the landlady. "We're looking for another space to practise, even. Like a—a garage! This'd just be somewhere to lay our heads at night."

"My second husband was in a band," Peggy said sourly. "Useless bastard. Never brought in a penny. Then he up and died of a heart attack at thirty-seven."

Sirius gave her a smug smile. "Well, we're only eighteen."

Would his suffering end if he simply threw himself out the window, Remus wondered? Luckily for him there was no need. A hint of a smile traced the corner of her mouth, and Peggy hid it with another deep draw of her cigarette.

"You any good then, boy?" She asked Sirius.

"Better than good. We're the best."

"Play anywhere I'd know?"

"Not yet."

"Then how could you possibly know that you're the best?"

"Because we're mental," Sirius smirked. "And mental makes art."

"We're good tenants!" Remus yelped, rounding Peggy to get between her and his menace of a boyfriend. "Won't give you any trouble… I swear it."

Peggy exhaled, the tart aroma of her cigarette drifting across the room toward them. The purse in her lips told Remus that she wasn't entirely convinced, but that she was at least willing to play along.

"I happen to own the place next door as well," she told them. "For the most part, I'm a bit of a night owl. I don't mind staying up as long as my mornings are quiet. I like going out, but I love a nice lie-in twice as much. And you're cute, all things considered."

The two of them shared a hesitant glance while Peggy took another drag, burning the cig down to its filter.

"There's a basement beneath this one," she said, tapping her heel on the wood floors. “It’s unfinished, but it’s got cement walls, so I reckon it'd be quiet enough. I’d be taking a risk renting to you, but if you can come up with the full three months beforehand, and you're willing to double that tenancy deposit, then I might just be tempted to give you a go.”

Sirius’ eyes widened. “No shit—for real?”

“Mm.” The landlady pulled out a silver cigarette tin, tapping her ash into the corner and sticking the leftover stub inside. “The world needs more artists, Mr. Black. And I say, let ‘em come.”

“Holy—cheers, Peg!”

Remus smacked him for being overly familiar, but Peggy was already pointing at them like a threat.

“I’m still firm on the rent though. You miss one month and that's it—you’re out on your rear.”

“You don’t gotta worry about that,” Sirius swore, “we’re all in. Even got the cash now if you really want.”

She smiled faintly, and snapped the tin shut, returning it to the pocket of her impossibly-tight jeans.

“Then it looks like we have a deal.”

Afterwards Peggy left them to fetch the paper work, and just like that, they were newly-born renters selling their souls to capitalism. Remus did a turn about the room, imagining what it would look like lived-in. A bookshelf here, Sirius’ stereo there, Peter's artwork and a few of Lily's favourite plants…

“A whole fucking house—I can’t believe it!” Sirius called. He was in the kitchen, opening and closing every cupboard like he might find a secret world hidden inside. He’d just darted across to the fridge when he hollered; “We should celebrate!”

“Got that bottle of jack back at the Potters',” Remus said.

Sirius let the fridge fall shut, and then rushed back into the empty living room. He launched himself into Remus, who caught him, and turned his face up.

“Moons,” he whispered, only for them; “We’re home.”

Home.

Remus had never thought the word could sound so good.

That was four months ago now, but Remus could still remember their first night in the flat like it was yesterday. It'd rained, and Sirius had opened the window to listen to its gentle city thrum. They were lying on a bare mattress in the converted attic of their new flat. Peggy hadn't been lying—the bedroom was a walk-up, with only a single set of narrow stairs and a door that shrieked on its hinges every time it was opened, but they'd chosen it for the privacy. It was a small room, less than half the size of their old dorm room, with an attached toilet made up of powder blue tiles and a single grey sink. And it was all theirs.

"Shall we find ourselves some seashells to go with?" Sirius had said, very snidely. "Perhaps a fuzzy rug for a shower mat?"

"You'd like that, wouldn't you?"

They'd forwent the seashells, and the rest of the room they'd filled sparsely; a wardrobe with nicks in the varnish that they'd picked up from a car boot sale, a set of on-offer night tables, and an atrocious rug that smelled faintly of wet dog. It was rubbish, all of it, but it was theirs!

The bed was the only thing they'd sprung for. Even after all those years at school, Sirius didn't like the idea of sleeping on a mattress that had been used by someone else. Barely an hour after they'd gotten the keys, they'd gone on down to Bensons for Beds together and picked one out. They'd earned themselves a few dubious looks from the sales clerks, but Remus found he didn't care all that much. The poor sods worked on commission and wouldn't dare risk losing a sale, even if the customers were a pair of questionable-looking teenagers.

Yes, it had rained—enough to turn the air hot and sticky, but Remus had been hardly bothered. He was too busy lying next to his love, composing another song in his head. The words came together like puzzle pieces, in the slow rubato of their new home.

Of all the bad things I did,
The best of them was you;
Of all the sad things we hid,
The worst of them, we saw through,

And if I had three wishes,
I wouldn't ask for a dime;
I'd weave myself a symphony,
Begging for you, yourself, and time…

He'd thought about writing it down, but everything they owned was still boxed up by the front door, so instead he filed the words away. Even if he somehow forgot them, he'd remember them eventually. They weren't going anywhere; they were home.

"Whatchu thinkin' about, Moons?"

Remus turned his head back, to where Sirius was lying, hugging him from behind. His mouth was tame, but his eyes were smiling.

"How happy I am," he told him. "And how much I love you."

"Aw… you poof."

Now it was October, and each of them had found their own way to settle into city life. Thanks to his dad's connections, James had managed to snag a job at waiting tables at some posh hotel in Marylebone. The gig was a straight shot along the metro line and the pay was well worth it, so James couldn't have cared less that he was waiting on the same sort of people they'd been going to school with their entire lives. Often he would tack an extra half hour onto his commute if it meant he could escort Lily to her classes at the college.

Peter was doing well enough too. He'd moved into the single room just off the kitchen, while James and Lily had taken the second floor bedroom for themselves. Moira had been by to visit a few times, having settled on attending a women's university in Stratford. Without a set of classes of his own to distract him, Peter's father had insisted he come work at the publishing house. Mostly it sounded like complete drivel, but there were some perks.

"Guess who they're putting on page three of tomorrow's paper," Peter called, as he trudged across the flat's entryway that evening, ripping off his tie.

"Who?" James answered, busy fixing himself and Lily a cup of tea.

"Lovely Linda."

Peter slapped the newspaper down onto the kitchen table and they all crowded around to get a look at glamour model Linda Lusardi in her page three headshot, sans shirt.

“Dad’s trying to keep up with ‘The Sun’,” Peter said. “Says naked girls are about all people willing to pay for these days.”

“He’s right about that,” Sirius snorted. “Blimey, just get a look at those nipples. Could poke an eye out, don'tcha think, Potter?”

Next to him, James just stared on dumbly. “I dunno… She looks sorta… nice. Like she's a... nice girl.”

Sirius gave Remus a look that said ‘get a load of this sucker’ and just then Lily strode into the kitchen, arms raised as she gathered her hair into a ponytail at the top of her head.

“What're you guys looking at?” She asked, mumbling around the hair bobble between her teeth.

“Nothing!” James yelped, snatching the paper up from the table.

Not stupid enough to ignore the obvious ploy, Lily let her hair drop and ripped the elastic from her mouth as she crossed the room toward them.

“Hand it over.”

They did, only because they were all afraid of the consequences should they refuse, and Lily scoffed before unceremoniously stuffing the paper into the kitchen bin.

“Demeaning!” Was all she hissed at first. “It’s demeaning to women, and utterly priggish—sexist!—behaviour!”

“Evans, I hate to break it to you, but you live with four blokes now,” Sirius shrugged haplessly. “Bound to be a few sexy prigs mixed in. Admiring naked women is in our nature.”

Peter gave him a look. “Aren’t you gay?”

“ ‘Aren’t you gay?’” Sirius mimicked, flicking him in the forehead. “Idiot.”

As far as sexy/sexist prigs went, the four of them did pretty well with an added girl in the mix. Not that she was going to put up with being treated like a maid. It came as quite a shock when Lily found out that none of them knew how to properly clean a toilet, but by week two she'd assigned all the tasks that'd needed doing, and the rest of them made quick to comply. While Remus, James, and Peter handled the more frivolous chores such as emptying the bin and covering the weekly shop, Lily and Sirius had made up an unlikely team of their own. The kitchen became their territory, and there they argued about what suppers to make and how long they could keep a potato once it'd sprouted.

"I knew you could cook a little, but I had no idea you were actually good at it," Remus said once, when he'd come downstairs and caught Sirius making a cottage pie in the middle of the day.

"I used to spend a lot of time in the manor kitchens," he shrugged. "It was the only place Mum wouldn't bother to go looking for me, and I enjoyed hearing the cooks mouth off when she wasn't around. Guess I just picked up a few things."

"The cooking or the mouthing off?"

Sirius smirked. It nearly made Remus blush.

"I feel like I'm always learning new things about you," he said.

"Suppose that's what keeps it exciting."

Now he was surely blushing.

"Here, budge up. I wanna help."

Yes, they'd all settled in nicely. It had taken until Lily had arrived for them to spring for any real dinnerware—they'd spent the first week eating porridge from mugs and sipping cider straight from the bottle—but her influence and womanly touch had set them straight quick enough. Work and band practice came neck-and-neck as far as priorities went, but none of them felt like skiving off. The basement set-up they had going was perfect, and every day they were sounding better and better. Remus didn't even think about the estate anymore, and though Tomny was still stuck in Ipswich, he'd return eventually, once the frozen docks and cold weather had properly chased him back home.

Yes, in just a few short months, the flat at number forty-three, Knoxbridge Road had become their oasis, and every day Remus lived within its walls, he felt more and more invincible.

* * *

Saturday 21st October 1978

It was warm for October. Remus could feel the sun slightly singeing the back of his neck. He didn't mind so much; Sirius liked counting the freckles.

"You seem well," Sandra told him, while sampling her cappuccino with prime, little sips. "Healthy. Happy, too."

"I am," he answered.

"You are?"

"Yes."

She seemed to let out a breath of relief. They were sitting amongst a cafe's outdoor patio along Mayfair; not his idea, but hers. Sandra had tried insisting that he order something, but Remus had graciously declined and was instead lounging casually in the patio chair, legs crossed at the ankles. He had a shift soon anyway, and had only agreed to meet on the condition that she did not "mother". Sandra seemed to find this agreeable enough, and so far had managed to avoid all mention of Lyall, interjecting with only the occasional tidbit about Giles or the dogs.

"You're not at the Potters' anymore," she recounted, "where is it you're living now?"

"Shepherd's Bush. Been there since July."

"That's a nice area. And you're living with friends, are you?"

"Mhm, yeah. We split the rent, but Sirius has his uncle's inheritance so he covered most of the costs up front."

"You mean it's just the two of you?"

He shook his head, not really interested in sharing many details, and she began tracing the edge of her teacup. Feeling awkward, Remus checked his watch. He was due at the shop in a half-hour. It was still enough time to make it even if he walked, but before he could make an excuse and slink away, Sandra jumped back in.

“Get this—a new litter of pups were born last week! Zenyatta’s third. Such a lovely girl, she did so well.”

“That’s good. Suspect dad’ll be retiring her soon then. Sent out to pasture and all that.”

He meant it lightly, but the words made Sandra’s smile vanish, and Remus instantly wished he could take them back.

“I was only joking. If there’s anyone he does right by, it’s his dogs, innit.”

“Your father still worries about you as well, Remus,” Sandra said, after a long pause. “He worries about whether you’re taking proper care of yourself.”

“Dunno why he’d bother, s’not like he’s ever worried before.”

“You know that’s not true.”

Remus said nothing, for once not interested in the usual argument. Sandra leaned forward in her chair. He knew straight away what she wanted; it was the only reason she'd asked to meet him in the first place. To pry.

“I think you should visit. Have a little chat with him, that’s all. No arguing, no judgement, and I promise neither of us will mention school either. Just tea. Would you consider coming home for tea?”

It's not my home. The thought was bitter with pride, and so rather than answer, Remus looked off to his left where a young mum was sitting, sipping her coffee and reading a book. She had a pram next to her, and whenever the baby began to fuss, she’d simply reach out and rock and carriage a bit. She didn’t even glance at the kid, but the act itself was care enough.

“Sandy, do you know who Keith Moon is?”

She perked up, as though she thought he might finally impose some sort of willingness to make peace with Lyall.

“I’m afraid not. Is he a friend of yours?”

Remus smiled to himself. “He was one of the best drummers in the world. And he died last month.”

“Oh, well that’s too bad.”

“My mother would’ve known who he was—is. She didn’t know much, but she would’a known that.”

Sandra set her teacup down, and Remus felt the clink of its glass like a stern reprimand.

“Remus, this isn't about you and me,” she began. “You’re going off on your own now, and that is so dearly exciting, but we still worry. We worry if you’re eating enough—sleeping enough. You’re only eighteen, that’s still very young to be taking on the entire world on your own.”

“I'm not on my own. I’ve got my friends. We take care of each other—always have. Now is there anything else I'm forgetting? Something left to worry about? Because if not, I have somewhere to be.”

“You’re right, I’m sorry,” Sandra nodded; “I don’t mean to chase you off. I know I promised not to bother you with fretting... But I have something for you actually. Thought you might want it, now that you’re moved out on your own.”

She reached for her bag and withdrew a small parcel swathed in tissue paper.

“Your father had it framed,” she said as she passed it over. “He wanted you to have it.”

Remus stared at the gift, suddenly nervous. He thought he should decline, but she pressed it into his hands anyway. When he unwrapped it, he found the smiling image of his mum staring back at him. She was younger, sitting on the floor of the estate’s parlour and bouncing a baby Remus on her knee. She seemed bigger than he remembered—not small like a teenager, nor frail from age and sickness—instead fuller in the cheeks and hips. There was no colour to the image, but even in black and white, she looked warm. A whole woman.

Remus covered the photo with the tissue paper, and then tucked it into the large outer pocket of his coat.

“That’s nice,” he murmured. “Thanks.”

“I thought it was such a darling photo. You and Hope.”

Remus nodded stiffly, before reaching into his inside pocket and pulling out his wallet. He left a tenner on the table, more than enough for Sandra’s cappuccino, and stood.

“Oh, now what are you doing that for?” Sandra tutted immediately, trying to hand him back the note.

“It’s fine. Tea’s on me today.”

“But you didn’t even order anything!”

“Can’t I buy my step-mother a drink every now and then?”

She softened at that—step-mother, Remus had never said it in front of her before—and he took the opportunity to tuck away his wallet and stand up from the table.

“Better scat now. Don’t want to be late for work.”

Sandra quickly perked up in her chair. “You’ve gotten a job then? That’s fantastic! Where at?”

Remus stepped past the table, buttoning up his coat. He suddenly felt more playful.

“Job—what job? Didn't you know, Sandy, I’m only a good-for-nothing musician.”

It boggled her for a moment, then he heard her laugh, hopelessly, and that was the last Remus saw of her for a good, long while.

As he walked, he counted the hours in his head. One eight-hour shift at the music shop, and then two hours until they’d be on stage. Not a literal stage—more like a slight raised platform corner of the pub Sirius had gotten a job in. They’d all been lucky to get something, what with the way English businesses were shutting down left and right and centre. It felt as though if a factory weren’t closing, then its workers were going on strike, lobbying for more pay and better working conditions. The autoplant Ted had worked in since he was seventeen had just shut its doors, leaving him and three hundred other men without a job to feed their families. When he’d heard, Sirius had gone over to Islington to visit, but according to him neither Ted nor Andy had been all that worried. There will be more jobs, she’d told Sirius, and more chances to be sacked from those too!

They’d only ever met once, but Remus admired Andy and Ted. Young parents, just trying to make their own way and love each other. It was more than he could say for most people.

As he walked, the city moved about him, full of life and also its usual misery. He passed a man sleeping in a doorway, with a sign by his feet saying "will work for meals". His coat was ragged, having seen too many winters, and his boots clung to the bottom of his feet like cardboard. Silently, Remus rooted around in his pocket for the bit of spare change there, and left the coins in the tin can set out by the man's feet before carrying on. Around him the air smelt like the sea, but also not—a salty scent more akin to the brackish water of the Thames. There was a woman sitting on a bench, letting her terrier lick from a takeout box while she flipped through the paper. A cop was barking at a pair of kids who flew past him on their bicycles, pulling faces and shouting things like "fascist pig" and "tory tart". Every time he got close they'd speed off, before circling back around like baby-faced piranhas. They probably didn't have a clue what it was they were saying, it was mere words on a loop. It felt like summertime.

The shop where Remus worked was on Denmark Street, otherwise known as Britain's very own "Tin Pan Alley". Less than a decade before, music-makers and lovers alike used to flock to the street in search of the next best thing. They crowded into the various shops, buying and peddling their trade. The windows remained adorned in everything from records to mandolins, to costly electric guitars and dingy old fuzz boxes. But that was only half the fun.

Up above, overlooking the pavement like gods themselves, there were various flats where music publishers and studio-owners had once run the promised land from right behind their own office desks. All day they flapped their coattails and entertained the best in the business; Stones, Hendrix, Kinks, Sabbath, Bowie—they'd all been there, recording their demos that would go on to become life-altering albums. The street had declined much in recent years due to a boom in big studio tech, but a few of the more stubborn shops had stuck around down below, peddling their wares to the average passer-by. It was disheartening to know that he'd missed the prime days of such rock and roll, but Remus always made sure to count the windows on his way to work, as if he might one day catch a glimpse of someone special peering back at him.

"Hasn't your mummy ever told you it's not polite to stare? Perhaps you should start singing. Then they might open their windows, thinking you're a pretty bird."

"Or an air-raid siren." Remus turned his gaze ahead, toward the pavement outside of his shop where she was waiting for him. "Hey, Cas."

“Hey, handsome,” she grinned. “Come here often?”

“Only to see you, love.”

Dorcas—or Cas, as Remus knew her—laughed as he cut between the pair of tables sitting in front of the cafe next door. Her beaded earrings caught the sun and glittered as she pressed a hand to his chest in mock fondness. She was dressed in typical form—a Stylistics t-shirt slashed high above her waist and jeans low enough to show off her entire midriff. She had the music shop’s A-board sign balanced against one hip, and several albums meant for restocking on the other, which Remus took from her on approach. She muttered a thanks, before pulling her long brown locs onto one shoulder and flapping a hand to ward off some of the heat.

“Decent day so far?” He asked, as she straightened out the shop sign.

“Would be, if Phil could get his head outta his arse for five minutes.”

"I've never known a manager to be that flexible."

"Ha! Me neither."

Behind them, a group of young teens still in their school uniforms were busy digging around the albums in the fifty-pence bins.

“I better not catch any ‘a you stuffing none of those into your bags again,” Dorcas warned. “I know you’re good for it, ya posh public school brats.”

The kids all gave her a dirty look and quickly shuffled into the shop, the doorbell twinkling after them. She glared a moment longer, then waved Remus over to the messy bins teetered high with cheap, on-offer singles and old albums that no one ever wanted but were in a constant state of disorder regardless.

“C’mon then, stud. You’re already late, might as well help me with this.”

Remus objected; “I have another five minutes before my shift starts,” but ambled over to the bins with her anyway.

“How was your morning?” Dorcas asked, fanning herself with a tattered copy of The Yardbirds while she went through sections T to Z. She had a necklace around her neck bearing the Star of David, which she played with in her free hand.

“Fine. Saw my step-mum for a while. Not much else. How’s the shop been so far?"

“Bit slow for a Saturday, to be honest. Had a few people coming and going, plus that weird guy with the parrot came by again. But Phil keeps riding my arse about getting that leftover stock out. I'm pretty sure he's a robot, but I've yet to find the bloody off switch.”

“Dunno why he's so insistent,” Remus grumbled. “It’s all German synth. And what do they have? Kraftwerk.”

“Mm… Reckon you’ll be sad you missed him actually.”

“Who—Phil? Please tell me he died.”

“I wish. Guess again.”

“The parrot guy?”

“No! … Well, maybe. I like it when the parrot tells other customers to piss off. But there was someone else! He came by to take a look at that Les Paul Special hanging behind the counter. But oh—you probably wouldn’t know him…”

Remus nudged her, too curious. “Come on, Cas, don’t leave me in suspense. Who was it?”

“Oh, you know… just someone named 'Ronson'. You know, white guy—plays guitar—got Ziggy Stardust and Aladdin Sane on speed dial.”

Remus’ jaw dropped, and Dorcas gave him a cheeky look.

“You mean, Mick Ronson?" He warbled. "As in the Mick Ronson that produced 'Transformer'? The guy who toured with Lou Reed and Bob Dylan—the guitarist who helped shape Bowie’s entire career?! You mean that Mick Ronson?!”

“Yeah, that’s the one, ya anorak.”

“And you’re just telling me this NOW?”

“He’s long gone already!” Dorcas laughed. “You’re the one who didn’t want to work early mornings.”

Remus covered his face and groaned. “Man, Sirius is gonna go mental. Like shit—Mick fucking Ronson, how cool is that!?”

Suddenly someone was clearing their throat pointedly and they both looked up to find their manager, Phil, standing in the shop's doorway. Remus wished he could say that Phil was an alright guy, but really he was just a dick. A true music snob without the added benefit of any taste, and a mullet that looked more like he'd taken the tail off a dog and stapled it to the back of his head. Most days Phil was so intolerable that it was all Remus could do not to strangle him with an amp cable. He would've quit on the first day, had the job not had a few obvious perks.

"Hey there, cats and kittens," the manager drawled; "Mind helping me out inside and—oh, I dunno—doing your job?"

"You said you wanted the bins reorganised," Dorcas said, dropping Yardbirds back into its slot.

"Yes—to you. Not him! Now let's get a move-on, lover boy. Those 1968 Martins won't re-string themselves."

As Phil turned and marched back inside, Remus tossed a glance at Dorcas, who rolled her eyes indifferently and turned back to the stacks and stacks of albums.

"I need all of these done before your lunch break," Phil ordered, after he'd led Remus to the back of the shop, where no less than a dozen guitars were waiting, each stacked up on top of one another like dominos. "Need 'em restrung, and don't forget to check the bleedin' necks. A few of them have raised bridges too—oh, and change out the pickguards on this one, this one—and that Yamaha! I don't like looking at the scratches."

As Phil blabbered, Remus stopped to pick up the guitar in front. A beautiful Gibson J-45.

"You sure you want me to change this one out?" He asked. "I think it looks fine as is."

"I didn't ask you for your opinion, Lupin, I asked you to fix 'em! Just got the whole stock in from some estate and I wanna have them ready for sale by tomorrow, so chop-chop—hop to it! Gotta love it when those decrepit old collectors start pushing up daisies."

The door chimed as more customers filed in, and while Phil left him to upsell some dad out buying his kid his first guitar, Remus huffed and took a seat behind the repair counter. Next to him sat Bo, an old repairman who'd been working at the shop since it was managed by Phil's father. Remus liked Bo. He was chatty about himself but rarely pried, and had the wildest stories of all sorts of musicians that'd come into the shop over the years. He'd once told Remus that he'd been around when Denmark Street was just a lane, and while it was surely an exaggeration; the things Bo had to have seen in his hayday—blimey.

"Don't mind 'im," Bo said, half bent over a stack of pickups he was rewiring; "He's been cheesed off ever since Ronson came in looking for that Les Paul. Said the neck had a slight bend in it. Now everything's gotta be checked twice-over."

"You saw Ronson too, then I take it?"

"Ya snooze, ya lose, kid."

Remus sighed, and Bo pat him fondly on the arm as he turned the guitar over.

"I dunno what he's on about, the neck's fine."

"Already told him as much," Bo nodded.

"Fucking Phil… Guess he would've blamed you for the Les Paul."

"Nah, we didn't touch that guitar, and 'sides, I know Ronson. Did some custom work for him a few years back. I think Phil's just crumbling under the pressure. Has been ever since his father retired."

"Does crumbling also make you a dick?"

"Sometimes."

As Bo dropped his magnifying glasses back down over his nose, Remus turned to his work for the day. He wasn't really sure how he'd ended up in repairs and services, but when Phil had given him the job back in September, he would've been willing to sweep the pavement outside, just so long as he could hang out where the music was.

The music, he told himself, as he picked up the perfectly good Gibson and began clipping its strings; Do it for the music.

"Hey, kid," Bo grunted, "want to learn how to replace the frets on this old strat?"

Remus glanced up, to where Phil was arguing with a guy over the price of a second-hand Telecaster. He'd barely finished the conversation before he was spinning around and harping at a young boy who was testing out one of the other guitars.

“No, no, no! You don’t play ‘Stairway to Heaven’ in here, don’t you know any shop etiquette?!”

Remus shook his head. “Don’t you think our fearless leader will have a fit if we don’t finish everything else first?”

“Maybe,” Bo shrugged, “but he can’t afford to sack me. So what’ll it be?”

Remus smiled. He really liked Bo.

“Yeah, go on.”

Bo was a patient teacher, and over the months he’d spent working beside him at the repair counter, Remus had gotten to know him quite well. He reminded him of Giles, who also tended to gab when he worked. Bo told him all about his childhood growing up as a black kid in Hackney; how he and his four brothers had all slept in the same five by five room, how his mother supported them by washing and mending other people's clothes, how he’d had his first drink at eleven, and kissed his first lady at thirteen.

“And you wanna know what? Twelve years later, I married ‘er,” he’d bragged. “And I’ll be damned if she ain’t still the finest fox I’d ever done seen.”

Bo’s father had been a veteran of the Great War, and then a drunk afterwards. Used to beat his mother, but then when his older brother Joseph—“Jo and Bo we’s used to be.”—had gotten old enough, he started beating back until they’d kicked the evil man out altogether. And then when Bo was just eighteen, the world went to war with itself for the second time.

“Egypt,” he’d said. “They’d shipped me on out to Egypt. I tried telling ‘em, I’m not that sort ‘a African, mate, but they’s wouldn’t have it. At fourteen I'd already learned to drive thanks to this Italian mate who lived in our building—name was Tomasso. He had this little coupe he'd brought over from Valle D'Aosta. Then when the war started, they interned Tomasso at the Isle of Man and repossessed his coupe for the metal. By then I was already off-continent. All day I’d drive them big officers around in my little buggy, choking on dust. But it wasn’t all bad, got to play cards with the boys in the evening, and Cairo was a handsome enough city, 'least before the Jerrys came.”

Remus knew the story well enough by now. After his base in Cairo had been captured, Bo had spent three years in a POW camp until Hitler put a gun in his mouth and the subsequent liberation allowed him to return home to his sweetheart and pop out a couple of kids. As it turned out, both of his younger brothers had been conscripted after him, though only he and Joseph had returned. Then in ‘47 Joseph hung himself in their childhood bedroom and 'Jo and Bo' had become just ‘Bo.’

“Jo was the musician, not me,” Bo said, as he traced his worn fingers over the neck of a beautiful Les Paul Custom. “I just tuned the strings for him.”

Whenever things eventually circled back around to Joseph, Bo tended to filter off. He never went into much detail, which Remus appreciated, but he was always very pragmatic. Said he quit smoking while interned because it was either trade your Red Cross tobacco rations to the Germans for a few raw potatoes or starve to death. Hadn’t touched a cigarette since. Remus had tried to relate to him, but Lyall had never been to war, and though he’d never met his paternal grandfather, he knew he’d managed to avoid being drafted when his own father sent him to Belfast for "business".

But Giles had been to war. He’d come of age in the middle of it all, and as the son of a factory worker, had nothing to keep him from conscription. When he was eighteen they’d shipped him off to France, and when he was twenty, Singapore, because the wound wasn’t already deep enough. Giles rarely talked about it, but Remus knew that he’d lost people too; an older brother and friends he’d grown up with in South London. It was an experience Remus would never know, so long as the world kept its shit together, and—reminisce of his days in the End, or perhaps because he was desperate to relate to someone real in his new environment—Remus lied to Bo about it anyway.

Just once.

“My—er... My dad did a tour in France, actually.”

“Ah, nasty business that. What’s he do now?”

“He’s a driver.”

“Good for ‘im.”

Old habits die hard, as they say.

Remus never brought up Giles or his service again after that. He felt guilty for lying, and it'd been too easy. Bo talked to him like a person—like Lee and the rest of the boys before they'd found out. He had no idea what sort of person his real dad was or how much money he made, and as far as Bo was concerned, they were the same, save maybe their age and the colour of their skin. It was that belonging again; the legacy of that miserable little boy who'd so desperately wanted to belong.

The best thing about Bo though—he did not dwell. Naturally chatty, he jumped from topic to topic with little care, and that almost always meant there was something to learn. The old expert seemed to know everything there was to know about guitars, recording, and music, though he'd never set foot on stage himself. Any and all dreadful managers aside, Remus enjoyed the work, and learning from Bo was a definite upside. His other coworkers were generally likeable as well, but he worked most often with Dorcas, who'd been hired just a few months before he had and was still a bit of a mystery. All he knew about her was that she liked music enough to put up with Phil's bitching and that she was a part of some sort of local activist club that met half a dozen times a week and organised events like sit-ins and demonstrations outside local council meetings. She never deigned to mention any more than that, which Remus supposed was fair, considering he'd shared so little about himself. So far he'd resisted telling everyone apart from Bo that he was in a band—though it was more like he didn't want to jinx it.

"There, make sure it's in there nice and snug," Bo said, observing Remus as he hammered the final metal fret into place.

"Well, well," Dorcas mused, appearing and leaning over the counter to get a look; "Ain't you just a regular dab hand."

"He's a natural," Bo complimented, while checking over his work. "Yup, looks about ready for strings now."

They both stood by and watched Remus restring the guitar, and afterwards Remus held it across his lap and played a quick cord to ensure everything was properly in tune. It was, and he was rewarded with an impressed clap from Dorcas.

"You gonna finally admit to me that you can play thing that too?" She teased. "Or do you only know how to play funky bass lines that no one else ever gets to hear?"

“Play it?!" Bo exclaimed. "Shit, how about he finally admits to more than just—”

“Thanks, Bo,” Remus cut-in, “but I think this is yours?”

Bo took the mallet as Remus offered it and snatched the guitar back with a knowing look before getting up from the repair bench to return it to his hook on the wall. As he did, Phil appeared from around the corner and threw his arms up.

“Oi, Grace Jones, your shift’s not over for another half-hour and I ain’t paying ya to disco with the lads. Get back on the floor!”

“I’ll be right there,” Dorcas called, before rolling her eyes in Remus’ direction. “Fucking prick. Ugh, I’ll see you later.”

He waved to her as she split, and then felt a nudge from behind as Bo returned to his stool.

“Nice girl, that Dorcas. Knows her stuff too.”

“Yeah, she does.”

“So have you asked her out on the town yet?”

“What?” Remus baulked. “No! I’m not—I mean, she’s great and all, but she’s—”

“Got bigger balls on her than you?”

“Thanks for that." Suddenly Remus felt like hitting himself over the head with the mallet. “We’re just pretty different, her and I. 'Sides, I doubt she’d be interested in me anyway.”

Bo shrugged and returned to his collection of mis-wired pickups. “Try telling her about that band of yours. Young kids like you should be bragging about tosh like that. Maybe you ain’t looking for a girlfriend, but another fan—even a friend? Couldn’t hurt.”

Remus wasn’t so sure about that, he’d had more than enough people get the wrong idea after he played it friendly, and wasn’t looking for another storm. Good thing Dorcas came with more surprises than he’d bargained for. Remus was behind the front counter when her shift had finished, busy ringing up a set of strings for a young guy. He couldn’t have been more than sixteen, but he was staring at Remus with all the scrutiny of an old woman.

“Okay, so for the nickel strings… that’ll be two quid, mate.”

“Hey… don’t you play at the Shoestring?”

Remus blinked.

“Huh?”

“Yeah, I remember you now!” The guy started. “I’ve seen you! You're Marauders—you do covers. Me and my mates watched you play there last week. Heh—the Shoestring’s the only place that’ll serve us juice under the table before six.”

“Oh. Right… er—yeah. S’my band…” Remus cleared his throat awkwardly, but the boy didn't seem to notice.

“You guys are good," he grinned. "We wanna do that someday—play in the pubs. What sort ‘a kit you got?”

“Uhm… s’a Teisco BS-36 but—”

“Right! The Teisco. My first set was a Teisco Del Rey too, actually. I’m playing on a Telecaster now, but hey, you make the Teisco sound great.”

Remus was still trying to decide if he’d been insulted when Dorcas strolled up to the counter, her jacket swung over one shoulder. The kid took a look at her and suddenly grew a bit less bold, smiling shyly as he passed the money across the counter and swiped his package of strings.

“Thanks for this,” he said. "We’ll drop by again—see you play! Rock on, mate!”

"Yeah, rock on..."

The kid flashed Remus a final wave as he left and Dorcas leaned across the counter, peering dubiously at them both.

“That was cute. What was he on about?”

“I… I think I need to upgrade my kit.”

She gave him a funny look, and then snapped her fingers toward the drawer beneath the register. “Pass me my lip balm? Just there.”

He did so, and she coated her lips in it before sticking the tube away in her pocket. “Right, I’m off. See you tomorrow, babs.”

“Uh—hold on, Dorcas, do you actually have a sec?”

She spun back around, snapping her fingers again. “Sure, but I’ve gotta catch the train in a few so be quick about it. My cuz’s giving me the big chop tonight.”

She mimed at snipping off her locs and Remus nodded quickly. After sparing a final glance around to ensure that neither Phil or Bo was within ear-shot, he leaned over the counter toward her.

“Would you be interested in coming out with me and some mates tonight?”

Her eyes widened. “With… you?”

“Yeah.”

“Aw shit, Remus, I… Look, you’re a total dish, but I’m not really…”

“Uh?” It took a moment, but then Remus’ eyebrows shot up upon realisation. “Woah, woah—no! This isn’t—I’m not asking you out, Cas.”

“You aren’t?”

“No.”

“Christ!” Dorcas bent over at the middle, hands on her knees like she was relieved. “Oh thank Christ… Scared me there for a moment, Lupin. I dunno what I would’ve done if you were actually fucking serious.”

"Huh. Poor choice of words..."

"What's that?"

Remus shook his head, stifling a smile. “Judging by your reaction, I’m guessing vomiting all over the floor was in the cards.”

Dorcas caught the sarcasm and laughed at him again. “Don’t be offended, you just aren’t my type, is all. Now what is it you really wanted to ask me?”

“I wanted to know if you’d be interested in coming to a show. It’s out in Lambeth. Know it’s a bit of a ways, but it’s a live band.” Remus gulped. “My… band.”

“Actually?” She straightened up then, eyes narrowing. “You stingy little shit, you never told me you were in a band. What d'you play?”

“Bass.”

“I know you play bass, you prat. I meant, what kind of music?”

“Oh—rock. Covers mostly right now, but we’re trying to convince the manager to let us play more of our own stuff. Like I said, the pub's out in Lambeth. It’s kind of seedy but the food ain’t all rubbish, and the beer’s decent. My—My roommate, Sirius—he works there. Can usually snag us a few pints on the cheap too.”

“I see.” She tapped her nails on the countertop, before snapping her fingers toward one of the pens next to the register. “You said tonight, yeah? Gimme the address, I’ll see if I can pop by. Lambeth don’t scare the likes ‘a me.”

“I don’t imagine much does.” Remus scribbled down the pub’s address, before handing it to her. She took it, smirking.

“Mind if I bring a friend along? It's just my boy, King. He's cool, I promise. In a band himself, even.”

“Yeah, totally. The more the merrier.”

“Aw, don’t you sound posh.” Smiling, Dorcas used the pad of her fingers to dab at the sheer balm on her lips. When she was finished she brought out a pair of dark sunglasses and set them on the bridge of her nose as she backed herself toward the shop door. “See you tonight then, Bootsy Collins,” she called. “Can’t wait for you to blow my mind in one of those cute slipovers of yours.”

“Comfortability is paramount,” Remus replied. Then just before she could go, a thought occurred to him; “Hey, Cas? Out of pure curiosity, what is your type?”

Dorcas lowered the sunglasses. “Blondes.” Then she raised them again and tossed him a final wave. “Toodle-oo, babes!”

* * *

They'd given themselves a year. One year to conquer an industry that got more and more saturated with every waking moment. At least they weren't hurting for money—a fact that would come back to bite them when people started asking how they could dare take up space in a coterie that'd had to fight tooth and nail just to feed itself. Back then they were still nobodies and therefore it didn't matter. They'd have to get used to the mob and their pitchforks, but that was a problem for a future marauder.

There would be the occasional upset, maybe a fight or two, but for the most part, those were the good ol' days. The patient days. They were what it meant to simply exist. To be. Later, Remus would look back and miss them, but that was only after he'd forgotten dreary, monotonous moments, where all they could do was labour toward the things they wanted. You see, before fame, all one wants is for everyone to know their name, but the moment it happens, there's no longer a steady being. You're no longer a nobody—you're a somebody, and somebodies never rest.

If any of them could've done it all over again, they probably would've said not to rush, but they'd given themselves a year, and a year proved to be all that was needed in the end. If they had gone back and done it differently, maybe they would've missed their shot. Maybe nothing would've ever come of 'Marauders'. No way to tell, really. In the grand scheme of things, fame was about luck, not talent, and somehow the universe had granted them enough of both.

As Remus turned the key in the lock and nudged open the flat's heavy front door, he was met with a call coming from the kitchen.

"Potter, is that you?"

"Just me, Lils."

"Oh good! Well, food's almost ready."

Humming in contentment, Remus stopped to pick up the letters that had been shoved through their post slot. Most were bills and local shop adverts, but the final envelope was different. It was a letter, labelled in tidy penmanship and addressed to him. Setting the other post aside, Remus tore open its top.

Dear Remus,

I'm so glad to hear things are going well with your new job. And your band! How exciting… I hope Mr. Black's been keeping up with those vocal exercises. Wouldn't want him to strain his tenor before twenty.

Things are going just fine up here, though I have to say, we're two months into the term and somehow it doesn't quite feel the same. Too quiet, maybe. Every now and then I wake up with a feeling that something is going to happen, like I should be expecting smoke bombs in the teacher's lounge or rock music in church. Imagine my disappointment when the biggest excitement of my day turns out to be a bloody nose or Mr. Filch's cat getting stuck up a tree. I am happy to report that Regulus is doing very well in music, though that might not come as a much of a surprise. Sometimes I even wonder to myself if he isn't the one teaching me. He did shock me a bit when he decided not to take up the violin, and I'm sorry I can't tell you what it is that he's chosen. Apparently I've been sworn to secrecy.

Thank you again for writing to me, Remus. Being your teacher has been one of the greatest joys of my life, and now that is done, I'm grateful to be anything more. I know that you and your friends will do magnificent things, but don't forget the little ones either. And send me a photograph of your new flat. I'd like to see for myself where it is you now call home.

With love,

Sheila A. Buchanan

Remus smiled to himself. He could already picture what he would write back—we never put smoke bombs in the teacher's lounge, though now I'm thinking it was a wasted opportunity—but by then Lily had appeared in the entry way, holding a mason jar full of water.

"Have a good shift, did you?" She asked.

"Mhm, and your day?"

"Oh, my lectures were fine. I'm finally getting used to being on campus anyway." She smiled and handed him the jar. "Can you take this upstairs with you and water Remus? James and Peter have gone to get the van, should be back any minute."

"I'm sorry," Remus said, perplexed and tucking Sheila's letter under one arm, "but water… Remus?"

"The plant—the one I put in your bathroom?"

“And apparently named after me. Why?”

“Well, I already have a James, Peter, and Sirius.” She gestured to the hallway table, which was supporting a very large fern. “This is Marlene, isn’t she beautiful?”

“Stunning. And why, per-say, is she named after our very human friend?”

“I dunno. Just seemed like a Marlene.”

With a light shake of his head, Remus took the jar and began up the stairs to his and Sirius’ bedroom.

“Make sure you get changed beforehand,” Lily called after him; “The boys are gonna need help moving the equipment into the van, and Sirius is already over at the pub, working!”

“Yes, Mummy-dear, I sure will!”

He heard her huff before returning into the kitchen, but by then Remus was already one flight up. One more and he was pushing aside the creaky door leading to his bedroom. It was just after seven, and they were due to go on stage at The Shoestring at half-past eight. Plenty of time to load up Mr. Pettigrew’s van with their amps and instruments and scarf down a few precious bites of food.

After pouring the mason jar of water into the leafy plant Lily had propped up on the corner edge of their loo window, Remus set the jar aside and emptied his pocket contents onto his wardrobe hutch across the bedroom. Shrugging off his coat, he quickly found himself collapsed back on the bed, mid-evening lull hitting him hard.

Now, Remus almost always slept on the right. He wasn’t sure when it’d happened, but sometime since moving in, that spot had simply become his. Though every now and then he’d roll over and bury himself into the rumpled sheets on Sirius’ side, just to breathe him in. It was almost odd; they slept in the same bed every night, and yet the left side was just so Sirius. He did it now, curling into Sirius’ side and groaning into the pillow. Fuck a job—they should’ve just gone with Sirius’ advice and played the part of the nugatory artist living off of inheritance. They’d have certainly gotten more sleep that way. Sometimes Remus really hated being a functioning member of society.

When he could finally bring himself to move again without groaning,

Remus pressed up from the bed and peeled out of the day's clothes. He'd just pulled a fresh t-shirt over his head when Lily's voice came wailing up the stairs once more.

"REMUS! THE BOYS ARE HERE!"

"Coming!" He hollered back, tossing on his coat and shoving his wallet and keys back into his pockets. His finger jammed something hard and he hissed, only then remembering the framed photograph Sandra had given him.

Withdrawing it, his eyes scanned over the crumpled tissue paper and for a moment he considered unwrapping it and setting it upon the hutch. But then he imagined looking at it every day—and because that sucked too much, he slid it into the top drawer with his socks instead. Maybe one day he'd be able to stomach looking back on vivid memories like those, but for now, it was enough just to know that they existed at all.

Scarpering down the stairs, he found Peter and James in the kitchen, inhaling the casserole Lily had so graciously made for dinner. James looked like usual—fit without trying in a plain white t-shirt and slacks—while Peter had dressed up a bit in a wide-collared shirt and open waistcoat.

"Wotcher, Lupin!" Peter said, as Remus came in.

"Good day, lads?"

"Oh yeah," James replied, swallowing. "As my manager would say, 'the rush never ends at the Ritz'. It's mental, truly. Some big-wig parliament member came in today, chap ordered bitters and tonic water."

"That's actually supposed to be very good for an upset stomach," Lily interjected, pushing a plate of food in front of Remus. "Here, eat. Can't have you passing out on stage."

He took a seat at the table obediently, and began shovelling food into his mouth alongside his friends. "Everything go alright with the van?" He asked around bites.

"Yeah," Peter answered; "Though I think Dad's getting tired of lending it out. We'll probably have to get our own soon."

"I'll talk to Sirius about it."

“Sorta hate that he’s the one always footing the bill,” James grunted.

“Don’t bother,” Lily said, leaning up against the kitchen counter and bringing a cup of tea to her lips. “I think he secretly enjoys being everyone’s sugar daddy. Some more than others.” She winked at Remus, who rolled his eyes over a mouthful.

“Despite what the rest of you might think, he does not foot my bills."

"What about that new amp?" Asked James.

"That was his idea! Same with those pedals of yours, and Peter's new toms as well!"

James shrugged, muttering; "I don't mind having a sugar daddy."

“Honestly, you always have to have a chip on your shoulder, Moony,” Peter snorted. “Anyone else would just let themselves be spoiled, but not Moony—nooooo.”

They all laughed, even Remus, and Lily glanced at the clock on the wall. “Best hurry up if we’re to make it in time for a sound check.”

“Aren’t you just becoming the little band manager,” James mused, standing up to drop his plate into the sink’s soapy dishwater.

“Someone’s got to keep you lot on track,” she said, smacking him on the arse.

“Christ,” Peter grimaced. “Let the pair of ‘em move in together and all of a sudden it’s foreplay by the kitchen sink.”

“Peter!”

Remus grinned wryly, spooning his last few bites of dinner into his mouth. By the time he’d washed up and set the dishes out to dry, James and Lily were already reaching for their jackets—Peter, the keys.

“Alright,” James called, once they had carried all of the equipment up from the flat’s basement and piled it onto the curb. “Tonight’s show—scale of one to ten. I say seven. You, Pete?”

“I’m betting on a five,” Peter said, struggling with two of their biggest amps; “Ngh—Just feels like a five-kind of night.”

“Them's poor odds. How about you, Lupin?”

Remus considered. They'd been playing their 'rate the show' game for a while now, ever since Ray, manager of The Shoestring, had agreed to let them play a weekly gig. It was an easy way to quell the nerves, and the loser bought drinks after, no matter how bad.

"Nine."

"Whoo-hoo," James whistled. "Moony's feeling optimistic. And Moony never feels optimistic. Must mean we're in for a good night after all."

"Maybe he's just invited someone he wants to impress," Lily added, handing Remus his bass. Remus took it, carefully placing it into the back of the van.

"As a matter of fact, I did."

They all blinked at him in surprise.

"You did?"

"Just a coworker. Her name's Cas. She's cool."

"Oh my god, are you actually making friends?" Ragged James.

"Piss off."

"I think it'll be nice," Lily interjected. "The others are coming too. Marlene's got the night off and Mary's gonna head over after some rehearsal-thingy for her voice lessons. Only Lottie's a maybe, but that's just because she was supposed to take the train and see Roger."

"Can't stomach not seeing him for one weekend, can she?" Peter griped.

Lily put her hands up. "She's your sister."

When they had everything loaded up, the four of them climbed into the van and set off across the city toward the rundown district of South Bank. James drove, since they'd all agreed ages ago that he was the steadiest behind the wheel. Lily sat beside him, window down so the cool evening air could rush through her fire-red waves. It was kind of Mr. Pettigrew to lend them the van, but Sirius continuously griped about how rolling up to a concert in a van with the words 'Daily London Local' blasted on its side did little for their image. Though if he'd had it his way, they'd be carting their instruments over to gigs on the back of a motorbike.

The Shoestring Pub wasn't exactly a high-flyer's favourite hangout. Rather, it was a seedy hole in the wall lying just across the river. The location was central enough, however, meaning that plenty of locals tended to pop in after the dockyards closed up shop for the day. Normally their band only ever played on Tuesdays, which were much slower and tended to favour the more down-on-their-luck type of crowd, but the group that had held the Saturday evening slot had recently lost their drummer, leaving behind a hole in the ranks. Sirius had been quick to snap up the opportunity, and because Ray could grudgingly admit to liking him, he'd agreed to give them a shot on the condition that they made sure to name-drop the drink-of-the-day ahead of every show and, of course, agreed to play covers.

Only covers.

"Crowds like covers!" The manager had said, when he was outlining his conditions. "They can sing along to covers, and where there's singing, there's booze. It's just the way of the world, lads."

Remus still thought this was complete crap, but Ray was right; beggars couldn't really be choosers.

As James pulled up to the pub's corner, they were met with a cloud of cigarette smoke courtesy of the drifters hanging out outside.

"Remember, don't bother locking the doors," Peter grumbled. "We're taking it all with us anyway and dad says he'd rather them root through the empty glove box than break a bloody window."

Piling out of the van, they each grabbed a section of gear and carted it toward the back alley, proceeding past a drunk patron who was already passed out on the pavement. At least—they hoped he was passed out. Setting down Peter's bass drum, James did the honourable thing and nudged the guy with his boot. He grunted and turned over in the dirt. Yup, still alive.

"Ray!" Remus cried, wailing his fist on the metal of the pub's back door. "Ray, open up!"

A few seconds clicked by, and the door was eventually opened by a burly guy with a permanent glower plastered across his face. He was wearing his usual uniform of faded slacks and a Hawaiian shirt, the apron hanging over top stained more yellow than white.

"Playing cook tonight too, Ray?" Remus asked.

“Lonnie didn’t show up,” the manager growled. “And I thought I told you buggers to use the front door.”

“Last time we did that Pete got pickpocketed on his way in.”

“Happens to everyone at the Shoe. Think of it as an initiation.”

“Come on, Ray,” James complained. “Don’t make us lug it all around front again.”

He seemed about likely too, before craning his thick neck sideways and letting a friendly smile grace his lips. “Orright, but only ‘cause you brought me flowers.”

As the ‘flower’ in question, Lily giggled at the obvious attempt at flattery and squeezed in between them with Peter’s cymbals in hand.

“Thank you, Ray,” she said, as the manager stepped back to allow her inside before the rest of them. Remus went next, bowing his head in thanks and trying not to drop the pair of amps he was carrying.

"You only encourage him when you do that, you know,” Remus chaffed as he and Lily squeezed through the grimy kitchen.

“You don't know what it's like," Lily tsked. "Everyday I watch Potter get hit on by 'sweet old ladies'. One compliment from Sirius’ manager every now and then isn’t going to kill anyone.”

Remus glanced back at James, who was giving Ray a friendly clap by the door. The manager took one of the guitars from him, and even helped him carry it inside.

“No, I suppose it won’t,” Remus chuckled.

Inside, the Shoe was already busy—patrons sidling left and right with full pints in hand. The pub boasted a small platform on its right side for the entertainment to set up on, but all the equipment was self-supplied by the bands, save for a single piano in the corner that looked like it’d survived a bombing in Mile End. The lack of house speakers or amps made for a taxing set-up, but once those and Peter’s kit were organised, they really only needed to plug in and play.

“I’m gonna tell Sirius we’re here,” Remus told the others, when they’d dropped their gear beside the stage.

“Grab us a bevvy, wontcha, Moons?”

Remus gave James the two-finger salute and started back across the pub. He was about halfway when some old codger with foam in his beard and an empty glass reached out and grabbed his sleeve.

“You the new band in?”

“Part of it, yeah,” Remus flubbed.

“Good, good. Couldn’t stand those other muppets. Too much moaning into the mike. Have us a good show, will ya, boy?”

Remus just nodded along, used to the drunken spiel, and the guy finally released him long enough to reach the bar.

“A round of pints for the most kick-ass band from here to Hollywood, if you’d be so kind,” he said, leering over the side of the counter. Sirius spun around immediately, looking good in his plain white vest, despite having already worked a full shift. The velvet slacks that flared at the bottom and the leather choker around his neck were a bit much, but Remus was more interested in the fading burn scar, which peaked out proudly beneath the vest’s right-hand strap. He'd gotten so used to seeing it over the months they've been dating that it'd become like nothing to him, but Remus was glad Sirius wasn’t as conscious over it anymore.

“Don’t you sound smug,” Sirius smiled, already reaching for a set of glasses. He drew up short when he noticed what Remus was wearing —and Remus knew this, because Sirius always spoke his mind.

“Christ, what are you wearing?”

Remus glanced down at himself. Jeans, a plaid button-up hanging open over a Bad Company t-shirt. Normal dress for him.

“What? It’s clothes. And I think you’ll find that you’re the odd one out among this crowd. Those trousers are tighter than Mary’s.”

"That's because they are Mary's."

"You've got to be joking me."

"You wish. Wanna come kiss it?" Wickedly, Sirius smacked a hand down over one of his back pockets. Before Remus could dignify it with a response, someone had gone to the jukebox and put on the Rolling Stones.

'Baby, baby, I've been so sad since you've been gone, Way back to New York City,
Where you do belong!'

Instantly Sirius was humming; " 'Honey, I missed your two-tone kisses —legs wrapped around me tight. If I ever get back to Fun City, girl— I'm gonna make you scream all night!'"

Tossing aside a pint glass, he reached over the bar for the front of Remus' shirt, only to have his hand batted away. But he was still singing, and might've done worse had Ray not come pushing out of the kitchen's saloon doors with a basket of chips in either hand.

“Oi, Black! Finish those orders and take a mop to the loo before you’re off, will ya?”

Sirius spun round indignantly, jerking a thumb toward the beer taps. “Can’t you get Marshall to do it? I’m on bar tonight.”

“Marshall’s gonna be covering you at the bar, now get!”

“Fine, fine,” Sirius huffed' “But listen, Ray, about what we were chatting about earlier—”

“The answer’s still no. Beers, toilet, mop—now.”

As the manager split off to deliver the food, Sirius turned back to Remus and rolled his eyes. “Still won’t let us play any originals, the sodding gaffer.”

“Guess he wants us to prove ourselves first. Mop that toilet to a shine and he just might let us.”

Sirius scoffed at him, and then finished filling the rest of the beers. “Right, here’s a few pints then. I’ll be over to help set up after I mop the fucking toilet.”

“Don’t worry about it,” Remus said, pulling his cigarettes from his pocket and handing them over. “You’ve worked hard, take a little break after. We got set-up covered.”

Sirius snatched up the cigarettes and smiled. “Have I ever told you how much I love you?”

“Only when you want something.” Remus took the pint and sipped it as Sirius leaned over to take another woman's order. It was almost hot to see him behind the bar, his neck slick with sweat. He'd picked up bartending quick enough, though you'd be hard pressed to find anyone around the Shoestring who's go-to wasn't a cloudy cider or a mug of Heineken.

"Another round, Starboy!" One of the tables not far off called. Sirius pointed at them fondly in return and reached for a bottle of cheap Amaretto before catching sight of the cheeky grin on Remus' face.

"Don't."

"It's a cute nickname. You would've liked it once upon a time."

"How do you know I don't like it now? If I'm 'Starboy' then you know what that makes you, right?"

"No, but please enlighten me."

Rather than answer, Sirius smiled to himself and held a finger up as if in wait. Then he pointed to the jukebox, and the chorus of the Stones' song hit its peak.

" 'You're a starfucker, starfucker, starfucker, starfucker, star—yes you are'!"

"Har-har, very funny." Thinking it was about time he got back to the others, Remus scooped up the tray of beers and turned back toward the stage. Then in a moment of curiosity, he remembered Sheila's letter and set the tray back down again—too curious not to ask.

"Hey, did Regulus mention to you that he isn't playing the violin anymore?"

Sirius looked up from the beer he was pouring. "He's not?"

"Not in music class anyway."

"So what's he playing then?"

"Dunno, Sheila never said. But I got another letter from her today."

"Ah, and how is the amazing god-mummy?"

"She's fine, and I wish you'd stop calling her that."

Sirius shrugged, flexing those wonderful biceps as he poured another drink. “Reg is old enough to do as he likes. I think it’s great that he’s trying new things. Bet he’d look good on an oboe.”

“How do you know it’s not something cooler? Like a guitar, maybe? Hm?”

“Because he's my little brother,” Sirius snorted. “Reg takes pride in not being cool. I’ll call him later, you’ll see. He’s probably picked something odd and foreign—like the didgeridoo.”

“Yeah, yeah.” Again, Remus picked up the tray of beers. “I’ll see you in a few.”

Sirius blew him a kiss, and then grinned at another guy already approaching the bar. “Angus! Two jack and cokes, I presume?”

Pints in hand, Remus swung back around and headed for the stage. James and Peter had the mikes and drum kit just about set up, and sometime between leaving them for Sirius, Mary and Marlene had shown up as well. No Lottie, which must’ve meant she’d travelled to Reading to visit Roger after all.

“Hey, you,” Marlene said, wrapping her arms around him the moment he’d set the drinks down. He kissed her cheek and when she pulled away, Marlene pinched his nose between two knuckles.

“You were supposed to call me.”

“Right!” Remus pulled his face away. “Sorry, got a bit busy. Sirius and I were up late last night working on a new song.”

“You sure that’s not all you were doing?” Mary mused from her table closest to the stage.

“What is this, national 'take the piss outta Remus day'?” Remus shook his head, then feigned a frown. “Forgive me, Cherry?”

“It’s fine,” she said. “Ended up staying late at the office anyway. Who’d have known a group of radicals would need so much fucking paperwork.”

“Does that mean you’ve been neglecting your civil duty to set any and all cop cars on fire the moment they enter your periphery?”

“Unfortunately. A zealot’s job is never done.” She smirked and reached up to finger a piece of hair that had fallen into her eyes. It’d grown longer since she'd chopped it off before their final year, and she now wore it in a rough shag, cut short around her ears and forehead. Mary had compared it to a street dog when she'd first seen it, but somehow Remus doubted that she was the type Marlene was looking to impress nowadays. The rest of her was dressed as it usually was—oversized jacket, jeans with purposeful holes cut over the knees, heavy boots that'd likely kill a man with the right amount of blunt force trauma. Beautiful, cut-throat Cherry.

"Shall I grab you a pint?" Remus offered, but Marlene just waved him off.

"Nah, I'll go. Got a bone to pick with Black as well. I know it was him who vomited in my boots after that night out at the Roxy last week."

"If it makes you feel any better, he fell asleep that night with his head in the toilet."

"Thanks, it does. Back in a tick." She kissed him on the cheek in return and then stepped away, just in time for James to throw his amp cable at him.

"You gonna tune your own bloody guitar, or am I to do that too?"

Remus rolled his eyes, gently whipping James in the thigh with the end of the cord as he set to plugging in his amp. The Shoe's stage was without any lights, but they usually just dimmed the bar's overheads and went from there. Standing on the raised platform, he could already see the pub's patrons sizing them up, no doubt wondering whether they were going to be shit or not. As James went about adjusting the height of his microphone, and Peter quietly fussed over their impending set list, even more people began to gather; young and old squishing into the pub on the busy Saturday night.

"And how have you been?" Remus asked Mary, plucking anxiously at his D string. "Haven't seen you since you came by the flat last time."

Sitting off to the side of the stage, Mary set down the pint she'd been nursing and blew a corkscrew curl out of her eyes. "Things have been alright. Finally got myself moved out of my family's place, though Marls still refuses to come with me. She says the rent's too high. Don't know why she's got her knickers in such a twist over it though, I told her that she wouldn't have to bother with it since Daddy's already agreed to foot the bill 'til I'm out of school."

He didn't say it, but Remus had a feeling that was exactly why. At the beginning of September, Mary had settled into a resplendent little flat in Bloomsbury, not five minutes from Birkbeck University where she was studying the French language and culture. Similar to Lily's UCL, Birkbeck was a subsidiary college at the University of London. The area was less posh than she was used to, but she claimed to enjoy the intellectual atmosphere, and often she and Lily were able to meet each other for lunch. She was still taking her vocal lessons on the side, but remained very much casual about them whenever anyone asked.

Unlike her best friends, Marlene had elected not to carry on to university. Instead she had left home almost immediately following the end of upper sixth and picked up casual work for most of the summer before finally settling into community outreach at some local not-for-profit. She got paid in pennies but was happy enough with the work, and far too proud to let any of them pay her way—even Mary.

“It's a breeze mostly,” Mary continued. "My professors seem right pleased with me though. A few have asked me if I'd consider studying abroad for a year in Montpellier or Paris. Wouldn't that be a sight."

"And your voice lessons? How are they going?"

"Oh, you know..." She gave him a simpering smile. "My instructor says I might have what it takes to sing Baroque. Bit naff, but it's supposed to be a compliment. If you’re ever in need of that or a bel canto singer, just let me know.”

“We might have to,” James said, strutting up behind Remus; “if Sirius doesn’t feel it necessary to show up for his own gig. Christ, where is the tosser?”

“Had to mop the toilet,” Remus said. “Told him to cop a fag after. I’d cut him some slack too, you know what this place’s loo looks like.”

James sighed, unable to argue, and Peter appeared next to him, wringing out his drumsticks nervously.

“Is it just me, or are there more people here than usual?”

Remus glanced out over the crowd again; there were certainly more than their accustomed Tuesday audience. In the time since he’d left Sirius to set up, the din had turned to a full-blown clamour, and he expected they’d have to turn up the mike and amps a few decibels just to be heard over the noise. He’d gone to do just that when a familiar face caught his eye, and Remus lit up all over.

Handing James his bass, he stepped off the stage and surged forward. His arms were up before he realised it, but Dorcas had never really struck him as a touchy-feely person. She stepped back from him just as they met up in the crowd, turning the hug into a high-five and laughing awkwardly.

“I think you’re gonna have to buy me a drink first, ya hunk.”

“Sorry!” Remus chirped, surprised by himself. Since when did he hug people?

“Your hair looks great,” he said, gesturing to Dorcas’ newly buzzed scalp, mostly to hide his nerves. “Hell… I can’t believe you’re here!”

Smiling, Dorcas peeled off her jacket and threw it over one shoulder. “Yeah, well, when your awkward coworker invites you out to see his band with the questionable name, you go.”

“Ouch. I never told you our name.”

“Saw it on a sign on the way in. Marauders, right? It’s—uh… questionable.”

“Suppose that’s you being kind.”

“You know it,” she smirked, before stepping back to introduce the man standing next to her. “Brought you that friend I was talking about. This here is my boy, King.”

King was a tall guy, broad shouldered, with hair as wide and fierce as Jimi Hendrix. He wore sunglasses inside, and had a single gold earring in one ear, but when Dorcas introduced him he pulled the glasses off and nodded in friendly greeting.

“It’s Kinglsey,” he said, offering Remus his hand. “But my friends call me King.”

“Thanks for coming to the show, man,” Remus said, taking it. They shook, and subsequently Dorcas nudged Kingsley in the arm.

“King’s something of a musician himself,” she boasted. “He and his band play out in New Cross every weekend, and they’ve got an evening spot at Ronnie Scott’s twice a month.”

“I know that place," Remus nodded. "Jazz club, right? Killer tunes.”

Kingsley nodded, returning his sunglasses to the bridge of his nose.

“You guys should come by sometime. See about jamming. Dee swings by all the time, mostly to mooch the free scotch. Sometimes it’s like we can’t get her to leave.”

Dorcas punched King’s arm. “Oi, not in front of the coworker.”

Remus chuckled, but it was as though a hint of some forgotten memory had trickled through to the front of his brain.

“I’m sorry,” he said, “but did you say ‘Dee’?”

“It’s just a nickname,” Dorcas surmised. “Cas, Dee—call me whatever you want, can’t be arsed anyway.”

“But she’s been Dee since we were kids,” Kingsley finished. “Little Dee-Dee.”

“King, I swear to god…”

“Sorry,” Remus nodded, brushing off the strange coincidence. “It’s just a friend of mine once knew—”

“Moony!”

It was Sirius, bounding through the rabble like a spark plug on speed. He stepped past Dorcas and Kingsley and grabbed Remus by his shoulders, already steering him for the stage.

“C’mon, let’s get this show on the road before the rotten fruit starts flying.”

“Hold on, Sirius, I want to meet—”

“Sirius!”

Now it was Marlene, pushing through with a drink in either hand.

“You forgot your beer, you dickh—” she started, but then she realised who they were with, and just like that, the moment became one of those infallible instances of utter providence. Marlene looked at Dorcas, and Dorcas looked at Marlene, and both drinks hit the floor.

A cry went up instantly as the thick pub glasses clattered against the boards, spattering the ankles of a few nearby patrons. It was enough to break Marlene’s spell, as she leapt backwards and gaped over what she’d done.

“Shit! Ooh—I’m so sorry!” She said to Kingsley, whose flared trousers had suffered most of the fallout.

“Don’t sweat it. A little spilt juice never hurt no one.”

Despite the pardon, Marlene snagged a handful of paper napkins and dove for the floor. Sirius went to help her, muttering something about how the floor was sticky enough anyway, but it was Dorcas who got there first. She bent down next to Marlene and righted the glasses, which thankfully had not broken.

“Wow. Never thought I’d see you again, blondie,” she said. Marlene looked up at her immediately, a blush enveloping her entire face.

“You…” She laughed suddenly, and it was a bit like a sigh. “You changed your hair!”

“Uh, yeah. Just today actually.” Almost looking shy, Dorcas ran her fingers along the cropped hair at the base of her skull. “Gonna take a bit of getting used to, but I think a little change is good for us, don’t you?”

Marlene’s mouth fell open, helpless and dazzled, and from their position a few feet away, Remus and Sirius exchanged a look.

“Did you…?”

“No, no idea…”

Marlene glanced at them, and quickly popped to her feet, fisting the dirty napkins. “Guys, this is Dee. We… We met in Morocco.”

"It's actually Dorcas," Dorcas amended. "There goes my grand overseas persona."

A laugh slipped out, and Marlene quickly slapped a hand over her mouth to stifle it. Luckily for her, Sirius knew how to draw a crowd.

“Oh!” He crowed. “So you’re the infamous Dee?”

Dorcas rounded on Marlene. “Been talking about me, have you?”

Remus didn’t think it was possible for Marlene to blush any harder. He nudged Dorcas, partly still in disbelief himself.

“I can’t believe you never told me you went by Dee.”

“Like I said, can’t be arsed. He just called you 'Moopy', wanna explain that for me?”

"It's Moony, actually."

"Oh, 'cause that makes much more sense."

“Oi!” Ray grunted, appearing behind them all. “Practically begged me for this Saturday night spot, didn’t cha? Now are you four gonna get up there and play or not?”

“We’re going!” Sirius trilled, already pushing Remus ahead of himself. Marlene, Dorcas, and Kingsley all went over to the girls’ table, fitting in between Mary and Lily. From his spot on stage, Remus couldn’t hear what was being said, but he knew when Marlene had introduced them from the gaping looks of surprise on Mary and Lily’s faces.

“Who’s that with Marlene?” Peter asked.

“It’s Dorcas,” Remus said. "My coworker."

“Yeah, otherwise known as ‘Dee’,” Sirius added keenly.

“Holy shit. As in…?”

“Yup. Looks like Moony’s been holding out on us.”

“We just work together,” Remus scoffed. “I had no idea she and Marlene had met before today.”

James shook head. “I’m telling ya, lads, it’s like the world’s getting smaller and smaller each day.”

“You’re right,” Sirius said, as grasped the mike; “So let’s make it a little bit bigger, hey?”

Remus looked at Sirius standing before his microphone, and could’ve kissed him. It would become a common enough feeling later on, once people had begun to chant for them rather than a stiff pint and some noise, but even then there’d be nothing he could do about it. So instead, began practising the move he’d be doing for the rest of their lives; he picked up his bass guitar, plugged it into his amp, and got ready to play his heart out.

Sirius turned to the microphone;

“Hello, everybody, nice evening so far!?”

The audience's clamour died slightly as Sirius addressed them for the first time. They all turned to get a look at the skinny kid with the microphone and velvet trousers, but Sirius wasn't the least bit shy. He worked every crowd for its last drop of enthusiasm, and tonight was no exception.

"I know you've probably realised already that we're not your regular Saturday evening entertainment," he said; "but I think you'll find we're a little more fun."

A hoot went up from Mary, and she raised her glass as several others joined her.

"This is James Potter, our lead guitarist. He could've been a lawyer like his dad, instead he's here with us ingrates. Everyone say thank you. And that there is Peter Pettigrew on drums, our resident lady-killer—just don't tell his girlfriend."

Peter slammed his bass pedal several times and Sirius saluted him humbly.

"And this here is Remus Lupin, our big bad bastard on bass."

"Very funny," Remus called, as the crowd hooted and Dorcas punctuated the moment with a primely timed wolf-whistle.

"Mhm," Sirius crooned; "I'd watch out for that one, he's got teeth."

Remus grabbed his own back-up mike; "Just introduce yourself already so we can bloody play!"

"Alright, alright. No need to get frisky, Lupin—that's the audience's job." Sirius smoothed his hair back out of his face. "My name is Sirius Black, and together we make up Marauders. Best remember that, 'cause one day your girlfriends are gonna be shouting our names."

The audience laughed, and this time a woman did call Sirius' name, just in time for him to wink and Peter to finish counting in on his sticks, and James to hit his first major riff.

"Alright, ladies and gentlemen, let's go for a ride, shall we?"

From then on, Sirius had them. They'd played the same list of covers on Tuesday nights to moderate applause, but it was nothing like playing to a full house. In a room filled with cheering people, even a cow bell could sound cool—though, it might've helped that they were playing Zeppelin.

“In the days of my youth,
I was told what it means to be a man;
Now I’ve reached that age,
I’ve tried to do all those things the best I can—”

James played from his waist, sauntering up and down the stage reminiscent of Page. Peter slammed his daddy-bought cow skins so fast he was off-tempo, but it worked for the dirty song so none of them had ever said anything. Down among the throng, Marlene and Dorcas were standing hip to shoulder, screaming the lyrics and sparing chance looks at each other whenever they could. Remus was delighted—it wasn’t hard—but if he were being honest, he was paying more attention to Sirius than anything else.

“Good times, bad times—you know I’ve had my share;
When my woman left home for a brown-eyed man—
Well, I still don’t seem to care!”

God, it was bloody distracting! Remus capitalised on his fleeting bass solo, and yet all he could see was Sirius. Sirius!—as he ripped the microphone from its stand and whipped it around, snagging it out of the air just before the next lyric.

“Good times, bad times—you know I’ve had my share;
When my woman left home for a brown-eyed man—
Well, I still don’t seem to care!”

Luckily for Remus, all the audience seemed to see was Sirius as well. They loved him, even the old guys who never had anything decent to say about anyone. They raised their glasses to him, then their fists, and when that wasn’t enough, they stomped their feet and sang along until God Himself had no choice but to listen as well. The Shoestring was an old building, built before the war, bombed, and built again. It didn’t have the structure to support such madness. The floor groaned and the lights flickered, and no one was a drop sober.

“Come on, South Bank,” Sirius urged; “I wanna hear you scream!”

Their set was forty-five minutes, and they were due for another after ten o'clock, but as their final cover came to a close, Sirius swooped in, barely finished singing.

"We should play one of our songs!" He hissed, fist over mike.

"What?" James demanded. "But Ray's already said no."

"The crowd loves us, but we could still lose 'em to beer and chips in a second! Just think of it, we got an entire set left—even if we suck, we can win 'em back then!"

"I agree with Sirius!" Peter said, chiming in from his drum kit.

"I dunno," Remus fumbled. His fingers were numb and as were his lips, though that could've just been the alcohol. "We've never sung our songs in front of anyone we didn't already know."

"No time like the present!" Sirius grinned. "All we just have to do is pick one and play it!"

"Easy for you to say, you've only got to remember the lyrics!" James said.

"I see appreciation for your lead singer knows no bounds, Potter."

"We should play 'Hail Mary'!' Peter called.

"We've just barely finished writing 'Hail Mary'!" James moaned.

"You remember the notes, don't you?"

"Well, sorta—"

Sirius smacked him on the arm. "Sorta's all we need, mate! Half the people in 'ere aren't even gonna know that it's not a cover!"

At Sirius' words, Remus looked at the audience. Most people, the girls included, were peering at them with dubious expressions. Some had already returned to their drinking, while others crowded around the base of the stage, silently urging for more. Beyond them, Ray was standing next to the bar and waving his hand next to his neck in a 'cut it' motion. He wanted them to stop—but Remus didn't want to stop. He was finally getting a taste of the one thing he'd wanted for so long. And now…

Now he wanted to be maxed.

“Pete’s right, we should do ‘Hail Mary’.”

James whirled on him. “You too?”

“Yes!” Sirius answered first, rushing the mike. “Looks like it’s your lucky day, folks—we’re gonna do one more before we break. An encore, if you will.”

A weakened cheer went up, and James fumbled to plug his guitar back in. Already sweating buckets in the sweltering room, Remus had just enough time to rip off the plaid overshirt and reveal Sirius’ Bad Company t-shirt underneath, before his friends were playing again.The song had a decent intro filled with smooth-rocking tom beats, so after they’d managed to wrestle their nerves and start, Sirius began sauntering up and down the stage, humming into the mike.

“Anyone here ever heard of a ‘hail Mary’?” He asked, grinning like a cat. “I know—anyone know what it’s like to beg for a mother?”

There was whistling, followed by exhilarated rallying. These were the slums in South Bank—all these people could afford as children was religion. Just like Tomny, a shit father was expected. It was the mother they knew to want for. And now, with James’ guitar getting faster and Peter’s drums getting louder, they begged for the noise to help them forget.

“You may not know the words to this one,” Sirius said, “but you seem like God-fearing people… I know you remember how to pray. Now—KICK IT!”

Sirius punctuated his cry with an actual kick, toppling several empty glasses that’d been left on the edge of the stage. Their crashing sound was instantly swallowed by a swell of raving, and by then the room’s bodies began to sway again, moved to motion by the draw of each lick. It wasn’t a masterpiece—not even their best song—but it was new and a paragon of triumph for a couple of teenage idiots without a shred of real experience between them. If anything the melody was a Zeppelin rip-off, minus the killer harmonica solos.

None of them could even play the harmonica.

Remus fucking loved it.

“I have visions of renegades,
Visions of renegades—

Scattered amongst the stars;
We're bound to see better days,
Better days—
When we've patched all our scars!"

Finally—Finally! It was them, their song. Playing it made Remus remember all those late nights spent writing it. Their home, their flat, every 'Man, Tomny would love this!'

He could feel the weight of his bass teetering on his shoulder, propped up against his thigh. Every vibration of the strings, the shake of the floors and the walls. It was the best high, and when he looked out onto his friends—Lily with her arms around Mary, Marlene undoubtedly stuck close to Dorcas—he never wanted to come back down.

"Hollywood took all my money,
Yeah, we've fallen from grace;
Am I rich in someone else's memories,
A statue stuck in place?
Hail mary, me oh my—
String me up, so I might get high!"

Sirius didn't sing—he belted. And by the second and third verse, the crowd was screaming it back at them.

"HAIL MARY, ME OH MY—STRING ME UP SO I MIGHT GET HIGH!"

"HAIL MARY, ME OH MY—STRING ME UP SO I MIGHT GET HIGH!"

It's 1978.

They're one year away from the catalyst of modern pop culture—the Walkman.

Petrol is 75p a gallon, cigarettes cost less than a bottle of paracetamol.

Sweden moves to ban aerosols to aid in the fight against an enemy no one can see or touch.

Olivia Newton-John and the Bee Gees dominate the radio and the infamous Sex Pistols break up not three months after the release of their first and only album.

Punk rock is giving way to ‘new wave’, a fancy avant-garde name for music made by anyone under the age of twenty-two.

Cost of living is up eight percent, and they’re on the brink of Thatcherism and war with every known labour union from Dunnet Head to Guernsey.

The Pope dies, then dies again. It’s a holy disaster. Not that any of them were paying attention.

They were eighteen.

Rock ‘n’ roll was God.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, British Newspapers did used to publish topless women in regular newspapers in an attempt to sell more copies. They called them 'Page 3 girls' and Linda Lusardi was a popular glamour model in the 70s and 80s.
A 'fuzz box' is an electronic device used to alter a sound of a guitar. Also called a pedal, depending on the type.
'Anorak' is someone with an obsessive love for something. Mostly synonymous with 'nerd'.
Dorcas calls Remus 'Bootsy Collins' which is a reference to the American bass player who was popular alongside singers like James Brown in the 1970s.
A 'slipover' is a sweater vest.
The song Sirius sings along to the jukebox is "Star Star" by the Rolling Stones, 1973.

I wrote the 'Hail Mary' lyrics myself.

OH MY GOD—we're actually in it now, lads! First chapter of gap year, and we only got eight left! Gap year passes more "quickly" than the others (obviously, lol) but I've a lot packed in, so don't you worry. Our boys are just learning how to navigate the world, and there will be a few wins and losses before they get it sorted.

Chapter 98: Boyhood Made Redundant

Chapter Summary

Surprise, Remus!

Chapter Notes

Look, I do NOT remember this chapter being so long, but I'm also a little rusty after a month away, so please let me know if you see any mistakes I can correct.

CW: for some homophobic language (name calling) and generally not-so-nice language courtesy of a few not-so-nice thugs. Also, drug use (alcohol and cocaine) and blood (everyone lives, calm down, pfft.)

See 'end notes' for list of songs in this chapter if you'd like to queue them xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes

What's your name?
Who's your daddy?
Is he rich like me?
Has he taken any time to show you what you need to live?

(Tell it to me slowly)
Tell you what;
(I really wanna know)
It's the time of the season for loving…

- "Time of the Season" The Zombies, 1968

After their stunt playing "Hail Mary" at the Shoestring, Remus had been sure Ray would've sacked them. He'd been clear—cover songs only. From a business perspective it wasn't unreasonable. Covers were easy, covers were safe. Covers didn't turn people off or cause them to look elsewhere for their drink and swill. Ray had taken a chance on them, Sirius especially. They were in the middle of a job crisis and Sirius Black looked about as rough as a prima ballerina when compared to the pub's usual crowd. However luckily, it seemed as though Sirius' centre-stage impudence had paid off. Rather than making them redundant altogether, Ray had flipped the script again when he'd not only granted permission for them to play their own songs going forward, but also declared the Marauders as the Shoestring's resident Saturday night band.

"I'm real stupid to offer this tah' ya," the manager grunted, after the bar had closed and they were finished wrapping up their gear for the night. "Ya never feckin' listen, and you play like a bunch 'a pansies to boot."

"That's 'cause you've only been letting us play Neil fucking Young!" Sirius objected. "Come on, Ray, let us show you what we can do. The crowd loved it, and we've almost got enough songs for an entire album now, all we need is a place to play 'em!"

"You don't even need to pay us!" James chimed in. "We'll do it just for the exposure."

Peter looked up from his pint; "You mean you guys have been getting paid?"

None of them knew it, but Ray had made the decision to give them the Saturday spot before Sirius had even finished belting the final line to "Hail Mary". Though not having to shell out any cash on a prime night gig was certainly a quick way to seal the deal.

That evening they'd driven back to Shepherd's Bush in Mr. Pettigrew's van, windows down and radio blaring. It was freezing out, but not even the North Wind himself could have touched them. They'd just been granted the one thing all new bands craved, short of a record deal—their first pub residency.

"FUCK YEAH! ROCK 'N' ROLL!" Sirius bellowed, leaning past Lily to scream out the front seat's open window while his hair whipped wildly around his face. In his haste to join in the celebration, James veered a bit too far to the right and quickly swung the Newspaper van back into the correct lane while a series of honks echoed from behind them.

"UP YOURS!" Sirius shouted, bestowing several vulgar gestures upon the neighbouring car until Lily had hauled him back inside by his collar and rolled up the window.

"Come on, Sirius, let's not lose our heads all at once now," she cautioned, despite the hopeless grin on her face.

“If not now, then when? Come on, Evans, I knew playing that song was a good idea!” Sirius cried, furiously drumming his palms on the back of James' seat.

“I still can’t believe he gave us the fucking residency,” Peter agreed, lying on his back on the floor of the van, one of Remus' spliffs tucked between two fingers. Remus sat across from him in the tight space, his knees forced up against his chest as he kept himself busy with a cigarette of his own. It was celebratory. Though better at containing it than Sirius, the constant thrumming in the centre of his chest was clear evidence that his elation was through the roof. A few hours ago he'd been looking at his friends with only a pipe dream in mind. Now they had a chance—a real chance! The success of their own songs meant that it wasn't just dreams anymore. Instead it marked their first step.

"You're mental, you know," he told Sirius, as James steered the van across Waterloo Bridge.

"You're just jealous you didn't have the balls to suggest it first. Just admit it was a good idea."

“I suppose one of your harebrained stunts was bound to pay off sometime."

“Yeah, that's right,” Sirius grinned; “Just you wait. First stop, Shoestring-on-the-Thames. Then we're off. Madison Square Garden'll be screaming our names in no time.”

As Peter snickered and Sirius took the chance to steal his spliff, Lily gave a yawn and turned around in her front seat.

“Glad to see you’re being pragmatic.”

“Pragmatic-smagmatic! Give us a few years. We only need like... four."

"Only four?!" Yelped James.

"Pfft—yeah! We could sell out Madison Square Garden in four years. It took Led Zeppelin five."

"Yes, and they're Led Zeppelin," Remus pointed out.

As if ready to prove him wrong right then and there, Sirius swung himself up from the van's only bench seat, accidentally slamming his head into Peter's crash cymbal as it teetered overhead. As his friends laughed, Sirius punched the cymbal indignantly and tossed Peter back his spliff.

"Fucking twats—We could do it! You think we couldn't? Bloody—Yes's just played four back-to-back shows in the place. If those geezers can fill the room, so can we!"

"You forget that we've played about ten shows in a room of only fifty people," said Peter. "Plus we don't even have one album—we don't even have a real demo."

"So let's get one! We've been saving for it, after all. Don't tell me you assholes have spent all your money on booze and women."

"Don't look at us," called James, car headlamps reflected in his glasses. "Everyone knows Moony's the real ladies' man."

"They come whether he wants them to or not," Lily giggled.

"Yeah, working at that music shop—bet he's got a lineup of girls just waiting for him to take them out," Peter added, unhelpfully. Remus scoffed at all of them, already bringing his cigarette back to his lips.

Sirius got there first.

Knocking his hand away, Sirius manoeuvred himself over one of their bulky amps with all the grace of an alley cat, not stopping until he'd slid either leg across Remus' waist and straddled his lap.

"Too bad," he mumbled, leaning in until Remus could feel Sirius' breath against his own mouth; "They're gonna have to get in line."

That was three weeks ago now. Since then, they'd played at the Shoestring as often as they could, basking in the limelight any time Ray allowed them to commandeer the stage. The rest of their days were spent at work, or else down in the basement, where they plucked and beat away at tired licks until they were either perfect or one of them eventually cried mercy. Eager to wow his newfound audience, Sirius had surprised all of them by purchasing a black upright Steinway piano off an elderly neighbour just up the lane. They'd risked a few toes getting the thing out of the old woman's flat and it was worn and in desperate need of a tune-up, but it'd come to them cheaply so none of them could complain. It took some warming up to, but eventually Sirius was rattling songs off the thing like as well as any ex-virtuoso. In the days that'd followed, he and James penned a number of new songs, adding melodies to Remus' lyrics—even the really horrible ones, which Remus wrote anyway because their inspiration was infectious. He liked watching Sirius work, he'd decided. As wonderful as it was to love him, their partnership with the band was something else entirely.

“There,” Sirius said, as he slapped a set of sheet music down over Peter's snare drum. “I think the intro should accent the beat more. You know, like the triplets in ‘Good Times, Bad Times’. A straight eight-beat is fine if you wanna be like everyone else, but we’re not everyone else, now are we?”

“Look mate, you’re saying a lotta words, but I just want it to sound cool,” Peter shrugged.

“Great, then all you have to do is play it like it's written.”

Peter did so, with no small amount of ease, and when he’d finished Sirius slapped him on the back, wearing a grin the size of a dinner plate.

“Amazing!” James exclaimed. “Prime stuff for a demo, I'll wager.”

“That’s what I’ve been saying!” Sirius urged. “What we need is to cut ourselves a real demo so that we can finally say goodbye to these bloody day jobs. I’m tired of scraping gum off of bar stools every night. We’re a rock band, and rock stars do not have day jobs. They have jobs they did before they were famous.”

“Sure, whatever, but first we’re gonna need studio space,” Peter chimed in. “And we’ve been looking, remember? No one'll give us the time of day.”

“Oi, what about that place near your work, Moony?” James called. “Regent or whatever.”

Remus looked up from his song book, almost stunned to silence by his friend’s blitheness.

“We cannot just walk into Regent Sound and demand they give us a studio. You… You need to know somebody! And then that somebody’s gotta know someone else and that ‘else’ better be George fucking Martin and half the bloody Beach Boys, otherwise we ain’t getting in.”

“Half of the Beach Boys, huh?” Sirius mused. He slumped back on the piano bench with a disinterested shrug. “Whatever. This is London—capital of the rock revolution. There’s bound to be some whacked-out nutcase willing to take us in. Just needs a bit of finessing. You'll see."

"Right," Remus replied. "On the subject of work… Didn't you say that you had a shift today, Prongs? It's almost four."

"Oh shit!" James hissed, practically tripping over on himself to get free of his guitar strap. "My manager's gonna kill me if I'm late again. Pete, you said you were gonna visit Moira, yeah? Think you can drop me off on the way?"

"Fine," Peter sighed, setting his sticks aside.

"Ace, thanks! Just let me grab my coat."

As James made a mad-dash for the basement's stairs, Peter, who was clearly in less of a rush, untucked from the kit and took a moment to stretch.

"Haven't seen Moira around much lately," Remus said. "You know you can invite her to a show, right?"

"I know," he replied sharply. "But a place like the Shoestring isn't really her scene."

"Well, I could've told you that," Sirius snorted. Pausing only long enough to roll his eyes, Peter eventually headed for the stairs, leaving them on their own. The basement door was an exterior entrance and let out onto the pavement, which meant they could hear the street noise until a heavy swoosh and whump of the door left them in silence again. Watching as Sirius dabbled his hands against the piano keys, Remus rubbed at the back of his neck.

"You should really stop ragging on him. You know he doesn't like it."

"Eh, it's good for him," Sirius said, as he stood and slowly drifted over to the sofa Remus was sitting on. The flat's last tenants had left it behind, and despite the fact that there was no telling how many people had gotten their end away on its thread-bare surface, they couldn't be arsed to get rid of it. It was a perfectly good piece of furniture, and they were still boys. A couch was a couch.

"I give it six months," Sirius went on, slumping across the sofa cushions with his head in Remus' lap. "The minute we get this whole enterprise off the ground, Thurnberg's gonna finally realise she's not interested in having a rock star for a boyfriend and bail."

“Or—Pete’s gonna get so pissed off he leaves the band, and then you’ll be out a drummer right before your first album records.”

“So you think we're gonna have an album in six months?"

“You’re such a dick.”

Sirius smirked devilishly, turning over to paw at the songbook Remus was half sitting on. “Shall we start on those lyrics of yours from the other day? I've no plans.”

“Wonderful. Unfortunately I do."

"What? With who?"

"Marlene. We're going to the cinema later. You can come too if you'd like."

"And spend the rest of my day playing third wheel to you and your ex-girlfriend? No thanks, I know how you two are."

"Come on, you wouldn't be playing third wheel. Mary's coming too."

"Not Dorcas?"

Remus shrugged. "Dunno. Marlene didn't say."

"Are the two of them not dating already?"

"I thought they were, but Dorcas is pretty tight-lipped at work. Last time I asked she said they were still getting to know each other—you know, in London. But Lily told me that Mary told her that Marlene's been staying over at Dorcas' place nearly every other night. Reckon it's only a matter of time now."

"Well," Sirius purred, as he pressed one hand to the centre of Remus' chest and slowly eased him backward along the couch; "I suppose we can just grill McKinnon today then."

It was that look.

The mischievous little smile Sirius got whenever he wanted something. It was dangerous, that look. If only for the fact that it made Remus want and crave such unholy things.

Urged on by the tug in his gut and the delight in Sirius' expression, Remus let Sirius fall over top of him until they were crammed chest to chest between the couch cushions. Sirius kissed him for a long while, until his tongue had found that place along the top of his mouth that turned every limb to jelly. When they came apart again Remus took either hand and used them to brush Sirius' long hair out of his face. His eyes were a glassy blue, like smoke at night, and he smiled while tracing a line across the hollow of Remus' cheek with just one finger. Upstairs, Remus could hear a phone ringing.

"I need that demo," Sirius murmured, running his finger upward to trace a path between each of Remus' freckles. "I can't stop imagining how it'll look."

"The studio."

"No, not the studio."

"The shows?"

"Nope."

"Then what?"

Sirius bit his lip, leaning in until they were nose to nose; "How good you're going to look on the inside of that album cover."

Remus breathed in and felt the air in every inch of his lungs—rising like anticipation. Without wasting any more time, he pressed forward, clasping Sirius around the jaw and neck as their mouths moved together in perfect tandem. Another second and he felt a hand in his hair as Sirius tugged him downwards, flush against him. They kissed deeply, without any of the hesitation that had used to follow them while they were at school. They were in their own home now; here they could kiss openly, at all hours should they feel the need. And Remus needed.

"Here—fuck, hurry up," Sirius urged, hastily pulling at the hem of Remus' shirt. They'd just started to get it off when the sound of the basement door scraping along the top of the stairs flooded the room, followed by an obnoxious shout from none other than James.

"Sirius! Oi, Sirius!"

"I swear, one day I'm going to kill the bastard," Sirius growled.

"Not if I beat you to it," Remus murmured, already chasing his lips for another kiss. Sirius gave it to him, dipping his chilly fingers below the waistband of Remus' jeans to scrape his nails along his pelvis. Remus' mouth dropped open as a reaction, and Sirius seized the opportunity to press one thumb inside, flattening it against his tongue. The pressure held for only a second until Remus had wrapped his lips around it, sucking in deeply while clutching tightly to Sirius' wrist. The gesture had Sirius biting his lip again, the fingers of his other hand slipping deeper beneath Remus' waistband as they slowly rocked against one another.

"Yooooo-hoooo, Sirius? I know you're down there, ya nob. Come on, Pete's waiting and there's a phone call for you."

Huffing, Sirius ripped his thumb from Remus' mouth and turned to shout at the stairs;

“We're busy, Potter—TAKE A BLOODY MESSAGE!”

“You sure? It’s Regulus...”

Face already scrunching up, Sirius dropped his head back toward the ceiling with a groan. Suddenly finding himself trying not to laugh, Remus pulled his shirt back down and wiped a thumb across the corner of his mouth.

“You should probably take that. 'Sides, he never calls first. We can always pick this up later.”

"You said we're going out later," Sirius complained. He might've given in to kissing him once more if not for the steady stream of irritated honks that'd followed.

"Damn it, Potter—"

“Shall I tell Regulus you're too busy doing the rumpy-pumpy with Moony to take his call then, or are you coming?”

“YEAH, I’M COMING! ... Coming to bash your head in.”

Another laugh, then; "You hear that Pete? I think they're shagging again.”

“Not on the drum set!”

The basement door fell shut with a clang, and Sirius gradually clambered off the couch and out of Remus' lap. After a bit more grumbling (in which Sirius stopped to mess with the tuning of James' guitar) they eventually made their way upstairs to an empty flat.

James had been kind enough to leave the phone off the hook for them, and as Remus made himself busy by clearing yesterday's dishes from the living room, Sirius pulled a stool over to the kitchen nook and gave Regulus a not-so-impressed hello.

“Dunno know what you’re worrying for," he mumbled later, absentmindedly picking at a scab along his knuckles; "s’just your A-Levels. I passed ‘em all with flying… I did! All of them! … Yeah, yeah, but you know Loughty’s full of shit anyway… Mhm… yeah… Tell Barty to kiss my arse. Don't let him start thinking that just because we got a few hundred miles between us now that I couldn't kick his ass... I could!"

As Sirius chatted away, Remus dropped the dishes in the sink and then came up from behind, kissing his neck and whispering in his ear.

“Gonna take a shower.”

“Mm.”

“You could join me after… if you wanted.”

Sirius looked up very quickly, but already Remus only shrugged innocently.

“Sirius? Sirius, are you still there?”

“Uh… yeah!” Sirius fumbled, switching the phone to the other ear. “Sorry, what was I saying? Oh, right—have you given any more thought to coming out here for the holidays then?”

“No,” Remus overheard Regulus scoff. “Unlike some, not all of us dream of being disowned.”

“Why not? Disownment is fun. Disownment gets you a flat in the middle of London filled with sexy bitches.”

Sirius eyed him cheekily, and Remus flashed a single smug wave before kissing the back of his hair and finally letting go. Swinging out into the hall, he took the stairs slowly, Sirius’ voice following him up.

“How's Sheila? You know you can tell me what it is you’re playing, right? … C’mon... Is it a guitar? … Hm… Clarinet? You have the look of a clarinet for sure… Oi, it’s a compliment!”

Remus smiled to himself. He wasn’t sure what the odds were of Regulus accepting Sirius' invitation to come stay for Christmas, but he hoped for both their sakes that he'd come around eventually.

Emerging onto the top floor that made up his and Sirius' bedroom and adjoining bath, Remus reached behind his head and stripped himself of his t-shirt, dropping it in the laundry bin behind the bathroom door. After testing the water (it always took longer for the water to get warm on the top floor) he hopped into the shower and pulled the curtain shut. The bath itself was a tiny thing, decorated with mismatched blue and yellow tiles. He had to tilt the shower head all the way forward just to get it to spray him at chin-level, but he wasn't exactly paying attention to shower height restrictions when he and Sirius had signed the lease. He spent most of his time in the shower eagerly anticipating Sirius' appearance, but when twenty minutes had passed and his boyfriend still had not shown, Remus shut off the taps and reluctantly stepped out.

Donning a pair of winceyette pyjama bottoms and a t-shirt, he made his way back downstairs, rubbing a damp towel over his hair.

"You really left me hanging there, Pads. What, suddenly not interested in shower sex?" Remus said as he emerged on the landing. "Had to whack one out on my own—"

He'd pulled the towel from his head just in time to catch Sirius sniggering into his palm. He was across the living room, sitting on the sofa with a coffee tray laid out before him, but he was not alone.

Remus felt his breath leave him instantly.

"Tom?"

"Might want to be careful, Lu," Tomny grinned. "Don't want to slip on the tile."

He was just the same as Remus remembered. Sandy haired, with wide shoulders and a slight upward tug at each corner of the mouth, indicative of how much time he spent smiling. He had a toothpick tucked between his teeth that he tucked behind one ear as he stood up from the sofa. He looked good, Remus realised—healthy even. No longer a haggard boy, his ruddy cheeks had been traded for sun-kissed dimples and a workman's tan. He was thicker in the chest and arms now too, no doubt earned from several months working those busy ports. But he looked happy. He looked good.

"Tom, you're... You're here."

"What?" Tomny drawled. "Not happy to see me?"

Remus glanced to Sirius, who met his gaze with one knuckle leaning against his bottom lip. His eyebrows rose into his hair, then his mouth; Go on, you fool.

An exhale left Remus all at once. "God." It's been too long. "I fucking missed you."

Tomny smiled, and just like that Remus had abandoned his towel and was rushing headlong toward his friend. Those strong arms caught him easily, and when Tomny clapped him round the back Remus felt it in his ribcage. Another hand came up, cradling the back of his head. Over Tomny's shoulder, Remus could see Sirius lounging back on the sofa and looking well-pleased.

“He came by while you were in the shower,” he said. “Thought it only best to invite the old dog inside.”

" 'Old dog', he says," Tomny chuckled, drawing away. Up close, Remus could see the whites of his eyes, clear and no longer reddened with fatigue. “He's been a gracious host, I should mention," he said, squeezing Remus by the shoulder. In answer, Sirius raised his coffee mug, while Remus tried his best to sort out what was happening.

“When did you get back into London?” He demanded; “And why didn’t you call first?”

“Oh, like you always did?” Tomny snorted, before flicked Remus on the forehead fondly. “Only got back into town last week, thought I’d make it a surprise. You did give me the address, ya remember?”

“Yes, but…” Remus held his forehead, feeling warm and buzzy all over. “Sorry, it’s just—you’re actually here!”

“Yeah, we’ve been over that bit.”

"You're in our flat."

"How times have changed." Tomny pet his hair, more heavy-handed than Sirius, and sighed wistfully. "Got some stuff to tell ya. It's good news."

"Really? Well, what is it?"

Before Tomny could start, Sirius stood up from the sofa, taking his and Tomny's empty coffee cups in hand. “On that note, I think I’m gonna pop out to the shops for a bit.”

Remus faltered. "Sirius—"

"Don't worry," Sirius replied, waving him off. He carried both mugs into the kitchen and set them in the sink. By the time he'd made his way out, bound for the front door, Tomny was nodding his head appreciatively.

"Thanks for the coffee, Sirius Black."

"Anytime, Thonas Armstrong."

The two shared a look Remus couldn't interpret, and finally Sirius turned away to lift his jacket off the rack by the door. Excusing himself for a moment, Remus left Tomny in the living room and followed Sirius to the front door.

“You don’t have to go, you know.”

“I know." Sirius reached for his boots, tugging them on. "But you haven’t seen each other in months. I’d just be in the way.”

“You’re never in the way.”

Straightening up, Sirius fiddled with his jacket collar for a moment, and finally pulled Remus in by the neck to kiss him tenderly. “Enjoy yourself,” he said after, their foreheads touching. “I’m gonna hit the shops, see if I can’t find that new Clash record. And I'll pick up some beers to replace the ones you drank.”

"Marlene and Mary are gonna be by later."

"Then I'll come back later."

“Okay." Remus smiled, softly. "Can you grab some sugar while you're at it? We’re out.”

Sirius pinched him, and after Remus had drawn away, he turned and opened the front door.

“Here’s hoping you didn’t waste all of the hot water. Think I’d like to have myself a shower when I get back.”

Remus didn’t miss the subtle innuendo, but by then Sirius was already gone, front door falling shut behind him. When he made his way back into the living room, Remus found Tomny standing by the bookshelves, squinting at the different covers.

“These all yours, I’m guessing?”

“Not all,” Remus echoed. “Some are Lily’s… or Sirius’.”

“He read lots too?”

“Sometimes, but he’s more picky.”

"And the others?"

"James can't sit still long enough to focus on a page. Peter... Well, Peter paints."

Tomny nodded approvingly, moving on to stare appraisingly at one of Lily's plants; a Christmas cactus she'd lovingly named 'Mary'. Watching him, Remus suddenly felt nervous. Tomny was in his flat, his home. It’d never happened before... It wasn’t as though he were suddenly worried about the nicks in the furniture, or that suspicious stain on the corner of the rug—after all, Tomny's flat had never exactly been tidy—but he wanted to impress him. He wanted Tomny to know that he’d done well for himself, and that he was happy and healthy too.

“You said you got back into town last week?" Remus asked, gingerly licking his lips. "What's kept you 'til now?”

“I’m a busy man. Hedge fund won’t run itself.” Smirking, Tomny came away from the bookshelf to join Remus on the sofa. “This s’a nice place. Nice neighbourhood. Didn’t even have to check my pockets on the way over.”

“Sirius found it. Used some of the money his uncle left him for the deposit. We all split the rent.”

"You working then?"

Remus nodded. "At a music shop over near Soho."

"Right." Tomny gestured playfully toward the stacks of records piled up around the stereo. “And your band? How're things going?”

“S'great!" Remus replied, perhaps a bit too enthusiastically. "We actually just got a residency out in South Bank right now—means we play there every week. It’s a local pub. You should drop by sometime, see us play. Bet you'd like it.”

“Bet I would.”

“You said you had something to tell me?" Remus asked, suddenly more nervous about all the talk had been of him. "Is it to do with Ipswich?"

Tomny licked his lips pensively. "It... started there, I s'pose."

"You're not going back there, are you?"

"What? Nah, don't worry. Couldn't pay me to go back to smelling like fish all day."

"Were the docks really that bad?"

"Nah, I'm just whinging." Tomny shook his head. "We mostly handled cargo, used to get boxes from countries I hadn't even heard of. A dock’s a dock, but I finally got paid summick reasonable down there, innit. Legal work even. You'd be proud, I managed to save up a bit too.”

“Save up for what?”

Tomny considered, drumming his hands lightly on his thighs. “Looking to get my driving licence actually. See about getting a car after that. I keep telling myself I’d go out and visit Doss on his little farm—his girl’s up the duff again."

"Again?"

"Yeah, but her dad's passed now so Doss's taken over everything. Bet he's going mental, what with another baby on the way and only a wife and sheep to talk to. I just reckoned that if I go out and visit enough, he'll name the baby after me.”

"Piss off," Remus snorted. "You don't want a fucking baby named after you. That's like... Well, s'like one step away from a bloody godfather."

Tomny's expression shifted, like thinly-veiled surprise, but it was gone a second later as he slumped back into the sofa with a hapless shrug. "I don't think being a godfather would be all that bad," he said, once again leaving Remus astonished.

"Shut up! Since when have you given two shits about children? No, I tell you, who are you and what have you done with Tomny?"

"I'm still the same ol' me, ya cheeky fucker. I'm jus' saying—a baby?

Now that's like... gotta be some sort of miracle."

"If a baby's a miracle then a fart's a sign from the Almighty."

"So you have no interest?"

Remus scoffed; "Say some barmy idiot does name you godfather to their child—what happens if they just up and kick the bucket? Are you gonna raise 'em?"

Tomny crossed his arms. "You saying I couldn't do it?"

"No, I'm saying why the hell would you want to?"

Tomny didn't answer. Instead he turned his head to face the kitchen, the tendons of his neck strained with unease.

"Lu, I have something to tell you."

He was leaning forward to look Tomny in the eye when he realised it, and instantly Remus was abhorred.

"No," he moaned. "Please say you didn't do it."

Tomny spun around; "Now Lu, I—"

"Doss asked you to be godfather, didn't he? And you fucking went and said yes."

"Wha—? No!"

"You big idiot, Tom! Doss' parents are dead, and now according to you, so are his girl's. What happens if something happens to them? You're roped in for life now. Supporting a baby and a candy habit at the same can't be good for anyone's formative year—"

"Will you just fucking shut up?" Tomny snapped. "Doss didn't ask me to be the kid's godfather—I'm trying to tell you that I met someone!"

Remus felt like he'd been punched in the throat. For a while, no words came.

"Y... You...?"

"Her name's Skylar. She's living wiv' me, back at the flat now."

"She... Skylar..."

As if taking his stunned yammering as permission to continue, Tomny sat himself up on the couch and reached forward until he'd placed a hand over Remus' forearm. Remus watched it from far away, feeling foolish. There had always been a train of girls that followed Tomny, especially when they were younger. He was as handsome as handsome came, even compared to those who'd grown up west of Aldgate. Much to the other boys' chagrin, he had even managed to catch the eye of a few upmarket girls over the years; but the shock of hearing that he'd gotten serious—that someone else had moved in with him? It rattled that empty space in the middle of Remus' chest, the one that'd been missing its matching piece for a while.

“We's met when I was over in Felixstowe," Tomny explained, smiling in what was probably supposed to be encouragement. "She was working at one of the pubs and we sorta... got on. She’s a nice girl—think you’d like ‘er.”

Like her? How could I ever like her, she’s not—

Remus stifled the thought.

“So, she… She likes you?” He tried. Tried.

"What, like it's so hard?” Tomny grinned, squeezing Remus' arm as a comfort. "I'm only taking the piss," he said. "But yeah, she likes me. When we met she’d never even been further than Ipswich… but she ain’t thick! Lush enough to be in the pictures, innit.”

He’s bragging, Remus thought; He’s bragging because he’s proud of her.

Maybe that was what stung the most. He’d always known that Tomny would move on and find someone else, but the hole in his chest still rang hollow. It stung. Ached. Over a year it’d been, and though he'd forgotten some things, the memory was still raw. He still missed Tonya.

"And, uh, Lu...? There's one more thing."

Remus looked down again, at the hand Tomny kept clasped around his wrist. His grip was even tighter now, as though letting go might mean an escape. It was then that Remus finally grasped what Tomny had been trying to tell him all along.

Oh no.

“It's Skylar."

Please, he silently begged; Please, please don't say it.

"She's preg—"

"God-FUCKING-dammit, Tomny!"

Remus threw himself up from the sofa instantly, about ready to run the length of the room. Maybe the entire flat. When that didn't happen he put his head in his hands and squeezed, hoping it might wake him up from the horrible nightmare he was having, or at least pop his eardrums so he wouldn't have to hear any more. It was insanity. Tomny—with a kid?!

"You've got to be joking me!" Remus cried. "PREGNANT?! You went and got a girl pregnant? Are you insane?!"

Tomny quickly scooted to the edge of the sofa, holding out an arm as if he could calm him. "Hold on there, Lu. This wasn't exactly planned, orright?"

"Yeah, that's pretty fucking clear! Honestly, how hard is it to use a fucking condom?!"

"Fancy that. I'm 'ere having a kid, and yet yer the one losing his shit."

"Of course I'm losing it—you're not responsible enough to be a father!"

"Shit, thanks for that."

"You're not old enough!"

"Not according to biology."

"And what the hell would you know about biology, huh?" Remus spat. "I mean, christ—how long have you even known the girl?"

"We met when I got into Felixstowe."

"That's less than five months, you lunatic!"

"Wow—really? Didn't realise that, since I'm clearly too thick to count!"

"CLEARLY!"

Tomny scowled then, falling back into the sofa cushions with a nasty scoff. “Whatever. Keep barking yer head off if it makes you feel better, but there ain’t nothing left for you to shout about that I ain’t already said to meself. The baby’s coming, Lu."

"Okay, so why're you here?" Remus demanded. "Why are you with me and not home with her—picking out bassinets and rubbing her feet?"

“Reckon it’s cause yer important to me,” Tomny shouted. “You fuckin’ knob!”

It took the wind out of his sails considerably, though Remus had always been a poor fighter when it came to his friends. He felt his anger crumble away, replaced by the guilt of lashing out so badly. Tomny clearly needed someone, and he’d come to him. Remus should’ve been grateful.

“Have you told anyone else?” He asked, face hot with shame.

“No,” Tomny replied, no longer looking at him. “Just you. I wanted you to hear it from me. I wanted... Well, guess it don't matter now.”

He'd ruined it then. Utterly fucking bollixed. Looking at Tomny, Remus was reminded of all the reasons why he never wanted to be a parent. After so many years of friendship, he'd just figured they were the same.

Slowly, Remus eased himself back down onto the sofa.

"I'm sorry."

Tomny grunted.

“I am. You said she…" Ugh. "So how far along…?”

Tomny spoke into his hand; “Baby’s due in April.”

“Oh... Shit.”

“Whaddya think,” Tomny murmured; "Girl or boy? Betting on a boy meself, but I hope s’a girl… Yeah, a girl would be nice.”

Remus hung his head. He wished he'd had something to drink, but Sirius wasn’t back with the beers yet—thank fuck—and so he settled for the pack of cigarettes he or one of the others must have left lying atop of the stereo. After fitting one between his teeth, he turned to Tomny and offered him his own. It took a second, but eventually Tomny turned back to him, accepting the cigarette as well as the flame Remus offered to light it. Only when the air was thick with familiar smoke, did Remus feel himself begin to ease. The fight had left him, though now he felt a bit like crying. Frustration, he realised.

“I used to think I was the one keeping you on your toes."

“You were," said Tomny glumly. "Pretty sure I have heart problems thanks to you.”

“Nah, that’ll be all the snow.”

Tomny shrugged, unable to argue.

Thumbing the cigarette filter, Remus took a deep breath. “I don’t see you for almost a year, and then you show up and drop this fucking bomb on me.”

A chuckle. “Nah, it was a bomb for me. For you... more like one 'a them cherry bombs Seesaw used to cook up in his dad's garage. He's got a job now. Working up in the Midlands in some mine."

Remus forced a smile, but it fell a second later when he turned to face Tomny for answers.

“But I thought you didn’t want kids.”

Now, Tomny turned to look at him.

“Now when did I ever say that?”

Despite expecting it, the question still caught Remus off guard.

"I just thought that..."

A beat passed, as Tomny nodded like he understood. "You're half right," he confessed, reaching forward to tap his cigarette along the ashtray sitting on the coffee table. “Maybe I didn’t picture it happening like this, but never? Nah. 'Sides, how else would I avenge them if not this way?"

"I don't understand," Remus replied; "Avenge who?"

"Us. Kids like us, anyway. Kids who—who grew up without a sod's chance in hell, because their parents had already given up."

It felt good to hear Tomny speak about them as though they were the same, but the guilt was already too heavy. Lee had made it clear the last time he'd seen him; we are not the same.

"Tom, you know you and I didn't grow up the same. Me? I don't have any right to complain. Not when you—"

"I ain't talking about fucking money," Tomny sighed. "Money may make the world go 'round, but it ain't what makes you a good dad, or a good mum. Now I know the odds aren't exactly stacked in my favour, but I figure that if I'm willing to try, then at least my kid won't be starting from nothin'. That they... Well, that they'll be better off than me."

It was an admirable thing, one that—if he were being honest—made Remus' heart twinge with envy.

"You're right," he breathed, almost a whisper. "They won't have nothing, not if they have you. You're worth more than..." Remus trailed off then, and picked up the only way he knew how; "You're my best friend, Tom. My brother."

It was as though all the anger and apprehension left Tomny all at once. His shoulders slumped, and after a sigh of relief, he leaned forward and wrapped his arms around Remus in comfort. "Oh, how I missed ya, Lu," he said, rotating between clapping and rubbing Remus' back. "I'm gon' make this work, you'll see. M'gonna get clean. No kid of mine's gonna be cleaning up after their shit-stinkin' father. And I'm gon' get my licence and join Burrin in the bookie league."

"Gambling?" Remus said over his shoulder. "You're sure that's legal?"

"Legal enough, innit. Gonna be a mess for a while—the lads are gonna be straight pissed—but my kid deserves more than a dad dealing dope out the back door. I'm just so glad I've got you on my side, Lu."

"I'm always gonna be on your side, Tom."

"Good."

They held on for a while longer, simply taking it all in at their own pace. Then a thought occurred to Remus.

"Fucking wanker!" He shoved Tomny away, playfully, and then reached for his cigarettes. Grinding out the first in the ashtray, he reached for a second, and offered it to Tomny first. "What d'you think you're even playing at anyway, Doss naming his kid after you? You're having a kid of your own, bloody name that one after yourself."

Tomny grinned as he lit the end of his cigarette off his own lighter. “Ah," he hummed, breathing out his first puff; "but I think the world deserves a few more ‘Tomnys’, don’t chu?”

They shared another laugh, this one more genuine, and afterwards Remus bit his lip.

“Now don't go crying on me, but I just wanna say... I'm happy for you, Tom—truly. You’re going to be a great dad.”

Tomny softened then, like he’d been waiting ages just to hear those words from someone. He probably had.

“Aw," he moaned, "that's it! Come ‘ere, you!”

There was a second hug, this one much tighter than the last. As Remus struggled to keep from dropping his cigarette, he heard Tomny's words rumble happily in his ear;

"And to think, I almost asked you to be the little sprog's godfather."

Remus dropped the cigarette. It burst with orange sparks against the couch cushion before rolling off the edge and onto the floor, where it was chased by the both of them, Remus with his hands, Tomny his boot. Remus got there first, but unfortunately for him, Tomny wasn't much slower; his boot came down hard, squishing both finger and ash against the wooden floor.

"Shit, sorry!" Tomny yelped, as Remus brought a sore finger back to his mouth. He wasn't bothered; he was too distracted. And rightly so.

"Me?" Remus echoed. "You wanted me to be the godfather?"

"Well, yeah," Tomny blanched, "but now that I know how you feel about it, I wouldn't ask that—"

"You don't know how I feel."

"Uh, yeah... I think I do," Tomny said, squinting at him. "Or was your entire rant earlier just some sort of figment of my imagination? Hard sell, that. Have'na done a line in two days."

"I-I know what I said before," Remus admitted, "but what if I changed my mind?"

"You've changed your mind?"

"I dunno. You haven't asked me!"

Tomny laughed, nodding brazenly at Remus as though he couldn't decide whether he wanted to hug him a third time or bash him upside the head. Finally setting his cigarette down in the ashtray ahead of him, he scooted forward on the sofa once more, both hands clasped together in anxious enthusiasm.

"Lu, would you consider being my kid's godfather?"

"I... Well, I'll think about it."

Tomny faltered for a moment, as though he'd been expecting a different answer and had to reel his excitement back in. To his credit, the smile never disappeared, and instead he nodded at Remus in understanding. "That's fair," he said. "I didn't think you'd give me an answer straight out anyway. You just think about it then. Reckon you got about five months."

"This is a bit mental, you know," Remus told him; "I find out I have a secret godmother and my best friend asks me to become a godfather myself all in the same year."

"Sounds like to me that yer on a roll."

"Suppose that's true too."

Tomny moved on from the baby stuff faster than Remus had expected. He regaled him with everything that had happened since they'd last seen each other. From Immingham up to Sunderland and back, it'd seemed as though Tomny had scoured half of the country's entire eastern coastline. He boasted sometimes;

"The sea was nice," he said. "You ever camped out by the sea before?"

Remus shook his head. "I've never been." Aside from that time he'd driven to Dover to rescue Sirius, that was.

"Really? Well, I'll take you. We can camp out on the sand, have ourselves a fire. You gotta be careful picking the spot though, once me and the boys had a bit too much and we's woke up with the tide lapping at our ankles."

"Only you, Tom."

And sometimes he complained;

“Bloody reeked in the mornings, before the tide came in,” he would say, “but then you started work and everything else just fell to the wayside. They use these huge cranes to get the cargo on and off the ships. By the end I was operating ‘em all on my own, and my boss? He even got me connected with a guy here in the city. Said he could get me set up with another gig soon, that’ll be great, eh?”

Remus kept on nodding, listening intently but also not at all. He was so happy to see Tomny again, but he couldn't help the fact that his brain was still wheeling.

Godfather. He could hardly believe it. It was not something he'd ever aspired to be, especially at eighteen, and especially not after discovering that he had a godparent of his own a few short months ago.

But it was Tomny, and Tomny had asked him! He'd asked Remus because there was no one else he wanted as his family's side than him. And after all that time spent wondering if he’d have just one more summer, one more day to be near him, suddenly the idea didn’t sound so bad...

The afternoon had become an early evening by the time Tomny stood up from the sofa and said that he should be getting back. Sirius was still gone, off on whatever shopping venture, and as he saw Tomny off from the door, Remus felt a sudden surge of adrenaline. The sane part of him knew that Tomny was a man of his word, and that if he said he was back for good then he meant it; yet still, Remus couldn't help the feeling. He was afraid that if he let Tomny walk out that door now, it'd be a long time before he ever saw him again.

“Hey Lu, I think you should meet Skylar,” said Tomny as he stepped out into the damp and chilly street. Pausing on the third stair, he turned back around and pulled a toothpick from behind one ear. Remus wanted to say that he was surprised by the request, but after today, he didn't think he was capable of being shocked anymore.

"You do?"

"Yeah. Like I said, she's a nice girl. And I'd like you to meet her... If yer willing."

"I'm willing," Remus nodded. "We'll get lunch. It'll be your treat."

Tomny chuffed, and fit the toothpick into one corner of his mouth. "Yeah, orright—my treat." He turned away, scooting down the last few steps. "I'll call ya then, princess! See if we's can't make a date around yer severely busy rock star schedule."

"I ain't a rock star yet!"

"Only a matter of time then!" Tomny called, saluting him as he walked backward toward the street. "Be seeing ya, Lu."

Remus almost let him go, but then a sharp wind came out of nowhere and licked up the back of his neck, and whatever metaphorical tightrope he'd been teetering on snapped.

"Tom?! One more thing..."

"Eh?"

"Yes."

Tomny squinted at him in the evening's dull light. "Yes, what?"

"I'll be godfather."

A car whipped past, cutting through a particularly nasty puddle and threatening to all but soak the back of Tomny's trousers. And it would've, had Tomny not already launched himself back up the stairs.

“Holy shit—Lu! I fucking love you!”

Spitting out the toothpick, Tomny slapped his hands around Remus' face and left a fat smooch on either cheek. He might’ve done more—like lift Remus' entire body up over his head in victory—had Remus not pushed him off first.

"I don't want you to think I'm making this decision on an impulse," he said.

"Who gives a shit about impulse?!" Tomny whooped, clapping him around the shoulders. “You said YES! Oh man—my sprog’s gonna be set for life!”

"You dick—"

"I love you," Tomny said, kissing him once more on the forehead, this time with an exaggerated mwah! "You're amazing. Bloody amazing."

Afterwards, Tomny pitched himself down the front steps, still singing Remus' praises and punching the air.

“Let’s just start with lunch,” Remus called after him. “I mean it, your treat!”

“Fucking—lunch! Yeah, orright!”

“And don’t get lost on your way home!”

"I love you! I love—you!"

"I..." Remus sighed. "I love you too."

He watched Tomny all the way to the corner, the kid about to be a dad, and when Remus finally shut the front door to the flat, he sagged against it. Bands, demos—now children?! What a fucking laugh his life was turning out to be.

Back in the kitchen, Remus drifted. He washed the leftover coffee mugs, dried them, and put them away. Then he scrubbed the sink, and after that he swept the floors, dusted every surface. He would’ve mopped, except they were out of detergent. Instead he dug around in the drawer, designated for miscellaneous rubbish and managed to find a can of 3-in-One to fix the squeaky hinge that had been plaguing one of the cupboards since they’d moved in. Afterwards he tested it, opening and closing the cupboard until the squeak inevitably faded. It felt slightly insane—manic—but he needed to be doing something. Finally Remus threw the cupboard shut; slamming the door with all of his strength. The dishes inside gave a rattle, and he swallowed the scream that was building up his throat. Tomny had only just gone, and he’d been happy for him! So why did he suddenly feel so hopeless?

Trudging back into the living room, he went first to the radio, yanking on the dial and watching as it scanned through each channel. Aside from a few comedy shows and the occasional radio personality caught mid-rave, all that was playing was the daily news summary and Radio 1’s Top 40. Remus tried to stomach it, but the national radio had been his enemy ever since he’d discovered that they limited decent music to John Peel’s late night sessions and Tommy Vance’s Friday Rock Show.

“And now it’s number thirty on—RADIO ONE, the new top forty!”

He’d turned on the radio to drown out any silence; and now to drown out the radio, Remus turned on the television. There was an advert for Pebble Mill, then some rubbish programme on cotton farming. With both noise-boxes going, he could hardly tell which was worse. X-Ray Spex or BBC1.

‘I know you’re antiseptic, your deodorant smells nice!’

“And now onto… Ajay P. Taylor looks at cotton—the fabric of an age.”

‘—I’d like to get to know you, but you’re deep frozen like the ice!’

The answer was that they were both intolerable. Curling in on himself, Remus tucked his head into the corner of the sofa and tried to let the noise sweep him away. Yet for all of Poly Styrene’s incessant bleating, he could not stop thinking about Tomny, Skylar, and the baby. Imagining the three of them living in the flat he'd once lived in with Tonya felt a lot like how it’d been to think of Sandra living at the estate. But that was stupid of course, since Sandra was his step-mother and had no babies and Tonya had only been his best friend’s girlfriend.

Remus punched the sofa cushion—Dammit! It was pathetic. Tomny had caught him by surprise, but how could this be such a problem? It wasn’t as though Remus was the one who’d run the girl up the pole. So why did it hurt so badly?

‘He’s a germ free adolescent,
Cleanliness is her obsession—
Cleans her teeth ten times a day,
Scrub away, scrub away, scrub awayyyyy!’

Curse the Queen Mother and her fucking BeeBeeCee.

There was a clatter as the front door opened, and Remus was on his feet in a second. He swung out into the hall, Sirius’ name already forming between his lips, but rather than his boyfriend, he found three girls making their way inside, nearly tripping over one another to get their shoes off.

“Hiya, Remus,” Mary said, shrugging out of a fabulous leather trench. “What’s all that noise now?”

“Nothing,” he flubbed. “I was… cleaning. Kitchen needed a scrub.”

“Did it ever,” Lily agreed, slipping past. She brought with her a large paper bag, which she set down on the dining room table. A second later the radio clicked off, and Marlene came forward with an armful of her own, this one in the form of a cardboard box. She set it aside to greet him, kissing his cheek warmly.

“No Lottie?” Asked Remus.

“Nah. She’s skipped town again to see Roger.” Marlene looked him in the eye then, and he knew she was reading his expression like a picture book. “Are you alright?”

“Fine. Had a long day.”

“Me too,” Mary interjected. “I swear this bitch of a professor at the conservatory has it in for me. Keeps singling me out in Diction lessons. Try telling her that ‘Rubber Baby Buggy Bumpers’ sounds vaguely dirty one time and it's like I’m on the bloody blacklist…”

"Mary's voice lessons aren't exactly shaping up to what she'd hoped," Marlene explained quietly.

Mary huffed; "Whatever. I'm only doing it to piss Daddy off. He's still hung up on me taking French." Without any more complaining, she flounced past the pair of them and into the living room with a box of her own. Now Remus was starting to get suspicious.

“What are those?” He asked Marlene, as she picked up her own box and carried it inside.

“Just a few things for the flat—Mary’s idea.”

“It’s just so drab in here!” Mary called, as she set her box down on the coffee table. Shrinking at the noise, she snatched up the television remote and flicked it off, clapping it into her palm as she surveyed the room. “Ugh. I knew we should’ve brought paint. This beige is simply vomit-inducing.”

“I told you, no painting. We still want our deposit back later,” Lily said, opening a third box of her own. Thankfully this one was filled with take-away.

“I thought we were going to the cinema, not redecorating,” Remus said, shutting off the radio with a flick of his hand. To him, the flat was perfect; the downstairs made up of a simple living and dining combo with wood floors and two front windows, short only a pair of curtains. Their furniture consisted of a table with six chairs, a sofa and a two-seater, along with the bookshelves, telly, and radio—plus enough albums to last them a decade. Lily’s plants had taken up most other surfaces and they’d even wrangled a dart board onto the wall that James had rescued from the local rubbish tip. Remus wasn’t sure what else there was to want.

“We’re just looking to spice the place up a bit,” Mary said, opening her box and withdrawing several plush throw-pillows. “My driver Henry will be over later with more if you’d like to help us drag them inside.”

He didn’t, only because he was in a bad mood, and so Remus plodded back over to the sofa, where he collapsed on top of Mary’s new periwinkle pillows. They didn’t match the sofa by any means, but he could already see her pulling out fabric swatches to compare.

“James is supposed to be back before five,” Lily said, while she and Marlene arranged the take-away boxes across the table. “Remus, can you go fetch Sirius?”

“Can’t. He’s gone out to the shops.”

“Oh. Any idea when he’ll be back?”

“Nope.”

“Remus, what do you think?” Mary held up her sofa swatches. “Leather or synthetic?”

He shrugged, not caring, and Mary frowned, before setting both hands on her waist.

“Oh no, you’re upset.” She tipped her head back. “Ladies, we’ve a crisis on our hands. Remus is in distress.”

“I’m not in distress,” he grumbled.

“What’s the matter?” Lily called. "Remus, what's wrong?"

“Nothing’s wrong!”

“That’s a lie,” Mary persisted. “Poor baby Remus. Having a bad day, are we?”

“Mary.” Coming forward, Marlene tossed a glare in her best friend’s direction, before gently prodding Remus’ arm. “Is there really nothing bothering you?”

“No, it’s fine. I’m totally—”

“You can tell us, you know,” Lily piped up. “Whatever it is, we won’t be upset.”

“I don’t know what you’d have to be upset about!” He snapped. “You’re not the one having the baby…”

A collective gasp went up around the room, and the girls were on him in a second—their faces pressed so close to his that Remus felt himself go cross-eyed.

“Remus, you got a girl pregnant?!”

“You cheated on Sirius?!”

“What were you THINKING?!”

“Not me!” He wailed, throwing his arms up to ward them off. “It's Tomny!”

The girls eased immediately, their expressions stunned nonetheless.

“I thought you said that he was still in Ipswich,” Lily prodded gently.

“Well, I thought he was,” Remus amended. “He came over today—said he met someone… Now I guess the girl’s pregnant.”

“Shit,” Marlene winced. “Are they gonna keep it?”

“Guess so.”

The girls exchanged a look and even began whispering to one another in hush, while Remus began bitterly picking at a hangnail on his thumb. He didn’t feel like going mental over the kitchen cupboards anymore at least, but then again, he didn’t want the girls feeling sorry for him either.

“Look, it isn't like I’m just gonna fall to... What's that look for?"

All three girls were staring at each other. Remus recognised it instantly; they were having a telepathic moment, the kind only other girls could understand. He'd seen it enough times back at school, but then he usually had one of the other lads to back him up. Now he was outnumbered.

"Mary," Lily nodded, "go get it."

With a little giggle, Mary shot across the room toward the stereo.

"Wait—what’re you doing?” Remus demanded, as the other two took his arms.

“Just come on!” Lily grinned, while she and Marlene hauled him to his feet. Across the room, Mary was rapidly flicking through the collection of LPs. When she found what she was looking for, she slipped the vinyl disc from its sheath and tossed the remaining cover across the living room with a happy shout. The cover was a diamond blue blur in the air, but Remus still understood.

Oh no...

"We know exactly what'll make you feel better, Remus," Marlene told him.

"No, please—mercy."

"This is mercy!" Lily laughed. "How can you be sad when you're dancing with your friends?"

“That's right," Mary shrieked happily, as she bent over the turntable with the record in hand; "Remember, Remus, there's an ABBA song for everything!”

“Aw, for Christ’s sake—”

"Come on, Remus, dance with us!"

"Yes, dance with us, Remus!"

He probably could’ve said no if he'd really wanted to, but they were looking at him with those big doe eyes, and the sound of Lily’s new ABBA record was already sailing out across the room from the stereo’s speakers. First the Spanish guitar, followed by rapid piano. Then the sheer embarrassment.

‘Chiquitita, tell me what’s wrong,
You’re enchained by your own sorrow;
In your eyes, there is no hope for tomorrow…’

Remus groaned, and still the girls pulled him into the middle of the living room—Marlene pushing the coffee table aside for even more space. By the next verse they were singing, and though he longed to push them away, they were smiling too big for him to bear it.

“Chiquitita, tell me the truuuuth,

I'm a shoulder you can cry on,
Yoooour best friend—I'm the one you must rely on…"

"Guys, this is embarrassing!"

"Just let it happen, Remus!"

"You were always sure of yourself,
Now I see you've broken a feather. "

Marlene grinned, and Remus shook his head adamantly.

"No, no—I can't!"

"Yes, you can! Dance with us, Remus!"

"Yes, Remus—dance!" Mary declared, returning to her box of treasures and pulling out a vibrant feather boa of all things. Remus thought himself safe when she wrapped it around her own neck, but then she pulled out a second. He all but gaped at her, and as the chorus began, she simply spun round and tossed it over his shoulders. Lily squealed, clearly ecstatic, and by then they were done for.

"Chiquitita, you and I knoooow!
How the heartaches come and they go—
And the scars they're leaving!
You'll be dancing once again,
And the pain will end,
You will have no time for grieving!"

They swung him about the room, feathers flying, and while Remus mourned his pride, he did not stop them. Lily held one hand, throwing it skyward, and after she swung into his chest, demanding he dip her. Remus did—and then Marlene dipped him.

"Chiquitita, you and I cryyyyy!
But the sun is still in the sky—
And shining above you!
Let me hear you sing once more,
Like you did before,

Sing a new song, Chiquitita…"

Laughter. They were laughing. It was contagious, and it went on again for an entire second verse. By the time they'd made it to the end, Remus was out of breath from letting Mary lead him around by the boa, dodging the girls' impressive swings and kicks. He tried to sit, but they pulled him in for the final verse, draping themselves across his arms and back as though their legs had all suddenly given out.

"Tryyyy once moooore, like you diiiid befooooore!
Sing a new song, Chiquititaaaa…"

Just as he was threatening to collapse under their combined weight, the girls let out a tremendous giggle and shot upright. Holding him by the boa, they spun around some more as the music slowly filtered out. Every step and skip remained on beat, even as the front door opened and the sound of James' warm tenor cut through the music.

"Evening, ladies! Guess who I ran into on the way home."

"Moony, I remembered the sugar!"

A second later, James and Sirius rounded the corner, muttering something about the smell of Chinese. They stopped on the threshold, clearly surprised by the show, and while James opened his mouth to laugh, Sirius crossed his arms and sagged sulkily against the doorway.

"No fair. Why's he always get to have all the fun?"

* * *

Later that night…

The week before, following an argument with Peter over the evening's radio channel, Remus had gone out and spent his entire paycheque on a second radio. Sirius had had no qualms—he installed the device in their own bedroom, knocking aside one of the lamps just to fit it on their bedside. Nowadays the room was almost never silent. If one of them was home, the noise was on. Blondie, the Clash, German synth —none of it mattered, so long as it kept the quiet away. And while Remus listened to his radio, Sirius sat across the room on the cosy sofa chair they'd left in the corner, quietly plucking away at Sheila's guitar. Working at the pub had turned him into even more of a night owl, and he claimed his best work was now written alongside the burning midnight oil. Not that Remus ever minded.

Reaching over to the radio, he turned up the volume;

"—And for those folks who are just now tuning in, that was XTC with their new single 'Are You Receiving Me?'" The disc jockey droned; "In proper news, I see the Nipple Erectors have transmogrified themselves into simply, 'The Nips'. I assume it's some sort of attempt to win over the playlist committee. This device will not—I think—work, but perhaps it will get them a few more plays on the ol' airways. Before that though, we interviewed legendary producer Gaz Spectre in our studio earlier this week. Now we bring you that brief recorded clip."

Remus brought his cigarette to his lips, listening as the DJ's single voice became two;

"Now Gaz, we've talked for a while about your signed acts, but what about the future? Can you tell me, what is it Spectre Records is looking for in a fresh band?"

"Well, you know I ain't looking for any old act, John. Any plod off the street can pick up a guitar and play, what I'm looking for is a phenomenon. Someone who can just up on that stage, and make it their own. It's my job to make the music sell, anything less ain't worth my time."

"You heard it here first, folks—Gaz Spectre doesn't sign bands, he signs phenomena."

As the DJ switched back over from the record to live feed, Remus shook his head. Phenomena—what a load of shit.

"There's nothing I love more than getting legends in my studio seat," the DJ announced. "Now I'm wondering, will the Nips be that phenomena Gaz is looking for? I'll leave that up to you to decide, dear listener. The Nips, 'All the Time in the World', coming at 'chu next."

Polishing off his cigarette, Remus ground the stub into the ashtray next to the bulky radio set-up and lit another, before dropping back into his pillows. Outside, the nightly rain pattered their bedroom windows while the remnants of punk shot out from the radio speakers at a moderate volume.

‘Now it’s all over, I’m sorry baby, my brains are in my pants,
You know I’ve got my eyes on you, I’m looking for a chance!
All the time—all the time!’

A baby, he kept thinking. Tomny is having a fucking baby.

‘So lie on your back and think of England, and I’ll put my hands on you,
I’ve been dreaming on your picture, baby, creaming over you!
All the time—all the time!’

“I like this one,” Sirius said. “ ‘Cream all over you’? Now that’s modern romance.”

Setting the guitar aside, he came forward, sliding onto his side of the bed like a cat. When he was close enough to reach, Remus pulled Sirius into his chest until he was spooning him from behind.

“Did you finish your song?” He murmured.

“Nah. Couldn’t quite work out the bridge.”

“I’ll help you tomorrow.”

“Mm.” Sirius grabbed his wrist, tucking the end of Remus’ cigarette between his lips and taking a long draw. He let it go a second later, and Remus watched the smoke drift up toward the ceiling and disappear.

“Got the fright of your life today, didn’t cha?” Sirius said. Not seeing a point in hiding it, Remus had since told him everything. The others as well.

“I dunno… you turning up on my doorstep last summer might still take the cake.”

“Hey, at least I called first.”

Remus smiled, and relaxed into the pillow again. Sirius took another drag, and then left tiny smoke-caressed kisses along the inside of his wrist.

“I just thought we’d have more time,” Remus said. “You know… to be kids. Yobs. I just wanted to have fun. But he’s living in another world.

Always has."

"Just because he's growing up, doesn't mean we have to. We've still got plenty of time to be yobs."

"You'll never be a yob, Sirius."

"Now that's pure classism."

They both laughed, quietly, and Remus buried his nose in the back of Sirius' hair.

"Guess I should get over it now. How long until you figure James and Lily are up the duff?"

"Not long at all, considering we keep nicking the condoms from their toilet."

"You told me that you bought those!"

"It's November—practically freezing out! You really want me to pop off to Boots' every time you're feeling a little bit randy?"

Remus shook his head. "You're hopeless."

"Probably."

Behind them, the radio kept going.

' It don't really matter what you wanna say, 'cause I know that I've got—
All the time—all the time in the world to make you mine!
All the time—all the time in the world to make you mine!'

Only half-listening, Remus spared a peek downwards at Sirius. He'd stolen his cigarette now, and was smoking it quietly in the dim-lit room while Remus simply watched him, eyes trained on the trio of moles behind his ear. Just below that, the neckline of Sirius' t-shirt had been stretched badly, revealing the cut of his collarbone. Carefully, Remus let the hand he had wrapped around Sirius' middle trail downwards, until his fingers had slipped just beneath the shirt, brushing against his abdomen.

"Guess this means you're not exactly feeling tired yet," Sirius said. Remus heard the smirk in his voice.

“Are you?”

A pause for consideration, and then Sirius was flipping himself around —bringing one leg up on Remus’ other side until he was straddling him. He pushed his hair back, sucking on the end of the cigarette.

“Go on then. Take off your shirt, rock star. If you're good I'll cream all over you too.”

"Wow. How did I ever get so lucky?"

* * *

It was the following morning, a Saturday. Only hours before they’d been having mind-blowing sex to the soundtrack of X-Ray Spex, and even had a gig at the Shoestring to look forward to later that evening. Aside from that, all Remus had planned for the day was a great sack of nothing. Though apparently no one had thought to tell Peter that. He was wailing on their bedroom door in what appeared to be a varying level of distress, though all Remus did as he stirred was toss a pillow across the room in objection.

“Lupin! Black! Fucking Christ… wake up already, got something to tell you!”

As their friend kept hammering away, Remus blinked awake to the feel of Sirius’ forearm draped across his bare chest. He then received a swift elbow to the gut as Sirius used said arm to push himself up into a sitting position.

“Ugh… Fuck off, Pettigrew!” He barked, stifling a yawn.

“You fuck off! It’s past nine and some of us have jobs to get to, so do us all a favour and get your ruddy arses down here so we can explain.”

“Who died?” Remus called, peering over at Sirius. “Better not have been anyone we know.”

“I hope it was my mother.”

Remus smacked him. “Stupid.”

“No one died,” Peter huffed. “But my dad said we're not allowed to use the van anymore."

"What? Why?"

"If you come downstairs maybe I'll tell you… And don't forget your trousers this time!"

"Fine, we're bloody coming," Sirius grumbled. "And don't tell me what to do with my trousers!"

There was some grumbling, and then finally silence as Peter's footsteps retreated back down the creaky staircase. Listening to him go, Remus yawned himself and stretched back into the sheets. It'd been far too hot in the room the night before, even for November, (though that was probably their fault) and so they'd slept with the window cracked. Now the noise of traffic seeped into the room along with the midday sun, which cascaded through the curtains they'd forgotten to close and highlighted every muscle along Sirius' pale back. He glanced back just in time to catch Remus staring, and then fell back into the pillows with a graceful fwump!

"Since when did Peter Pettigrew start getting so mouthy?"

"Peter's always been mouthy," Remus replied. "You just gotta shut up every once in a while to hear him."

Sirius opened one eye to glare at him, and then cracked a smile. "Aw Moons, I think you were drooling in your sleep again."

He touched one finger to the corner of Remus' mouth and Remus quickly knocked his hand away.

"You snore."

"I do not."

"Mhm. You snore like Mary."

"I'm going to tell her you said that. See if she won't claw your pretty eyes out for me."

Remus snorted and pulled back the covers, swinging his legs over the side of the bed. He was naked save only his pants, though he hardly had to worry about that anymore. It was almost funny to think about; only a year before and he and Sirius had been playing hide-and-seek in their own dorm room. Dancing around James and Peter so as to keep their relationship from being discovered. And now there they were, sleeping starkers in a bed they shared. Bliss, actually.

“And just where do you think you're going?” Sirius hummed, wrapping his arms around Remus from behind. He left several kisses along his shoulder, slowly making his way up the side of Remus’ neck, and then to his ear.

“We’ve places to be, apparently,” Remus said, already looking around for his shirt. Undeterred, Sirius caught his jaw and tilted his head back a second later, giving himself further access to Remus’ neck and throat.

“Mhmm… let the tossers wait a bit longer… kay?”

They did, but not any longer than necessary.

“Right, so what’s this about not having the van anymore?” Sirius called as they emerged on the downstairs landing. He was still pulling his shirt down over his head, but James and the others were already dressed, busy shoving pieces of toast into their mouths. Lily had about half a dozen textbooks open on the kitchen table, but she still waved good morning as they came in and offered Remus a cup of coffee.

“Dad called,” Peter said, attempting to fix his tie in the hall mirror. He never got it quite right. “He said that they’re expanding the printer’s workshop into a second location and they need the extra car to cart the supplies back and forth.”

“But we’ve got a gig tonight. What are we gonna do without it?”

“Marlene said she might know someone we can borrow off of,” Lily said, handing Remus his coffee. “But it’s not a for sure.”

“Guess we’re taking it on the tube,” Remus sighed. It was a sarcastic quip at best. No way they’d be able to lug all of the amps and instruments over to South Bank on foot. They’d probably be mugged before they even made it across the river.

“We could just cancel,” Peter said, having given up on the tie. “It’s only one gig.”

“No way!” Sirius whipped his head around to look at each of them. “I work at the Shoe, I know how it goes! Ray's old Saturday night group have already found themselves a new drummer now they're looking to get their spot back. We give it up and they could sweep our residency right out from under us like we did them.”

Peter sighed in relief as Lily came to his rescue, righting his tie and kissing him on the cheek. Afterwards he rounded on Sirius again, looking a lot like a bank teller in navy and white.

“Do you have any other suggestions then? Or maybe you’ve been keeping a four-wheeler tucked up in that bedroom of yours that none of us know about?”

“We can get one!” Sirius snapped. “There’s that used car lot over in Acton. I’ve got some leftover cash from buying the flat, we’ll just pick out some old banger that still runs—easy-peasy!”

“Except the gig’s tonight and meanwhile we’ve all got work,” James said, replacing Peter in front of the mirror and trying desperately to coax all of his hair into the same direction. He looked very smart in his waiter's uniform, but the untameable Potter locks had never quite fit the look.

“Not Moony!” Sirius rushed over to him, smacking Remus on the back fondly and nearly upsetting the cup of steaming coffee. “Moony’s got the day off—he can go! I’m sure he can pick out something reasonable.”

Remus frowned. “You’re going to make me go on my own?”

“Aw, what? Is wittle Moony afraid of the big, bad car salesmen?”

“I’ll go with you, Remus,” Lily offered. “My class today got rescheduled, so I was just going to do some light revision anyway."

"That's light?" James asked, glancing at the stack of texts.

Lily ignored him; "Come on, Remus, why don’t the two of us go spend Black’s not-so-hard-earned cash?”

Remus smiled at her, and Sirius clapped his hands together in approval.

“There then. Evans and Moony’ll go, and then you two’ll be back just in time to help ‘em shove the gear into our new set ‘a wheels.”

James shrugged, finding no fault in the plan, while Peter picked up his suit jacket and started for the door.

“I would’ve liked to go,” Peter frowned. “We all have our licences now, after all.”

“You can design the logo that goes on the side,” Sirius said, patting

Peter on the arm in consolation.

Once James had kissed Lily goodbye, he and Peter gathered the rest of their things and left for the day. Sirius was out not long after, having picked up a double shift at the pub. As Remus saw him off in the front entryway, Sirius passed over a thick envelope.

“It’s some of what was left over from buying the flat,” he said, reaching for his coat. “Monty suggested investing the rest, but I kept a portion for emergencies. Should be more than enough for a down payment on some beater.”

“What about the rest of the money we’ve been saving? Shouldn’t we use that?” Remus said, peeking inside to find several dozen fresh notes.

“Don’t be thick, that money’s for the demo!”

“I know, but… feels a bit bad that you should have to pay for the car too.”

Sirius waved him off. “It’s only money. Use what you’ve got, right? Just make sure it runs before you sign all the papers.”

“I have been driving longer than you have, you know.”

Sirius smirked. All ready to go, he kissed Remus goodbye and muttered a quick ‘Ta!’ slipping out the front door. Remus had already turned away when Sirius stuck his head back inside, grinning keenly.

“Oh, and Moons—make sure you get us something cool.”

Remus flipped him off, lovingly, and Sirius finally left. Not long after, he and Lily piled into their coats and followed.

"Think we should get some lunch on the way?" Lily asked. "I’m starving," Remus pulled the money envelope from his pocket. “Why not? Sirius is buying.”

They hopped the bus from the flat over to West Acton, and since there was not much for street vendors in November, popped into a local egg and chip place for a quick bite. By the time they were strolling up to ‘Harry’s Deals on Wheels’ Remus was still wiping the salt from his fingers. The lot was dressed up in a thick array of streamers and balloons, with banners strung up everywhere that read things like ‘Sundance Special’ and ‘Ask About Our 100% Warranty!' When the salesman spotted them through the office window, he leapt out of his chair in an instant and came strutting out in a tacky pinstripe suit, rubbing his hands together like a cheat who'd just found the easiest hit of his life.

“Hellooooo there,” he crooned. “Welcome to Dan's Deals on Wheels. I'm Dan the car man, but you can just call me Dan."

"Not Harry?" Lily asked, pointing to the dealership sign.

"We're rebranding," Dan said. "Just a little change in ownership. Harry's moved on. Now is there anything I can help you young folk find?"

“We’re looking to buy," Remus said. "Second-hand, preferably.”

“Of course—of course. You've come to the right place for that. I'd love to help you out—you two seem like a couple ‘a nice kids. Let me guess, newlyweds?”

“Uhm, actually—”

“Yes!” Lily answered, elbowing him sharply. “And we’ve got a baby on the way so we’re looking for something sensible. Preferably within our budget.”

“Of couuurse. If you’d so kindly follow me, I’d love to show you this week’s sweet, sweet deals! And congratulations on the baby news, by the way. Brilliant stuff!”

With a wave that clearly meant ‘follow me’, Dan sauntered off toward the back of the lot. The pair of them rushed to keep up, and as they turned a corner into the rest of the auto yard, Remus spun on Lily, only mildly embarrassed.

“Oh, so we’re married now?” He whispered. "When were you going to tell me you were pregnant?"

Lily scoffed fondly. “Christ, Remus, have you never haggled? Just let me handle this.”

They followed the sales guy around the yard for a while, letting him prattle on about things like mileage and tire pressure. He’d just shown them their third powder-blue Ford Cortina when Lily finally piped up, explaining that they were looking for something with more room.

“More room?” Dan echoed.

“Yes, you see Remus hopes to use it for work. He’s a plumber. Dirty work, you know.”

“Oh. Of couuuuuurse! In that case, follow me.”

“Plumber?” Remus whispered. “Now you’re just having a laugh.”

At that, Lily did indeed giggle.

They let the salesman traipse them up and down the lot for a half-hour longer, going through each van’s specs like Topps trading cards. Remus followed along, letting him spit his auto jargon, but once Dan realised he wasn’t going to get much out of him, he quickly leaned into Lily instead.

“This here Ford Transit’s in excellent condition, ma’am! Only sixty thousand miles. Did you know that ten years ago, one in three vans in Britain were a Transit. Very reliable model!”

Lily ducked her head out of the front seat. “What do you think, darling?”

Remus was standing off to the side, arms crossed with a thumbnail tucked between his teeth. Somewhere between the Ford Cortinas and five seconds ago he’d become distracted. If they’d asked, he wouldn’t have been able to tell them what the last five models had been.

“Darling? … Remus!”

“Huh?”

Lily gestured to the van. It had the words ‘Low Financing!’ painted across the windshield.

“What do you think of this one?”

“Oh. S’fine…”

Exchanging a quick glance with the dealer, Lily smiled and touched his pinstriped arm. “Dan, do you think we could have a few minutes to talk it over? I’m afraid it’s all a little overwhelming.”

Remus heard it coming; Of cour—

“Of course! I’ll just be inside, checking over the paperwork. Come on over when you’re ready.”

He bowed out gracefully, ever the epitome of a crook in a good suit, and once they were alone again, Lily wandered over to Remus with a knowing look on her face. She kept her arms crossed, but nudged him lightly with her hip.

“Remus…”

“It should be raining,” he murmured, glancing up at the sullen sky. “It's always raining now.”

“Alright,” Lily huffed, marching back to the Ford Transit and yanking the passenger’s side door open. “In. Now.”

“Why?”

“Just get in!”

Lily had to practically push him into the seat, but eventually Remus climbed in and sank back into the nylon upholstery. She shut the door after him, before going around to the driver side and getting in herself. The interior smelled of soot and exhaust, veiled thinly by the scent of lemon aerosol. It was nice enough, with five seats and plenty of room in the back for the band’s gear, but Remus hadn’t been thinking about the van or the band for a while now.

“You’re worrying again,” Lily said, placing both hands on the steering wheel. “Don’t deny it—I can see it on your face. So spit it out already.”

“Lils—”

“Is this about what happened with Tomny?”

Remus turned his face to the window stubbornly. He didn’t want to tell her, it was too embarrassing. How to explain that coming to a used car lot with her had reminded him so strongly of Tomny that he wanted to vomit. Even with Dan’s incessant monologue as the soundtrack, all Remus could picture was Tomny and pregnant girlfriend, sweeping up through the aisles of other beater cars, looking for the one that might one day carry their child. It’s only money, Sirius had said—not for Tomny. He would spend every penny he had, and it still might not be enough. He didn’t have rich parents, or dead uncles who’d left him money. He had back-breaking work and illegal ventures and a fucking family to raise—

“I’m sorry, Lils.”

Lily sighed, but it was with understanding.

“I was shocked too, when you told us. Don't get me wrong, he's dead kind, but I didn’t really get the impression that Tomny was of the ‘fatherly sort’.” She twisted her hands fretfully over the wheel, and then finished with a simple shrug. “But then I sorta thought to myself, who am I to say that? He’s got so much love for you, I’ll bet he could be a great dad if he tried.”

“I don’t think I want to meet her,” he confessed. “Skylar. I said I would, but… I’m afraid I’ll hate her. Is that wrong of me?”

“No, it’s not wrong of you. He was your first love.”

Remus almost startled. He grabbed the seat rests tightly, as if the gesture could strangle the very thought out of existence.

“Tomny wasn’t—”

“Remus.”

Releasing hold of the steering wheel, Lily reached over with one hand and covered his with her own. Remus stared at it, so small and Lily-like. It almost burned.

“It’s alright,” Lily said, with a squeeze.

“I don't love Tomny. I’m in love with Sirius.”

“Not all love is the same, you silly boy. You can be in love with Sirius and have loved Tomny. Love isn’t some finite thing like that.”

“I dunno if Sirius would agree.”

She sighed then, smiling, and slowly pulled his knuckles up to her lips for a gentle kiss. “Hopeless, you two are. Sirius knows you love Tomny, Remus. He’s always known, and he loves you despite it. He couldn’t ever resent you for it—trust me, I know. He’s told me himself.”

“He has?”

“What, you think he and I don’t talk?”

“Well, I…” Remus cleared his throat. “Maybe you’re right.”

“Of couuurse I’m right,” Lily drawled. “I know these things. And besides, you’re already in love with me, aren’t you? You better be. After all, we are married now.”

“With a baby on the way to boot.”

“Tomny’s got nothing on us,” she grinned. “What shall we name them? I like Sophie, for a girl. Or Eleanor.”

“Eleanor’s nice,” he said, mostly to humour her.

“And for a boy?”

Remus glanced out the window at the dealership’s sign.

“Harry…?”

Lily laughed. “I like Harry.”

He laughed too then, and after Remus reached across the front seat to take Lily’s hand again.

“Dunno what I’d ever do without you, Lils.”

“Worry yourself into oblivion, probably.” She snorted once more before opening the car door and slipping out. “Now c’mon, we’ve still got a van to buy.”

Taking a second to glance around the interior, Remus followed her out. It was getting late in the afternoon, and James and Peter would be home in a few hours and probably starving for supper. Plus, Remus wanted to revamp their setlist before that evening’s show.

“There was that Econoline from earlier,” he recalled, coming around the front of the van. “Didn’t look terrible. Do you remember the price of it?”

“No, not that one. The inside had a funny smell."

"They all have a funny smell."

"Well, yes, but I think that one's leather was rotting or something.” Just then, Lily let out a sudden gasp, her arm shooting up to block Remus’ path. “There!” She cried. “That’s it—that’s the one!”

He looked up, following her gaze. The ‘one’ in question had not been on Dan’s original tour, and Remus knew why straight away. It must’ve had a half a million miles on it, rusted to all hell. Remus would’ve been surprised if the engine even turned over.

“That’s the one?” He echoed. “You're sure? It’s… Well, it’s certainly something.”

“It’s better than something,” Lily beamed; “It’s perfect.”

* * *

Sirius gaped. “You didn’t.”

“We did!”

“But why?”

“Because!” Lily clapped. “It’s wonderful! Potter, tell him how wonderful it is!”

James looked up from the basket of cables he’d just hauled out of the van’s back. “Sorry, Daisy. I told you he wouldn’t like it.”

Lily scowled lightly, before stepping forward and hugging the body of their new vehicle, though—'new’ might've been a bit generous. It was a Volkswagen Transporter—a first generation, with dull silver hubcaps and more than enough rust decorating the door frames. They’d gotten a deal on it, considering all four tires had been flat as a balloon and the mileage was less than to be desired, but luckily Dan the car man had a 'Tom the tire guy' right up the street from the dealership. Remus had been initially hesitant to buy it, but he’d started seeing the upsides the moment they got it out onto the road. Unlike the news van, the Volkswagen had seats enough for all of them, and Remus’ head didn’t touch the ceiling when he sat up front.

“I think it’s marvellous,” Lily insisted. “Tons of bands travel like this nowadays, and now everybody’s gonna know exactly who it is whenever you pull up to one of your gigs!”

“Yeah,” Sirius hissed. “They’re gonna go, ‘here comes Marauders in their nancy-mobile.’ I mean, come on, Evans—it’s bloody purple!”

Remus had to agree with Sirius there. The colour was certainly in your face enough; a bright electric purple with white rims. The bus's hood ornament was missing from its front, leaving behind only a faded outline of the iconic 'VW', but... it was cheap.

"Here," he said, handing Sirius the leftover cash in its envelope. "Buy yourself something nice to make up for it."

"Maybe I will," Sirius grumbled, pocketing the money. "Like a fucking Ducati. God knows we're not getting anywhere in a reasonable time while driving this thing."

With a stern grunt, Peter hopped down from the back of the van and practically shoved James' amp into Sirius' arms. "Considering it's here and we have a show to play, maybe you could help us get the rest of this gear inside and worry about your van's paint job later, hey?"

Amp in hand, Sirius spun away and stalked off, muttering words like 'bloody purple' and 'so lame' under his breath. Lily was shaking her head at him, but it was James who laughed as he shut the van's doors.

"Don't worry, he'll come around the moment he realises this van's much more conducive to shagging."

"What a keen observation, Prongs," Remus said, shouldering his guitar case.

"It's got the shag carpeting for it," Peter sniggered.

"Honestly, you boys." Huffing, Lily went after Sirius, and together they lugged the rest of their things into the pub. There they found the Shoestring's regular Saturday night hustle waiting for them, complete with several friendly welcomes. More and more regulars were starting to take notice of them these days, and with every new gabbing mouth, their odds of stumbling across that golden opportunity seemed to be creeping closer and closer. Remus knew—all it took was the right person. After all, it'd been Brian Epstein who single-handedly raised the Beatles up from underground Liverpudlian clubs to the world's stage, and all he'd done was take a cheap chance on one of their shows. Demos and deals aside, the Marauders needed their own Epstein, and the best way to find that was to make more noise than anyone else.

And if there was one thing the Marauders were good at, it was making noise.

“Busy tonight,” Remus said as he peered over the jam-packed bar.

“Some local group was having a football match just up the road. Guess they’re out and looking to drown themselves now,” Sirius explained, while plugging in his microphone. He went to the pub’s rolling piano next, which looked worse for wear but still played in tune. It always took Sirius a few minutes to psyche himself up before taking to the keys, but even he couldn’t deny the dimension it brought to their music. Songs like “Downtown Girls” just weren’t complete without it. And Sirius glowed—absolutely glowed when he was playing.

“Alright, come get your juice,” Ray called, appearing at the edge of the stage with a tray of drinks. They may not be getting paid for the shows, but there was never a shortage of free beer. While James and Peter rushed them, Remus held back and nudged Sirius on the arm.

"Beer, Pads?"

“Be there in a sec,” Sirius answered. “Got this tune I wanna get it down on paper before I forget it.”

Remus nodded, understanding, and watched as Sirius pulled a tiny notepad from his pocket. He was rarely without one these days. He set it on the piano’s shelf and kept the pencil tucked between his teeth as he gently tapped the piano keys. He couldn't hear it over the busy bar —doubted Sirius could either—but he knew Sirius would play it for him later if he asked.

Dropping down off the stage, Remus scooped up his gin and tonic minus the tonic and joined his friends by the girls’ usual table. Lily and Marlene were loyal and came almost every Saturday—Mary too so long as she didn’t have a date. Lottie was getting harder and harder to pin down these days. According to Lily she’d taken a leave from her secretarial program to stay with Roger in Reading, a horrible decision in Lily’s mild opinion. Remus hadn’t bothered to point out that while Lottie was living with one man fresh out of school, she was living with four. He had a feeling Lily wouldn’t have appreciated the jest anyway.

“I don’t know why you’re being so stubborn about this,” Mary was ranting. “If you’d just come and live with me then we’d have loads more fun than whatever’s going on in that bloody dosshouse.”

“It’s not a dosshouse!” Marlene countered sharply. “It’s a shared flat, no different from the boys’ place. And it’s nice. We all work together too, and downstairs there's this single mother who—”

“Your mother would have a heart attack if she saw the state of the hall toilet.”

“And an aneurysm, what’s your point?”

Mary groaned; “You’re impossible.”

Remus mostly tuned out after that. He was used to the renting debate where Marlene and Mary were concerned. For them, it was an ongoing crisis. Marlene wanted her independence and Mary wanted to keep her friend close; neither of them were wrong, just simply not in agreement.

Eventually Dorcas appeared, surprising him. She was alone today, though Remus had come to like Kingsley well enough. He was a real whizz on the sax—Regulus would’ve loved it. They’d gone down to see his group play at Ronnie Scott’s several times since meeting him, and Sirius had just about jumped at the chance to chat-up their pianist. It's all about collaboration, he'd told him.

“Didn’t know you were coming tonight,” Remus said, as Dorcas knocked her glass against his in lieu of a greeting.

“Why? Was I uninvited?”

“No—I only meant…” he sighed with a chuckle. “You know, you really need to stop doing that.”

"Busting your balls, you mean?" Dorcas smirked, sipping her drink. “Heads up, you’ve got a few wannabe skinhead pricks over by the bar. They’re hounding all the girls, and talking a lot ‘a shit about the band.”

Immediately Remus looked up. It wasn’t hard to pick out the group she was talking about. Those sorts tended to travel in packs, but even a few of them could be deadly enough. Tomny used to say that for every one skinhead, there were two steel-capped boots. For now, Remus counted twelve boots. They’d congregated near the large tables at the back, and were making more than half the bar’s usual noise.

“Sirius said a local match got out up the road,” he grumbled. “Must’ve come from there. They didn’t say anything to you, did they?”

She waved him off, clearly indifferent. “If I stopped to entertain the likes of every racist prick that crossed my path, I’d never get anywhere. They’re losers, don’t bother yourself.”

It didn't sit right, but even if the group seemed to be not much more than teenagers themselves, it was still early. Remus wasn't quite looking for a fight yet.

When it was finally time to take to the stage, Sirius took over with all of his usual vigour. They used to have to introduce themselves before they started, but nowadays people already knew who they were. They didn't want long-winded introductions, they just wanted to jam. So Marauders opened as they usually did; with a cover that was guaranteed to get people into the mood. This time the song they'd chosen was slightly out of their comfort zone—a funk rock number that'd been stuck in Sirius' head for days.

"Once I was a boogie singer,
Playing in a rock and roll band!
I never had no problems—yeah,
Burning down the one-night stands…"

There was the laughter—not directed at them, but rather at Sirius' ridiculous show—and that really got the rest of them going. While James wiggled his hips suggestively, Sirius sauntered up and down the tiny wood panelled stage like he owned it, dressed in a white singlet with a neckline that dipped so low it might as well have been hanging past his leather-clad waist. He reached forward into the audience for Marlene, who made a play of fainting into Dorcas' arms, while Mary leaned past her for a kiss. Sirius gave it to her, and every other girl in the room shrieked in envy. Remus didn't mind, it was all part of the gimmick.

"Yeah, they were dancing and singing—
And moving to the grooving!
And just when it hit me,
Somebody turned around and shouted—

Play that funky music, white boy!
Play that funky music riiiiight!
Play that funky music, white boy,
Lay down the boogie and play that funky music 'til you die!"

James loved the guitar solo. Not to be one-upped by Sirius and Mary, he polished it off with a kiss of his own that left Lily red from top to bottom. Yes, Remus decided, after watching the way the crowd rocked and flowed to the rhythm like a single sea; I can get behind funk.

On the outro, Sirius played it up, thrusting his mike out to the audience. They were delighted; their singing loud enough that the speakers managed to pick up the entire room. It really was just that good.

"Play that funky music!
Play that funky music!
Play that funky music..."

Each of them were sweating by the time they'd finished, but no one noticed. It was part of the show.

"You guys really know how to rock with it," Sirius applauded into the mike. He was received by his usual cheering, the occasional friendly heckler, but today the crowd was extra rowdy. As Sirius launched into the usual spiel and preamble, he was joined by jeering voices from the back of the pub.

"Is this all the Shoe's guid fer nowadeys?" One of the teen thugs barked. "Bunch 'a sissies singing on a stage?"

"Yeah, what happened to fine drink and piss all?" Called another.

"It pissed off," Sirius drawled; "Though if you're really that interested, ladies, I hear the spritz is to die for."

More laughter went up, as it often did when Sirius got the better of his hecklers. Very rarely did these things bother him, and even rarer still did their noise ever become louder than his microphone.

"Bloody poofter… Oi, did yer mum make you that skirt?!"

"No, yours did. Turns out she's a real wiz at multitasking. Don't know many other birds who can wank a guy off while still managing to keep her lips 'round my prick the entire time!"

The guffaw grew, and though Remus was enjoying himself, he could tell Sirius was stomping on thin ice. The crowd's amusement quickly died down as the skinheads got louder—shouting obscenities until Ray was bristling behind the bar. Sirius gave it right back to them ten-fold, the microphone imbuing him with confidence, but if he kept it up much longer, they'd probably end up getting jumped on their way home. Luckily James was often the sensible one. He stepped up to Sirius and whispered in his ear, playing his role as anti-devil's advocate. Unluckily, Sirius had already had about five beers and enjoyed getting the better of people worse than himself far too much.

"Oh, what's that, Potter? You're saying we shouldn't tell them their sisters called? That they already have dates this weekend? Damn. Looks like you're out of a shag tonight, lads!"

"Fucking ponce! Fucking shitebag!" The thugs wailed;

"I'll gut cha!"

"You and your pet ponce start high-tailin' it back to fucking Canterbury!"

"Fucking do ya in, I will! Straight batter ya!"

"All of youse!"

The room was a clamour after that, with strangers leaping to their feet to defend their house and house band. It was frightening, but not even the threats of real gangsters could deter Sirius. Drink or not, on stage he was king. He was untouchable. It didn't matter how English they were—this king never backed down from a fight.

"Wanna start throwing names, lads?" He shouted back. "Alright, why don't you try meeting us outside and see where that gets you? That is if you're done suckin' each other off behind the rubbish bins!"

Fists pounded the air in threat, each of them eager to get a piece of the mouthy boy.

"I'll break yer fucking legs, ya nasty poofter! Let's see ya try twirling around like a bloody fairy then!"

With an angry cry, Sirius charged the front of the stage. He might've gone after them too, fuelled by the drink, had James not grabbed him round the waist. As it was, all he could do was kick out like a fitful bronco as the other men handled their assailants. Still behind his kit, Peter had started up a rolling beat on his snare drum that made every pulse in the room hammer, while the girls remained off to the side of the stage, protected well-enough by the crowd but still looking nervous and uncomfortable. Deciding that he'd heard enough, Remus unstrapped his bass and jumped down from the stage. He'd crack the poor thing over the first sucker's head if need be.

“Yeah, fuck you too!” Sirius was shouting, having lost hold of his microphone. “Your mum’s seen more bell-ends than weekends, fucking wankers!”

It was chaos for a while, until Ray and a couple of the burlier guys from the kitchens came out wielding field hockey sticks. They waved them at the skinheads but never actually got close enough to take a whack, that would mean retaliation.

“Get out of my pub! Get the fuck outta my pub!” Ray was screaming. “Go—GO! Fucking beat it, before I call the cops on all ‘a you sorry excuses for men!”

There was more yelling, but the room had come together with Ray as its figurehead. Eventually the thugs were ejected by a group of working men, already hardened by years of dealing with smart-assed hooligans just like them, but not before the group’s ringleader had turned and pointed directly in Sirius’ direction.

“I’ll be lookin’ out for you, queenie!” He hissed. “I’ll kick yer fucking head in!”

“Oh yeah?! Well, up yours, shitebag!”

There was hooting—for Sirius or the promise of a fight, Remus wasn’t sure—but the men left, and finally everyone inside could pause for a much needed breath. It took several minutes for the crowd to settle, and by then Ray had stormed the base of the stage and grabbed hold of Sirius’ pant leg, furiously shaking him back and forth like an idiot of a rag-doll.

“My pub!” He barked. “My bar! Whatchu think you’re on about, hey?!”

High off of his own idiotic show of bravery, Sirius swallowed an obvious smile and looked out over the crowd, which was hanging on every word. Most were probably still hoping to catch a glimpse of their promised violence, but savagery or no, they couldn’t look away. They were starved of him.

Sirius grabbed the mike.

“Rock and roll, am I right, fellas?”

For a moment there was nothing, and then—just like that—they all lost their minds. The crowd cheered until Ray had no choice but to release them. They wanted more—of Sirius or the violence, it didn't matter. People simply mobbed closer, until the stage was surrounded and Lily and the others had to fight just to remain nearby. Women, men—all of them wanting a piece of London's newest and stupidest rock band.

On all accounts, it was their best show yet. They reopened with a Black Sabbath cover, because it was loud and the crowd wanted to be heard. The floor shook along with the thump of the bass, and James was a powerhouse on his guitar. Sirius didn't just sing, he belted, and for the first time, Remus could see people sing along to more than just the covers. Their own songs were starting to catch on, and hearing the lyrics in that tiny pub on the Thames, Remus imagined what it might be like to hear them sung by a crowd of thousands.

Glorious, probably.

"I still think you're absolutely mental—going after those guys like you did," Mary said after, as they were climbing off stage with their entire upper-bodies soaked in sweat. "They're like cue balls with teeth. If they wanted to, they could've snapped you in half."

"I thought it was hot," Dorcas retorted. "If not also completely stupid."

"It was hot, wasn't it?" Sirius teased, attempting to sling an arm around her. Dorcas dodged it, but Sirius recovered easily when she handed him a fresh beer instead. Heart still racing from the set, Remus thought he might just pass out if he didn't get out of the sweltering room.

"I'm gonna step out for a bit," he told Marlene. "Fancy a fag?"

"Yeah, be out in a sec," she replied, slipping away to join the rest by the bar.

Making his way outside, Remus pulled his cigarettes from his pocket while he set to joining the pub's usual nightly rabble. The usual regulars stopped to congratulate him on the set and a couple even offered to buy him a drink or two. He humbly rain-checked, content to just stand back and have his cig, and it was a relaxing enough break until a loud bout of obnoxious jeering caught his attention. Glancing down the pavement, he managed to spot the same jerks from earlier all crowded around each other outside the pub's corner entrance. Apparently Ray's threat was enough to get them out of the bar, but not gone completely. The thugs were smoking and generally doing piss-all, but every time a pub patron accidentally stumbled too close they got the same nasty treatment as the band had. Girls were whistled at and taunted, while anyone deemed too old or ugly to shag were abused with various obscenities. It made Remus' blood boil.

Now, now, his foul little voice said; What would Tomny do?

Nothing, he's too busy shopping for nappies and baby bassinets.

But what would the old Tomny do? Those fuckers came after your mates.

Yeah... they did.

They did! And you know the rules—no one comes after our mates. Maybe it's time to pull up your sleeves after all, nancy-boy.

Despite the chill, Remus did just that. It could've been the beer, or the joint he'd smoked on the ride over, but all of a sudden, all he wanted was a good fight. An excuse to vent his anger. He felt ashamed for not coming to Sirius' defense, and angrier still for reasons he couldn't quite place.

Weaving his way through the crowd of smoke and people, Remus stopped only when he was standing a few feet behind the first burly sack of shit that had shouted at them earlier. The group was yammering on about something, but Remus didn't bother to eavesdrop. Instead he flicked his cigarette butt away and tapped their main antagoniser sharply on the shoulder. He spun round immediately, looking up at Remus as though he were a very tall piece of gum he'd just scraped off the bottom of his shoe. He already had a shining bruise on the top of his cheek, which Remus could only assume made him feel very tough.

"Whaddaya want?" The bruiser grunted.

"You were inside earlier."

"Yeah."

"Wasn't a question."

The skinhead scoffed; "You got sumffin' you wan' say to me, pansy-shit?"

"Only that I remember you. You and your mates said some nasty things about my band. And my friends."

"Oh yeah? And whatchu gon' do about it, ya fuckin' pillow muncher?"

“Nothing. But I think you owe us an apology.”

The look the guy gave him was incredulous. Too bad Remus was pretty sure he couldn’t have spelt ‘incredulous’ to save his balls.

“I’ll tell ya,” he spat, “you fuck off right now, mate, before I put your head through this ‘ere brick wall.”

Remus smirked lightly. By now they’d amassed a small crowd of onlookers. He knew that the tussle from before wasn’t already forgiven, but that didn't mean that the crowd wasn't looking forward to seeing him get trounced by a bunch of teenage skinheads.

“You're right, s'my bad,” Remus amended. “I’ll go. Before I do though, mind if I pinch a fag, mate?”

“Nah, I ain’t telling ya again—fuck off!”

Remus raised his hands in surrender, but just then one of the other skinheads stepped forward, face wrinkled with a look of mischievous delight.

“I’ll allow it,” he said. “ ‘ere. You sure got a pair on ya, don’t chu? For a skinny poofter…”

He plucked the cigarette he’d been keeping behind his ear and offered it to Remus, much to the chagrin of his friends. Remus accepted, and then turned back to the first dosser, eyebrow raised.

“Got a light?”

Either to save face or because he was looking forward to beating the shit out of him afterwards, the thug acquiesced and handed Remus a metal lighter. As Remus lit the cigarette, he leaned in with a nasty look on his face.

“Hey, since we’re mates an’ all now, think you could hook me up with one ‘a them girlfriends ‘a yers? Usually I’d go for the ginger, but that fucking queen singing on stage weren’t half bad either!”

It was practically an invitation. While the others howled in laughter, Remus flicked the zippo shut and held it out. He smiled—his whole face—and when the guy went to take the lighter back, he dropped it between his feet.

“Whoops.”

“Fucking prick, whadda ya think yer—”

Remus drew a hand back—and drove it straight toward the bruiser’s nose. There was a crunch, then a very noisy grunt, as the guy flew backwards into his friends. They caught him—barely—but it was enough to ignite the feud. Instantly Remus was surrounded, but he knew where he was. The Shoestring was a rough crowd, and most of its patrons were just as itching for a fight as the rest of them.

It became a brawl in less than five seconds. Fists were flying, and Remus caught more than one of them upside the head. He got in several fine shots on the bruiser, who—despite being barrel-armed and thick in the chest—was at least a head shorter. All Remus had to do was pull back in time to avoid his shots and bring his fist up in an arc the way Tomny had taught him when he was twelve.

Punch and dodge, Lu! And watch them elbows—deadly they are!

He wasn’t sure where the memory had come from; he could barely recall it over the swarm, but the moment he did, the thought began to slip away. Like that inevitable stone beneath water.

“JUST WHAT DO YOU THINK YER DOIN’?!”

It was Ray. With a field hockey stick clutched in one hand, he grabbed Remus by the collar of his shirt and hauled him backwards—out of the fray built of clubbed boots and back toward the pub doors where his friends were waiting for him. They caught him, and Remus found himself hauled back inside the Shoestring before he could blink. A crowd had formed around the doors, but James and Sirius pushed right through them to where Lily was waiting with a rag in hand. She forced it up under his nose, practically sucker-punching him herself, and Remus pulled away, wincing, before realising that he really was bleeding from both nostrils. It smarted a bit, the rag, but not enough that his nose was broken.

“Christ, Moony! Are you trying to get yourself stabbed?” Sirius gasped.

“No,” he said through the scratchy fabric, “I leave the stabbings for Mondays through Thursdays, obviously.”

“Check his shirt, just in case,” Peter shrilled, gesturing downwards to a small tear in Remus’ t-shirt. Sirius was on him in a second, yanking it up to reveal a small slice in his abdomen. It wasn’t anything serious—a surface wound at best—but it was clearly a slash from a blade.

“You fucking idiot!” Lily wailed after. “You—You absolute bollocking imbecile!”

“What she said!” Sirius cried. Unable to help it, Remus smirked into the rag. He could hardly feel his injuries, and he’d only sort of been knifed. As far as he could tell, he was up.

“Rock and roll, am I right, lads?”

They all stared at him, before finally breaking down into little fits of their own. Even James had tears in his eyes from laughter, and Peter howled so hard he stumbled into a table and knocked over several glasses. Only Lily didn’t seem to find it funny, though that was to be expected.

Ray got everything handled eventually, and allowed Remus to remain despite the fight and his better judgement. They still had one last set to do before the night was over, but his hockey stick combined with the crowd of loyal pub-goers had been enough to drive the thugs away. No need to even ring the bobbies. Which was good, considered Remus was only half sure the Shoestring had a valid liquor licence at all.

“You’re trying to ruin your nose again, I know it,” Lily chastised, as she drew a wet napkin across Remus’ face to get the blood off. “You should know that the NHS doesn’t cover nose jobs.”

“What do I need the NHS for when I've got you to snap it back into place for me?"

She smacked his thigh, and then turned back to the bar top to grab the bag of ice as Sirius handed it to her. “Stupid boy.”

“That’s me.” Remus ran his tongue across his upper lip, tasting copper, and then glanced sideways to find Sirius staring at him, a bottle of gin in one hand. “Shall I fetch you a camera?”

“I’m trying to decide if it was attractive watching you lose that fight, or pathetic.”

“I didn't lose. It was a draw."

"That's what losers say."

"And? Have you decided?"

At that, Sirius didn't say anything. He simply smirked and leaned over the counter, rolling his tongue in Remus' ear. "If only Jillian Stewart could see you now," he said. "She'd have jumped your bones leagues ago. As it is, I'm already holding back."

"Clearly," Lily snapped, reminding them of her presence. Remus snorted then, which hurt his nose, and Sirius followed it up with another scandalous purr, silenced only by Mary's arrival.

"That's quite enough of that," she said, perching herself on the bar stool on Remus' other side. She snapped her fingers and Sirius poured her a shot of Haig, along with one for Remus. "I can't believe it. A girl leaves to go to the lav one time and she misses all the action."

Having finished tying off the ice bag, Lily pressed it against Remus' face and made him yelp. "Fuck—ow? ... Thanks for that, Lils."

"It's your own fault. Idiot."

Remus turned to Mary. "Where's Marlene?"

"She left," Mary replied, polishing off her shot and swiftly raising her fingers into singular air quotes; "With 'Dee'. Didn't even stick around to watch your rousing show of masculine foolishness."

"Don't be jealous just 'cause McKinnon's getting some tonight and you're not," Sirius said. Mary rolled her eyes, and just then James and Peter came to join them, having collected their leftover pints from the table near the stage.

"Think you're gonna be fit to go on stage again, hey Rocky?" James asked, passing Remus his half-empty pint. "Or should we let you go a few more rounds with Ray first?"

Remus took the drink, finishing it in a single go, along with the shot Sirius had poured him.

"How 'bout you try putting 'em up, Potter?" He retorted after, wiping his mouth.

"Oh yeah?"

James cackled as he raised his fists, jokingly sending several shots toward Remus' busted face. Remus retaliated with his left hand, still holding the ice against his mouth and nose with the other, and eventually Sirius and Peter had joined in, leaving them all bouncing around the bar like a bunch of kooks. Mary and Lily reprimanded them fondly, but even they were distracted enough not to notice the stranger that had approached them from behind.

" 'ello there, lads!"

The fun died out immediately and Remus watched as Sirius stopped playing at feeding Peter a knuckle-sandwich and shot upright. When he spun around on the bar stool himself, Remus found a stout little man grinning back at them. He was wearing a brown suit over a horrendous paisley shirt, and was so bald that the top of his head looked like one of the shiny cue balls that were always going missing from the Shoestring's billiard tables. He might've fit in with the earlier group of thugs, had he not been about twenty years too old and three feet too short.

"So this is the Marauders!" The man exclaimed, much too eager for Remus' liking.

"Actually, it's just 'Marauders'," Sirius said snidely, making James and Peter snigger into their beers.

"Ah, I gotcha. Like 'em 'Talking Heads'—very mod." He paused long enough to rub both hands together, showing off the golden rings he wore on both pinkies and thumbs. "Marauders… hm, yes… Well, I've 'eard plenty about cha 'a course. Not much gets on round 'ere without ol' Fletch hearing 'bout it. And what I 'eard is that you four are the freshest things since sex, drugs, and rock 'n—blood. Blimey son, you know yer bleedin', ey?"

"Am I really? Why didn't any of you tell me?" Remus grumbled, pressing the rag tighter to his nose.

With his obvious accostment out of the way, the stranger turned to the rest of his friends and continued to look them all over, like a fat hyena with a fresh carcass.

"I was told this was the place to find new talent. 'Shoestring on the Thames'—s'got quite the ring to it. Classic origin story, stuff! Let me guess. There's four of ya, so… I'll wager that you must be Sirius Black?"

"What gave it away?"

"Something about the look of ya!" He gestured to Sirius' leather trousers and lack of functioning shirt sleeves. "Like a tight little Don-juan wrapped up in all the right duds!"

Sirius peered at the rest of them. "A what…?"

"I'm sorry," James cut-in, "but do we know you?"

"Oh! Apologies, where are my manners…" The stranger snapped his thick fingers before taking the gin bottle and pouring himself a drink in Mary's leftover glass. "Doug Fletcher, at your service."

It didn't tell them much, and so Peter's brow creased as he stepped forward. "And you're a friend of Ray's?"

"Weeeeell, I wouldn't go that far. He and I only met today, innit." Grinning again, Fletcher knocked back the shot neat and fumbled to pull a card from his suit pocket. It was a simple thing; reasonably business-like with his name all embossed and an office address and the words 'A&R Manager, EMI Records' written across the front in bold lettering. When Remus read it, he just about fell off the bar stool.

"You see, I represent the arts and repertoire for a very reputable record label," Fletcher went on. "It's my job to head out into the world —ontae the 'scene', if you would—and find the next big thing. And I think that you boys might just be that next big—massive—thing."

Peter and James peered over the business card together, mouths hanging open so far they were practically drooling. When Sirius snatched it from them, it was with great astonishment.

"You represent EMI?" He demanded, almost white-knuckling the business card.

"That's what the card says, don't it?" Fletcher poured a second shot, but this one he didn't drink. Instead he just held it up ahead of himself, like he were CEO of a multi-million dollar company, negotiating over a fine glass of sherry.

"Now I'm tellin' ya, you lads come on the scene at a pure, prime time! Music's 'a changin' an' the studios are starving for some fresh sounds. Sham 69, The Undertones, Pistols—all of em, young guns, just like you! Heh—no pun intended. But they're the ones changing the scene, right? The rest of the industry, they're all doing the same thing. Radio hacks, I call 'em. All synth this, electronic that. But real rock—now that's sex itself. You heard 'a Van Halen, eh? How 'bout Whitesnake? Cock Sparrer? Or Christ—what's the new one… The Police!"

“Aren’t they the group doing all that white reggae?” Sirius asked, while the rest of them exchanged a dubious glance. “Might as well ask us to jam with the Dire Straits. Fancy being the next ‘Sultans of Swing’, lads?”

“Alright, forget the bloody Dire Straits!” Fletcher hissed. “Too folky anyway. My point is—you’s already got the songs, I ‘eard ‘em. Great stuff! Bleedin’ hits in the making! But more importantly, ye’ve got the look! And ‘tis look that I can sell. I mean, hell—I love it! You’re visceral—seismic! Caustically likeable! People want fresh—gritty. Punk rock’s backsliding, and all ‘a us wee folk are tired of the huge stadium bands. We want new fish, and you lads are it, I’m telling ya. You’re like little unsung entertainment juggernauts!”

“I dunno, they just sorta seem like a bunch ‘a virgin nobs to me,” Mary said, making Lily snort into her drink.

“Ah! And I see you’ve already got yourself a couple ‘a lovely ladies to tag along,” Fletcher grinned. “Inspiration central! Nothing makes for a number one hit better than heartbreak. Not that you’ll ever be hurting for company. Just wait until you tour the Balkans, that shite’s as easy as Jagger with his fly undone!”

Fletcher nudged Remus pointedly, but when none of them laughed, the manager quickly cleared his throat.

“So, you lads got a demo then?”

Now it was their turn to be nervous.

“It’s a… working thing,” James blabbed.

“As in…?”

“We’re working on it,” Remus finished.

Fletcher nodded sympathetically. “Ah, I get it. First step’s always the ‘ardest, ‘specially for up and comin’ groups such as your good selves. We used tah think that making the entire album was the ‘spensive part, but nowadays, all ‘a it’s gone through the roof. Poor buggers don’t stand a chance, not without being signed first. And well, no one’s gonna sign ya without a demo, will they? ‘Fraid that’s life, lads. Nah money, nah fame…”

“It’s not that,” Sirius interjected. “We have the money, it’s the studio space we don’t got.”

“I see.” The manager stroked his chin, suddenly more invigorated. “In that case, I might be able to get you guys in over at De Lane.”

Remus' jaw dropped. "As in De Lane Lea Studios?”

"Way to go, dork," Sirius teased. Remus smacked him for it, but Fletcher only looked keen.

“Ah, you know it, eh? Well, would I be right tah assume that you also know who’s recorded there?” The manager leaned in very close, like it was a secret he’d been dying to share. “All four ‘a them Beatles sat at those mixing tables. Pink Floyd used to have it out in the booths too, same with the Who. Legend has it that studio two’s still got a hole in the wall after Pete and Roger got a little too rowdy and one of ‘em put their fist through it. If it were me, I’d bet on Townshend. Why, I even had a similar conversation with Jagger once, but he’s always favoured Roger. Said he was real spazz that way. Speakin’ a which… none ‘a you would happen to be Queen fans, would ya?”

Fletcher could’ve been asking them to sign their own death warrants; they were in it now. Utterly drooling over the idea of recording in the same place their heroes had once stood. Hook, line, and sinker.

“Payment’ll be upfront ‘a course,” the manager told them, “but I got a guy. Works the late shifts at the studio. Can probably get you in after hours. You ain’t bound to see anyone else while the studio’s shut up for the night, so don’t get yer hopes up of running into no bloody Keith Richards, but we’ll see if we can getchu all set up, we will.”

“So you really want us to—to…” For once, Sirius was at a loss for words. James had to smack him on the back for him to spit the words out; “You’re gonna let us cut a demo in your studio?”

“You said it yourself, all you’s need is a place to record, right?”

“Yeah...”

At that, Fletcher raised his tiny glass of Scotch. “So whaddya say, lads? You wanna make an album?”

* * *

The next morning, Remus would not remember their answer to Fletcher’s million dollar question. Yes, obviously, but anything else—negotiations and the like—would be lost to the whirl of celebratory drink that had followed. Sirius had announced the good news to the entire pub at the head of their second set, and afterwards some kind well-wisher had offered each of them a bump in the men's toilet.

They'd accepted, of course. They were rock stars now—or at least on their way. They'd have to get used to things such as strangers openly offering them drugs. Up until then Remus had never tried cocaine, Tomny had kept all of that private, but he found the experience not all that different from being drunk. When he was drunk things that usually bothered him tended to fall away; everything was funny, and he was more confident. Up. Cocaine made him twice that. It was the perfect social lubricant. He took to the stage like he'd been born on it, and as a result, had strangers pour themselves out to him.

Remus poured right back. A social waterfall.

"Man, you guys are amazing!"

"Thanks, man!"

"Heard you were making an album?"

"Guess so!"

"Will I see you on 'Top of the Pops' someday?"

"Maybe!"

Fletcher bought them drinks on credit. Even James, who was supposed to be driving the van back, gave in after he offered to send a car for them. The instruments would survive until morning. Fletcher talked and talked about brands and companies, and all the bands he'd met and signed—Did you know that Rod Stewart only ever wanted to play football? Now he's got nine number-one albums!

The Marauders ate up every word.

"And just wait 'til you start getting fan mail—up to the ceiling, it'll be! We'll work out a post box later, after you've signed all the contracts. Got a dream venue? Somewhere you've always dreamed of playing?"

"Madison Square Garden!" Sirius exclaimed. "We want the Garden within four years. Wembley in three. Hammersmith Odeon in two. I don't fucking care where else."

“Right. No tall order then.”

“And ‘Top of the Pops’,” James added, having spoken to the same shrill party-goer as Remus. “Debut on the ‘Pops’ would be cool. We wanna be national.”

“I’d like to see Japan,” Peter finished. “And Canada. People tour Canada, right? They’ve got mountains.”

“And you?” Fletcher turned on Remus, fresh whisky in hand. “What’ll it be for our killer bassist?”

Remus blinked at him. His nose and throat were numb from a second bump. Ray had put on Roxy Music over the bar’s speakers and he imagined the song was theirs.

“I want Marauders to be the biggest band on Earth.”

Fletcher grinned at him.

“Then I guess we’ve got some work to do.”

They clinked glasses, and it sounded like diamonds. Sirius was staring at him like he’d hung the stars himself. James hugged Peter close, called him brother. Remus asked Fletcher for a pen. He handed him the one from his suit pocket—gold plated—and he wrote a lyric on his palm.

I’m the disappointing kid, bred of them upper class
Dad paid to get ahead, I say ‘finish last’

He’ll have sweat it off by morning.

They ordered another round, this one on the house, and before the drinks even arrived they were being cheered back onto the stage for an encore. Lily and Mary had already gone, tired from their long day spent at school, but they had new friends. Fans. Ray and Fletcher stood by the stage, clapping with a fat cigar in hand. It’d be late soon, well past the 11PM British pub hours. Not that it mattered.

They were rock stars.

They were on their way!

And not for one moment did it occur to them that they were being completely and utterly scammed.

Chapter End Notes

Hello, I'm so happy to be back! Thank you to everyone who was patient over November. Updates for Cadence will resume on Sundays until we're finished for Part 1.

Songs in this chapter: “Germfree Adolescents” by X-Ray Spex, 1978; "Chiquitia" by ABBA, 1979; “All the Time in the World” by the Nips, 1978; & "Play that Funky Music" by Wild Cherry, 1976.

I realised after writing this that “Chiquitita” wasn’t even released until January of 1979 (it's still 1978 within the fic), but I’m the only one insane enough to know this so we’re just going to ignore that. I can’t be bothered to ruin the wonderful scene between Remus and the girls. Pls allow me this one flub, lol.

Also yes, there is a playlist for gap year, I'm just fiddling with it rn. Hopefully I'll have it for you by next week!

As always, I'm over on tumblr doing my own thing, @motswolo. Feel free to come say hi and interact, I swear we’re all very chill

Chapter 99: "Wotcher!"

Chapter Summary

The boys start their first step of becoming real rock and roll stars, and boy is that step a doozy.

Chapter Notes

This is probably my longest chapter yet so you better tuck in. I did say gap year chapters were fewer, but they are long □

CW for THIS chapter: Intrusive thoughts and BPD triggers in the first scene. Remus is triggered by a perceived (or real, depending on how you look at it) feeling of abandonment and that causes him to lash out negatively. He makes some bad decisions and says things he doesn't necessarily mean, so if this is at all triggering for you, please don't hesitate to come over to my tumblr (@motswolo) and ask for a summary of the first scene. The only other thing that should be even remotely triggering is the puns I've managed to sprinkle in 🍯

TL;DR: Remus is not a very nice person this chapter. He ends up looking down on Tomny because of his jealousy and trauma, and this is something that is going to have to be rectified that later. Hooray for main characters that are not perfect and without fault or implicit biases!

Also, excuse the French I'm kinda rusty xo

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Out of college, money spent,
See no future, pay no rent,
All the money's gone, nowhere to go;

Any jobber got the sack,
Monday morning, turning back,
Yellow lorry slow, nowhere to go…

- "You Never Give Me Your Money" The Beatles, 1969

Wednesday 6th December 1978

They met up in a tiny greasy spoon cafe near Whitechapel, off the corner of Cable Street and not far from Tomny's flat. Its front windows were decorated in twinkling lights and cotton made to look like fake snow, and there was a flyer pasted on the front door advertising visits from Santa Clause at the nearby shopping centre. Remus would wish that he'd picked somewhere nicer the moment he sat down, but Tomny had insisted—nowhere fancy. They were not fancy folk, as he said, and even if they were, no one did a good fry-up like the average working-man anyway.

When Remus arrived he'd found Tomny smoking outside on the pavement. For a split second he imagined what it might be like if he were just meeting his friend to catch up. Would they batter each other around a bit? Go find some half-empty paint cans and get to tagging the streets? Maybe they'd pop a lock or two, rob a corner shop—have some real fun. There certainly wouldn't be any talk of jobs or babies. Remus missed it, but he knew by the way Tomny looked at him that there was no going back.

Thonas Armstrong had made up his mind, and Remus was just going to have to get used to it.

"I feel a bit bad," Tomny said, "making ya come all this way."

"I live in Shepherd's Bush now, not China. I think I remember my way around St George's East. Best watch out or it's you who's gonna turn amnesiac, ya old fart."

"Cheeky shit. Fine, c'mere."

Tomny hugged him tight. Remus hugged back.

"Aw, Lu... I'm glad we're finally doing this."

"Me too." As they pulled apart, Remus tucked either hand into an arm pit to ward off the cold. "So… Where is she then?"

"Skylar? Oh, she's inside already." He raised the cigarette meekly. "Says being around all the smoke is bad for the baby. M'gonna try and quit, maybe. Might even save meself a few quid, innit."

And the coke? The dealing? Remus wanted to ask. Have you managed that already?

“Gonna need the money for nappies anyway,” he said instead.

Tomny chuckled, and then flicked his cigarette butt down a nearby street drain.

“Shall we?”

She was waiting for them in a corner booth, the red vinyl seat off-setting the dark navy of her winter coat. She waved when they came in, and Remus’ stomach plummeted. Skylar was pretty. Perhaps if she weren’t he could’ve compounded a poor appearance with the fact that she was up the duff without a penny to her name and created some real pity for the girl. But it was not to be. Dishwater blonde, same as Tomny, with eyes the colour of melted chocolate. She had a few moles, charming ones, with a pouty little mouth. A true countryside princess, with an Essex accent.

“It’s a pleasure to meet youse,” she said, after he’d sat. Then she offered him her hand. The other she kept cradled around the base of her stomach like it was this great weight to bear. Remus didn’t know why; he’d asked Lily and with her due date set for late April, the baby couldn’t have been bigger than a lump of dryer lint. But Remus shook her hand anyway, and introduced himself properly, determined to make a half-decent impression. It was just one meal. He could make it through one meal.

"Oi, Bruce," Tomny called, instantly garnering the attention of one of the guys in the kitchen; "cup of coffee for this one and three of your best fry-ups. Just put it on my tab."

"Ain't got no tabs 'ere," Bruce replied.

"Not even for me?"

There was some grumbling, but Remus could tell it was in good faith when Bruce ambled out of the kitchens with a fresh pot of coffee.

"Thanks, Brucey. Throw in some extra bacon and I'd say that favour you owe me's settled."

Tomny tossed him a wink, and after Bruce had gone, turned to Remus.

"Don't worry about Bruce. Food's cheap and he only spits in the eggs on odd days."

"Actually I thought I'd get your breakfast today," said Remus. "You know, as a shitty congratulatory."

"Don't play daft. I told you today was my treat, and so it shall be." He pushed one elbow up onto the back of the booth and tucked a lock of Skylar's hair behind her ear for her. "You can buy me a real present later."

"Yeah, alright," Remus scoffed, wrapping his hands around the warm coffee mug. So far Skylar had said very little, and Remus had almost pegged her for shy until she set her own mug down and leaned in.

"I'm not being funny, but I was expectin' a bit more of ya," she giggled. "Tomny said youse were posh. Half-expected you tah kiss my hand when you walked in 'ere."

"He's been known to do it once or twice," Tomny said snidely, while Remus ignored him and stirred several sugar packets into his coffee.

“Tomny says youse are in a band?” Skylar said genially.

"Yeah, I am."

"And you sing too?"

Tomny smirked over the rim of his own coffee, and Remus resisted the urge to kick him beneath the table.

“No, I just play bass. We have our singer, but you really shouldn't bother yourself with Tom, Skylar, all he spouts is rubbish.”

“Nah, nah, I stand by that one,” Tomny grinned. “Go on then, tell ‘er about the band. ‘Marauders’, innit?”

Remus shook his head sheepishly. “It’s just a thing.”

“Now that’s fuckin' pish.” He looked to Skylar. “Back-breakingly modest, ‘e is. Any'fin you wanna know about music, this guy 'ere knows it. He used to park ‘imself in front of the radio all hours. Sometimes I’d find him asleep on the floor, hugging the thing like a teddy bear.”

“Sod off,” Remus said, flicking a plastic fork at him. Tomny laughed, picking up the fork and using it to pick his teeth.

“You guys playing in any big name clubs yet?”

“Not really. Got a thing over at this pub in South Bank—one I told you about."

"Aye, right."

"But we're looking to cut a demo soon."

"What's a demo?" Skylar asked.

"S'like a resume... For music," Remus pandered. "Comes before the album. It's where I'm headed after this actually. Gonna meet the guy organising it for us, see if we can't pass the tape on to some studios after."

"That sounds exciting," she replied, as Tomny tossed the fork aside and went on sucking his teeth.

"So that getaway plan of yers was for real then? Thought you jus' didn't want to hang out with me."

"You know it's not like that," said Remus. Tomny waved him off, playful, while Skylar glanced between them both. She popped a fried tomato into her mouth, chewed, and then straightened up in the booth.

"So you two grew up together then?" She asked.

"Er, not really."

"Sure, we did!" Tomny exclaimed, sounding offended. "I've had you goin' on six years now."

"Off and on… S'not exactly like we were neighbours or anything."

"Pish," Tomny said again. He gave Remus an odd look, then turned sideways in his seat to look at Skylar. "I found 'im in a park. Little sod was crying like a girl 'til I came around. After that he used to run away and visit us all the time. Straight turned up outta the blue most days. Had to bribe him jus' so's he'd go home. And 'e had this driver—more like a parole officer, really. His name was... Oh, bollocks—what's the fella's name again, Lu?"

"Giles."

"Giles! We's shared custody, me and 'im. Lu was too much of a handful for anyone else to tolerate. Still rings true today."

While Remus rolled his eyes, secretly pleased, Skylar clapped her hands together in great realisation.

“Oh, I know 'oo you are now! You’re that Lu, aren’t cha? Tomny's told me about you... You’re the one that grew up in the big 'ouse with all the dogs and them. You went to that poshy school! ... Your dad’s some sort ‘a fancy minister or something.”

Suddenly the coffee felt thick on Remus' tongue.

“Yeah, that’s me…”

“I used to know someone 'oose dad sorta did that too," Skylar went on, "but 'e was only a parish rep—not even a real priest—so 'e made shit money. How does your family do it then?”

Again, Remus shifted uncomfortably. “My grandfather owned a lot of land. Sold most of it before he died, and my dad didn’t have any siblings so…”

“Christ, you never told me that,” Tomny gaped. “I'll wager that’s a fat inheritance.”

Afterwards, Skylar swatted him on the shoulder. “Tomny, you nob—why didn’t 'oo tell me he 'n Lu were the same person?”

“Didn’t think I had to. Lu’s Lu, Sky. Does it look like I got many poshy public school kids stuffed up my sleeve?”

He waved his jacket sleeve for emphasis and Skylar only shoved him by the arm. She kept her hand there afterwards though, and Remus stared at it, lost in an unformulated thought.

“You must have a lot going on then,” Skylar said, snapping him from his daze. “Or, I’ve heard lots anyway. Tomny talks about you plenty. You knew Lee and them.”

"You've met Lee?"

"Oh yeah, 'e's come round the flat a few times, innie. A bit of a dosser but nice enough so long as Tomny don't ignore 'im for too long. Gets a bit frazzled otherwise, d'ya know what I mean?"

The comment stung, more so for the fact that she could’ve known ‘Lee and them’, but thankfully Tomny got there first.

“Sky, I told you that’s off limits,” he said lowly. “Lee is—”

“I remember, I’m not thick,” Skylar replied curtly. “But they were friends once, now I can’t even ask about it? It’s not like he’s offering much to the conversation…”

The couple shared a sharp look, and Remus got the feeling that it was an argument they’d had before but hadn’t really had a chance to finish. He wished they’d stop talking about him while sitting right in front of him. In fact he wished he’d never come at all, but he was godfather now—or would be, in four and half months. Christ.

One meal, Remus thought, Just one meal.

“So how’s work coming, Tom?” He asked finally, clinging to every word. He was rewarded when Tomny champed at the bit, probably just as desperate to take the heat off.

“It’s orright! Better than I thought, at least. Burrin’s already got me working with him on the books.”

“Gambling?”

He shrugged. “I just count the bets, mate. Working the books, it's honest enough work, innit. S’usually slow down at the tracks this time of year, but there’s always work to be had. It’s a fucking hike to get there though.”

“Thought you were gonna get a car?”

“We did. S’a 1963 Hillman Imp. Runs like a can ‘a shite though, jus' like the name. Overheats at ten degrees and I think that petrol tank is a bottomless pit.”

They shared a chuckle, but Skylar didn’t seem all that amused. She sipped her coffee and then placed a firm hand on Tomny’s shoulder.

“Remus, did Tomny tell you we’re thinking of moving?”

Remus’ smile faltered. “Moving…?” Like, for real?

“Yes, out of the city—”

“She means out of the hustle and bustle,” Tomny cut-in. Skylar gave him a tight look for it, but still smiled at Remus.

“We hope to find one of them row-houses eventually,” she said. “Get out of council housing. Nothing huge, just someplace big enough to park the car—a nursery for the baby, you know.”

Suddenly alarm bells were starting to go off in Remus' head. Abort! Abort! But Skylar and Tomny were looking at him. He had to say something.

"You're gonna leave London? Just like that?"

"No, never," Tomny replied. "I ain't going anywhere. Maybe jus'... Havering or something. Still counts."

"But it ain't in the city."

"I think Southend-on-Sea would be nice," Skylar interjected. "It's not too far, and plus there's always a pier that Tomny could find work—"

"So what? You're gonna work on a pier for the rest of your goddamn life?"

The comment was sharp, perhaps sharper than Remus had meant for.

"No," Tomny scoffed. "But it'd be nice to be somewhat closer to work. No room for dog or horse racing 'ere, mate—all the decent tracks are out yonder."

"So you're gonna give up the flat."

It wasn't a question, but Tomny answered like it was; "Not entirely. I'm thinking 'a letting one of the other lads take over the lease for a bit. You know I can't afford two rents, but 'least the flat's cheap."

Calm down, Remus told himself. You can't lose it over a fucking address.

"Right," he managed. "Well, that's… You, er—You really sound like you've got a plan going."

"We do," Skylar smiled. "And that's not all. Tomny's promised 'e's gonna get 'imself clean so that we'll all be ready when the baby comes."

Instantly Tomny was chiding her. "Lu don't wanna 'ear about that, sweetheart."

"Why not? You should be proud." She looked to Remus; "He's been going to AA. Two weeks clean already, isn't that brilliant?"

Remus was stunned; he barely heard the rest of her sentence.

"AA, as in… Alcoholics Anonymous, Tom?"

“Jus’ a few meetings,” Tomny said sheepishly. “Thought I’d give it a go. It's not that serious.”

“Really? Just—give it a go?"

Don’t.

"Boy, don't you sound committed.”

Stop.

“You're sure it's not ‘Narcotics Anonymous’?”

He's just embarrassed.

Remus leaned forward; “Or do you plan on keeping the blow on the down-low while you’re changing nappies and coaching football practices?”

“Oi!”

A line had appeared between Tomny’s brow, furrowed in hurt and confusion. It should've been enough for Remus to stop, but part of him didn't want to. Instead he was a bucket tipped; the anger swept forth like toxic oil down a river, and this time he went with it.

“I’m just saying, seems like a lot all at once. A year ago you would’ve rather cut off your arm than move out of the city. Very well couldn’t, not with all your customers being—”

Tomny slammed a hand down on the table, making the dishes rattle and Skylar jump.

“That’s enough," he swore. "No... No need to dredge up the past.”

“Oh? I didn’t realise it was ‘past’.”

“Yeah, it is. So leave it already.”

Remus clamped his lips together, and it ended in a stare down. He barely saw Skylar. And then that nasty voice crept back in with vengeance.

He's always calling the shots, isn't he? it hissed. It’s his fault she left so where’s his punishment? 'We don't care—we don't care'? How 'bout he doesn't care!

One of the salt shakers had upended itself when Tomny slammed his hand down. Remus watched as Tomny traced a finger through the mess absentmindedly. He thought he could hear him mutter the words "bad luck" under his breath, but the whisper was gone a moment later when Tomny brushed his hands off and took a deep breath.

"How yer dad then? Still busy being a pompous sack of shit?"

Under normal circumstances Remus would've accepted the jab as an insult meant only for Lyall and not a reflection of his own character, but he was feeling spiteful all of a sudden.

"I thought we came here to discuss your family," he scoffed. "You know, the one you're lying to."

"Lu." Tomny cocked his head. "Don't."

“Don’t what? I mean, really, Tom—don't you think Skylar should know everything about you if she’s gonna be sticking around? I mean, you made a baby with her, after all. Reckon that means you're alright with her picking through the rest of your dirty laundry.”

Before Tomny could lash out at him, Skylar cupped both hands around her boyfriend's bicep. “I know about the drugs, Remus," she said, looking earnest. "And I want you to know that I don’t care. Everyone makes mistakes, but Tomny's gonna right them. He's gonna come out better, just like I did. Hell, when I met Tomny, I was drinking a bottle a night jus' to get to sleep and going wiv' any guy that'd so much as look at me twice.”

“Yeah, well... I imagine it’s a lot more lucrative to forgive your drug dealer.”

“What'd you say to her?" Tomny echoed. "Lu, you need to shut the fuck up right now.”

“What? You mean to tell me that you haven’t sold any dope since coming back here, Tom? Yeah, right.”

"He hasn't," Skylar insisted. "He told me he hasn't."

"Nah, just look at him. He's lying to ya, Sky."

A vein bulged in Tomny’s neck. Remus had never seen him so angry, and though he was alarmed, a part of him revelled in it.

“Didn't he tell you, Sky? Suppose it feels like a lifetime ago now... But he did it. For years. All the way from Limehouse to Shoreditch—Tomny had it all. Uppers, downers, blow, barbs, smack! Whatever fits your fancy, really. Didn't he tell you any of that? Did he tell you about all the times we got high together? Or—Or the fights he got into? And how about Lee’s brother, hm? The one who was knifed in an alley? Or me? Or... Or Tonya! Don’t tell me he forgot to tell you about Ton—”

“REMUS!”

The shout was loud enough to draw the attention of the entire restaurant. Like before, Remus and Tomny barely noticed, it was only Skylar who flinched. She looked down at her lap to avoid the strangers' stares and began fidgeting her fingers with red, burning cheeks. Across the table, Remus had both hands fisted together so tightly he could feel the bite of his nails in either palm. The look Tomny was giving him was absolutely deplorable, and he deserved every second of it.

I’ll hate her, he'd told Lyall once, I’ll make her hate me too.

“I think I need to use the lav,” Skylar murmured.

“Yeah, think I’ll step outside for another fag,” Tomny said flatly, his eyes never leaving Remus’ face. “Lu was just leaving anyway.”

Skylar stood up, pretty mouth puckered, and set her napkin down on the table. “It was nice to meet you, Remus," she said, and then she left, shapely hips swaying on her way.

Hate her, the voice said.

“Get your fucking coat,” Tomny told him. “You’re done.”

Remus didn’t even have it in him to be sorry. He followed Tomny out onto the icy street corner, shoving his hands into his pockets as Tomny rifled around for a fag. It was cold outside and the pavement was empty apart from a few passing pedestrians and the occasional car. Remus would be due at Fletcher’s office soon—he was meeting the boys. What a fucking mistake all this had all been.

“You crossed the line,” Tomny told him, when he finally had the cigarette lit. “You did it on purpose. You wanted to fuck this up for me.”

Remus shoved his hands in his pockets bitterly. “Guess I just thought I'd save you the trouble of doing it yourself."

"Oh fuck you, Lu! What'd I ever do to you to deserve this?"

"You brought me here!"

" 'Brought you here'— ha! That's rich! Forgive me for wanting my best friend to be even the least bit involved with my life! You know, you really are just some spoiled, pampered prat. You think you can take your anger out on Skylar just because you have abandonment issues? Welcome to the fucking club!"

"Only assumed she'd want to know about what it is you really do, but I guess I was wrong," Remus blabbered. "I just don't know what makes her so fucking special that you'd hold off from telling her the truth."

"She's having my kid!" Tomny wailed. "She's gonna be the mother of my child, you fucking bellend!"

"You sure about that? Said it herself, didn't she. Are you sure this kid's even yours, Tom?"

It was too far. Remus knew it the instant the words left his lips. And he didn't blame Tomny for a second, even as he brought his fist up in one fell swoop. The punch was solid, catching him on the jaw and slamming his teeth together with a painful snap. Remus went sprawling to his knees on impact, but he'd saved his teeth and tongue. Lee had once told him a story of a guy who'd made that mistake during a fight. Ended up severing the muscle clean off. Mute ever since.

"You're lucky," Tomny hissed, shaking out his fist; "that was my left."

Remus raised his head, icy pavement biting through the fabric of his jeans. Tomny's punch coupled with the wet ground had zapped him of all his anger, leaving him feeling only miserable and ashamed.

What have I done?

"Fuck... Tom, I—"

"No," Tomny groaned. He looked ill, like he might vomit. "You... You just shut your fucking mouth. I can't—I... Fuck! Fuck—shit—FUCK!"

He punctuated the cry by spinning round and kicking out at one of the rubbish bins the cafe must've set out that morning for rubbish collection. Luckily the bin was empty, but it did bounce several metres down the pavement, nearly taking out the knees of a well-dressed man walking the opposite way. He glared at Tomny as he passed them, and Tomny raised him the single finger salute and bellowed a sharp: "Who you think yer lookin' at?"

Afterwards there was no one left to yell at or kick but each other. Anxiously, Remus got to his feet, fists clenched at his sides.

"I'm sorry, Tom."

"No, you don't get to be sorry," Tomny hissed, pointing a vicious finger at him. " You ..." A shaky breath; "You just don't get it, do you? I needed to make this work."

"For who—her? For the kid?"

"For myself, you right bastard!"

Aching deeply, though in no way worse-off than his friend, Remus took a step forward. He wanted to apologise again, but he watched as Tomny retreated from him and knew that another "I'm sorry" would get him nowhere.

"Please, Tom," he begged instead. "Tell me how I can make it up to you."

"This ain't about making it up to me! I brought you here because I wanted you to meet Skylar. Cause—Cause I wanted you to like her. And then you go and pull this shit! Like fuck, Lu! … And to mention Tonya? Christ, why's it so hard for you to be proud of me?"

Remus almost whimpered.

"I am proud of you, Tom."

"Yeah, well it ain't enough."

And perhaps it wasn't. For three years Remus had feared only being left behind, and now that Tomny truly had gone ahead he'd become hysterical. It was his own fault. Tomny had offered him a hand— come with me, be a godfather— and he'd ruined it. He could see it in Tomny's eyes, and felt it as he watched him turn away.

"Where you going?" Remus asked.

"Away."

"No. No, you said you weren't going anywhere."

"And you said you were happy for me... Guess that makes us both liars."

"So that's it?" Remus demanded. "We're done? Just like that?"

Tomny stopped, his shoulders collapsed inward like a child's. For a long time Remus didn't think he was going to turn around, but then he did, and Remus regretted it all over again.

“I think you should go, Lu,” Tomny told him, calmly stubbing out his cigarette on the cafe wall. “Just… Good luck with all your band shit or whatever. M’sure I’ll hear it on the radio someday.”

And then Tomny moved past him, back into the cafe. The door jingled and a corner of the Santa Clause flyer fluttered in the wind. It would be warm inside, Remus knew, but he didn't deserve the comfort. He deserved only the ice in his bones.

Turning, Remus started up the street toward the nearest tube station where he might be able to catch a cab. Did this mean he was relieved from all future godfatherly duties, he wondered?

* * *

When Remus fully came to again, he was sitting in the back of a cab on his way to Fletcher’s office. The address he'd given them was situated along Coventry Street, just off Leicester Square in Soho. It was a unique area, for lack of a better word—one that felt seedy in the daytime only to come alive with bustle and neon the moment the sun dropped below the horizon. Handing the cabbie a fiver, Remus clambered out of the cab's back seat and found himself knee-deep in Chinatown likeness. Adverts for take-out and call-girls littered the damp street corners, while air stinking of exhaust and local cuisine floated overhead. Across the street lay the iconic Prince of Wales Theatre, dull orange bulbs advertising its in-house comedy show. ‘Too funny for words’, its marquee read; ‘If you don’t laugh—sue us!’

All around him people shambled on by, out to catch an early matinee or else pop into one of the many couture shops or peep shows lining the strip. Remus found his friends standing outside a sex shop bearing the name ‘Tunnels of Love’, sharing a cigarette between the three of them while they waited. It was Peter who spotted him first, pushing the fag onto James and rushing forward, nearly slipping on the slick pavement.

“Moony—Finally! We were starting to wonder if you were ever gonna show.”

He shrugged, hands in his pockets. “I’m here now. Why didn’t you guys go inside?”

“Couldn’t very well go in with three-fourths a band, could we?” James replied, stubbing out the cigarette. “Feeling ready then?”

“As ready as I’ll ever be.”

"Good," said Peter, "I'm tired of freezing my balls off out here."

If James or Peter picked up on his lack of enthusiasm, they didn’t mention it. It wasn’t until they’re rung the building’s door buzzer and were making their way up the set of interior stairs adjacent to the sex shop that Sirius mentioned the meeting with Tomny.

“So, how’d it go?” He asked, keeping his voice low so it might be muffled by the creaking sound of their boots on each step.

“Fine,” Remus replied, before realising he was going to have to try a bit harder to keep his curiosity at bay. “Tomny got a new job down at the dog tracks.”

“And the girl?”

It was James who saved him from having to answer. “Are you sure this is the right place?” He called. They’d emerged on a wooden landing that felt more ‘shabby Soho flat’ than ‘EMI music producer extravaganza’. As they filed in next to each other, one of the doors closest to them opened and a middle-aged man tottered out. He gave each of them a dark look, punctuated by a five o’clock shadow and a terrible underbite, and then gruffly pushed his way through to get downstairs.

“He smelt wonderful,” Sirius said tersely. “Like stale hops and cat piss.”

“Keep it up and he might just come back and stab you with a blunt blade,” James mused.

“Maybe he will. It'd give me something to write about, at least.”

“It’s down here, wankers,” Peter called, having moved further up the landing than the rest of them. “Number three.”

The rest of them followed, stopping outside a dingy panelled door without any windows. It was the same as all the others, except this one had a golden plaque hung up outside. Doug Fletcher. Arts and Repertoire, EMI Music Publishing.

Sirius flicked the plaque with his finger. It tinged like plastic.

“Well,” he said, glancing sceptically at the rest of them. “We did come all this way…”

And so, with a deep breath, Sirius raised his fist and knocked.

The door flew open before he’d even finished, revealing a grinning Fletcher in a pin-striped suit and pink satin cravat, bald head polished to a shine. He’d forwent the over-sized golden rings today, and instead had several silver bangles on either wrist that jangled like a cat’s collar whenever he flourished his barrel-shaped wrists.

“If it ain’t my three o’clock! Or should I say, London’s next hardest and heaviest group ‘a thrashers! Come in, lads, come in!” Ushering them inside, Fletcher pointed across the room to where a lanky guy with thick-rimmed glasses sat in a cushioned arm chair. “This ‘ere is my man, Albert Wilson. He’s going to be the one helping you record in-studioso . That is, in the recording studio. Heh.”

They nodded eagerly, each without a peep to split between them. For all the uninspiring exterior, they were certainly in awe now. With large street-facing windows shrouded in beaded blinds and rugs that looked like they were fresh off the boat from Persia, Fletcher's office appeared to be dressed up even more fabulously than the man himself. Albert sat on a small loveseat in the corner, legs crossed at the ankles as he looked them up and down. Ahead of him sat a single leather office chair and a large oaken desk decorated with a heavy crystal ashtray, a rolodex, and a golden statuette of what appeared to be a naked women’s bust. The wood-panelled walls, though still marred with the building's general dinge and water damage, were covered with placards advertising EMI and all its signed acts. Several more golden records hung framed over an upright piano. Remus peered at each of the band’s names closely—Muggle & the Martyr, The Crookshanks, Abra Kadabra—none sounded familiar.

“Ah, I see you’ve noticed the high-achievers board,” Fletcher said, coming up behind him. “Abra Kadabra’s ‘Goblets of Ire’ went platinum just last month, as a matter ‘a fact. Haven’t got the record in the mail yet. Bad luck, that.”

“I've never heard of them," Remus replied. "You said they went platinum in the UK?”

“No, in Bangladesh actually.” Fletcher thumped him on the back. “Here's hoping the next gold-plated record I’ll be getting is yers, eh?”

Remus got the feeling he was supposed to laugh, but thankfully the manager had already moved on. He ushered him back to a large leather sofa that sat across from his desk and Remus squeezed in beside James and Peter while Sirius perched himself on the arm rest. Once he was seated behind his desk, Fletcher eased back into the creaky leather chair and put one foot up on the desk.

“So let’s just start by covering the basics. Which of ya writes the songs?”

“Lupin does,” Sirius answered, without a hint’s hesitation. Remus scoffed and thumped him in the leg.

“We all write the songs.”

“Hm, group effort, is it? Makes things a bit messy in the accounting department, but s’nothing we’s ain’t used to. Make sure's you keep record of who wrote what, that way we can divvy up the royalties as needed.” Pointing a finger at them assuredly, Fletcher pulled a cigar tin from his pocket and used one of fat cuban cigars to gestured toward Albert, who’d already begun scribbling away on a notepad. “Put Lupin down as the principle then," he ordered. "The other’s we’ll sort out as we record.”

“Yeah, and when do you think we’ll record?” Sirius pressed. “ ‘Cause we been working on the songs like you said, and we got more than enough to—”

“Hold on now, hold on,” Fletcher eased; “We’ll get there, son, I promise ya. But before we do, what I needs to know is what sort of image you lads wanna portray. Who do you’s want people tah see when they look at you—what should be the first thing that pops intae their heads when they hear the name ‘Marauders’.”

“Good ol’ fashion rock ‘n’ roll,” James answered simply.

“Yeah,” Peter added, “we’re a rock band. Like the Rolling Stones or Cream.”

“You want people to think of the Stones when they come ‘n see ya?”

“No,” Sirius cut-in, giving Peter a pointed look, "we ain’t the Stones. We're better."

“Now that,” Fletcher applauded, “is what I wanted to hear. That's a record I can sell!” He paused, long enough to light the narrow cigar off a lighter plated in the same shimmering gold as his records. “You lads have the gusto—the zeal—but if you’re missing anything it’s a goal. Simply saying you want to be the ‘biggest and best’ ain’t enough no more.”

Peter leaned in; “But you said—”

Fletcher snapped the lighter shut, exhaling. The smoke instantly stung Remus' eyes, reminding him of Lyall.

“Being big is great, you need ‘big’ to be the best," Fletcher told them, "but whatchu also needs is a certain uniqueness—a sui generis, if you will. You need something that sets you apart from all the rest ‘a the acts on the circuit. I think this attitude of yours could be it, so long as you can back it up with your sound, that is.”

“And how will we know if we've managed to 'back it up'?” James asked.

Fletcher shrugged. “ ‘Fraid that’s on you, but I suggest you do it fast. Punk’s a dying art, my friends. It was rock’s eleventh-hour shot to take back power. Now that it’s failed, we need a new angle. Mosh pits are out and dance parties are in. So you tell me, where are you going to land…? Empty mosh pits, or menagerie dance floors filled with silk-wearing dolly birds?”

“Neither,” Remus said, making all of them turn on him. “We’re not punk. And we sure as hell aren’t doing whatever those new wavers are into."

"So...?"

"So we ain't gonna cave. Instead we’re gonna do it our way, just like the guys before us but better. We’re gonna find all the ones that punk and synth left behind and we’re gonna play our music for them. Not the music they want, but the music they don't know they should be... be wanting.”

He'd trailed off towards the end, suddenly chock full of self-doubt, but he must've said something right, for the others were already grinning at him in agreement. As James reached over to slap him fondly on the arm, Remus caught Fletcher and Albert exchanging a purposeful glance.

“You guys live together?” Albert asked.

“Yeah,” answered Sirius. “Got a flat in Shepherd’s Bush.”

“Daddy paying for the demo then?”

“No, we work for your information,” Remus snapped, thinking of Tomny.

“Alright, alright,” Fletcher cut-in, “I think it's time we get this show on the road, don't you? I told you four the first time we chatted that I wasn’t gonna take any money for meself from the get-go. I know, s'generous of me. Most new acts don't get such a sweet deal, but to save us the hassle of all that paperwork I say we negotiate contracts once the demo’s recorded and in our hands. From there we can start taking it to distributors. Until then, you’re only paying for studio time. Sound fair?”

“Fair,” they nodded dubiously.

“Brilliant. I’d say that makes this a done deal, lads. If you’ve got the money on you today, Albert can work out a date for you to record down at De Lane. What say you?”

The other Marauders all glanced anxiously at Sirius, who slipped off of the sofa arm and pulled open his Glastonbury coat. Reaching inside, he untucked an envelope of cash and passed it over the desk. Fletcher peeked inside and before giving Albert a quick nod of approval and slipping the envelope into one of the desk drawers.

“Next Sunday work for ya?” Albert asked. “We’ll have to do it at night, when the studio’s closed. S’all they’ll allow for student bands, but at least no one’ll be around to bother us. Should give me enough time to cut it all together and get you that demo before the holidays too.”

“Yes!” Sirius exclaimed, looking excitedly at all of them. “The sooner the better really. Can’t wait forever.”

“What, got a flame licking that skinny behind ‘a yours?” Fletcher teased.

“No,” Peter started for him. “But we told our parents we’d go back to school if nothing came of the band thing, and it’s already been several months.”

“Aw, I get that.” Fletcher stood up from the chair. He was admittedly not that much taller on his feet. “Parents just want what’s best for ya. But you let them know that your good pal Fletch’s got it allllll sorted. Demo’s practically a done deal, just gotta hit record! But do your ol' pal a favour, would ya? If anyone else tries to sign ya before we've gone to EMI, you let Fletcher know. Got's to make sure you're not getting a sour deal. Only honour amongst friends, ain't there?”

With that, they made their way to the door, herded out into the hall by Fletcher and his foul cigar smoke.

“Oh, and one more piece of advice, lads!” He called, just as they’d stepped out into the hall. “Get some posters made. Start painting the town in your image. People can’t come to see ya if they don’t know you exist. Who knows, maybe one ‘a them’ll turn out to be your biggest fan.”

The door shut with a slam, and barely a beat had passed before James and Sirius were throwing themselves at each other in jubilation.

"I can't fucking believe it!" James sang. "We're getting our own demo—holy shit!"

"Holy shit!" Sirius agreed. They continued dancing around each other all the way back down to the ground floor, where the next door sex shop's sign was still flashing out its window.

"Don't you reckon we're celebrating a bit early?" Peter warbled as the four of them emerged onto the street and James began grinding his knuckles into the top of Sirius' head in jovial congratulation. "We just handed him everything we have and we've still got nothing to show for it. That was nearly five months' wages, you know."

"And a good chunk of my inheritance," Sirius said, freeing himself from James and poking out his tongue playfully. "Don't worry, Wormy, if the demo fails I promise to buy you out. Maybe you can start up your own art studio."

Peter didn't appear contented, but just then James separated himself from Sirius' side and declared that a round of drinks were in order and that they should make their next mission to find the nearest possible pub to get royally pissed in. With all of them in agreement, Remus followed on obediently, keeping silent as Sirius eventually fell into step with him.

"So I've been thinking, should we open the demo with 'Hail Mary' or 'Doomed Generation'? 'Hail Mary' would be a real punch in the throat, but maybe we wanna start off more with something more modest—you know, build up to the real heavy stuff. What do you wager, Moons?"

Remus didn't answer at first, and Sirius had to tap him.

"Moons?"

"Something was off about Fletcher."

Sirius tipped his head back to groan; "What, you too?"

"No, no... It's just something that he said." Remus peered down at the wet pavement beneath his shoes. " 'Honour amongst friends', that's what he said, but he's wrong. It's 'no honour amongst thieves', that's the saying."

Sirius bit his lip, looking temporarily deflated. The expression was gone a second later.

"Who gives a shit what barmy idiots like Fletcher have to say? We're only using him to get the demo. Old fool didn't even make us sign any contracts, right? The way I see it, if he turns out completely useless then we just get our tape and get out. Find another way into EMI. I'll bet there's loads of tossers just like Fletcher. It's all 'a part of the game, remember."

Remus nodded. "Maybe you're right."

"Of course I'm right. I'm like so right it's wrong—that's the best part. Now c'mon, I can feel a stiff pint calling your name, Moons. With luck, it'll be the last one you ever have to pay for outta your own pocket."

* * *

Christmastime, 1978

In the nearly two weeks that'd followed their meeting with Fletcher, the Marauders worked harder than ever before, dedicating every waking hour not spent at work to honing their craft. Remus told himself to be thankful for the lack of free time; it meant less hours would be wasted languishing over Tomny. He hadn't heard from the would-be father since their spat outside the cafe, and since Remus had made no effort to reach out either, he assumed that Tomny simply wanted the space and resigned himself to a waiting game. Things would be alright eventually, Remus told himself. He and Tomny had had falling outs before—this wasn't the first time and he doubted it'd be the last. Even if Tomny didn't call first, eventually Remus would come slinking back, begging for forgiveness, and Tomny would give it to him as he always did. For now, all Remus needed was to be patient.

On the upside (or down, depending on who you asked,) Sirius had somehow managed to wrestle the rest of them into performing the back-up vocals on a couple of their more pop-rock tracks. Normally James was the only one who had the courage to sing back-up to Sirius while on stage, but they'd all agreed that the songs didn't sound as whole without it.

"Why don't you just layer more of yours and James' vocals on top of each other?" Remus had asked. "You can do that, you know. In the studio."

"I know, but I wanna hear it like this first. Now let's cut the whinging and take it from the top, shall we?"

It went okay at first, but then Remus' voice cracked on the second verse and he'd been forced to pummel Sirius with his fists until the arse stopped fully-belly laughing. This went on for several days.

It was clear that the Marauders had really hit their stride as a band during those few weeks. It was then that Remus really discovered how good Peter was at harmonising with Remus' bass. Practically reading his mind, the two of them bounced beats off one another all day and all night until they were creating rhythms just as complementary as any Jones-Bonham composition. Of course James and Sirius had proved as formidable a duo as always. Together they penned a rather explosive composition involving an experimental sort of reverb they could only achieve by placing two amps side by side and swinging the guitar around in front of them in a windmill-like motion. It looked rather stupid in practice, but anything for the art, Remus supposed.

When it'd finally come time to record the songs in-studio, they'd taken turns pinching each other just to make sure they weren't dreaming. They were due to be up the entire night recording, but still Remus hadn't been able to sleep. Instead he laid awake, staring at the radio and ruminating in his own jitters.

"Just think of the album cover," Sirius had told him, muttering sleepily into the side of his neck. "I'm… mmm… finally gonna get you into a pair of those leather trousers… swear it."

When that fateful Sunday finally came, they waited until near-on nine o'clock at night to load everything into the van. Lily had wanted to come as a show of support, but it was the end of term for her and she had an exam in the morning. Without their favourite ginger tag-along, James and Sirius took the front seats while Remus and Peter rode coach with the instruments.

"I'm starting to think getting Minnie was a good idea after all," Sirius said, tilting James' rearview mirror to grin back at them. "I mean, you two look so cosy back there."

"Would you stop with the stupid name already?" Peter moaned. "It's a car not a golden retriever."

"I still don't get it either," James said, twisting his mirror back. "Why did you insist on naming our van after our old Headmistress?"

"Because," Sirius sniggered. "Now it's a Minnie- van."

They all groaned.

James took the A40 over to Holborn, where they found themselves knocking on the loading bay doors of none other than De Lane Lea Studios. There they waited, practically vibrating on the spot for reasons that were entirely unique to each of them.

"You're sure we're in the right place?" Peter asked.

"Yes, we're sure," Sirius snapped, hands pressed tight to his chest to ward off the chill. "Do you see another building around here with the words 'De Lane Lea' written out front?"

"You don't need to be a prick about it."

Before Sirius could answer, the back door swung open, revealing Albert in a pair of matching white shirt and slacks. Remus recognised the faint smell of antiseptic permeating the air around him. Albert didn't seem to notice.

“Come on then,” the sound tech grunted briskly, shoving a brick beneath the door to keep it propped open. “Let's get that gear inside before you wake up the whole bloody neighbourhood.”

Albert was strictly to the point, Remus noticed early on. He refused James' request for a quick tour of the studios, citing strict time constraints and a lack of free studio space. After overhearing the sound of what appeared to be voices coming from the end of one hall, Remus became almost sure that they weren't alone as Fletcher promised, but before he could inquire further, Albert had them corralled into one of the control rooms, the sight alone impressive enough to make Remus forget all about any possible gate-crashers. The control room itself was very clean and sleek-looking, not at all like the shag-rug and wood-panelled recording booths Remus had seen snippets of in the likes of NME and Cream magazine. To him, the control table and surrounding area looked more like something torn straight out of one of Marlene’s science fiction novels. A spaceship maybe, or a robot assembly line.

In a clear hurry to get going, Albert kindly helped lug their things into the studio's booth, and from there they got straight to work. Not a single moment was wasted, apart from those spent sorting out the issues with the tape. Of which there were many.

“I got it, I got it! Just let me do it!” Albert prattled, after the machine had tangled for the third time, ruining Sirius’ near-perfect take and prompting all of them to emerge from the live room to see what was the issue. Remus didn’t say anything, for fear Albert would somehow overhear them through the booth's speaker playback, but it appeared to him that Fletcher’s ‘right hand man’ was very new to the whole ‘recording’ business. He supposed it was to be expected; they were still quite green themselves.

With only one hour left until sun-up, the Marauders were nearly depleted. There was Peter, half-asleep at his drum kit, and James who had downed about twenty-seven cups of black coffee, and finally Remus who was quite literally begging for fag. Only Sirius seemed to come with limitless stores of energy, as to be expected.

“Just a bit longer. We still have that last song of yours to record first," he insisted, sliding his headphones back into place and giving Albert the 'okay' through the booth's main window. "Al, cue up a fresh tape, would ya?" He called. "We're gonna do Lupin's ballad."

“No, don’t worry about it,” Remus said into his own microphone, painfully tired and exasperated. "We don't need it."

“What?!"

Sirius' voice came through the speakers along with a horrible sequel of feedback, making all of them with headphones flinch and Peter spring awake from the floor beside his bass drum. "Sorry..." He muttered, adjusting the microphone, then; "What d’you mean ‘don’t need it’? It’s your song.”

“Yeah, and I just don’t think it’s the right fit for the album anymore, that's all.”

“Moons.” Sirius gave him a look that was half sleep-deprived irritation, half forlorn sympathy. “It’s a good song. It should go on the album.”

Remus shook his head. No.

Not that song.

Not “Tonya’s Song”.

Not anymore.

“None of the others are acoustic. It’ll sound out of place.”

“Sod that. It’s our best love song.”

Love song. He almost flinched when Sirius said it.

"I won't do it. I said no."

“Fine then, be a stubborn prat about it,” Sirius huffed, already reaching for his guitar. “We’ll have Potter play your bits instead—”

“Sirius, why don't you just fuck off!?”

At the sound of his raised voice, Peter sat upright and James lowered his twenty-eighth cup of coffee-in-a-styrofoam-mug. Remus knew that Albert would also be keenly listening in from his place back in the control room, but he was too proud to look. And too proud to apologise. It appeared as though it was becoming a bad habit of his lately.

“I don’t want to," he said solemnly, in place of a defence, "please,

Sirius."

At Remus' pathetic attempt to appeal to his compassionate nature, Sirius deflated some, his pale shoulders falling slack as he tipped his head back to frown at the ceiling. Remus could tell he was more than a little disappointed; he'd always loved "Tonya's Song", enough to look past the fact that it was clearly a love song Remus had written for someone else.

"Come on, Black," James said, chiming in reasonably. "We still have Moony's other ballad, 'How Nice It Could Be'. It's 'love' enough, yeah? Let's sort that one next."

"You also said that we still need to stack a few more vocals for 'Downtown Girls'," Peter called, muffling a yawn.

The look Sirius gave him made it obvious to Remus that he wasn't satisfied, but he didn't push anymore and for that Remus was grateful. Going through the motions and simply playing the chords was the easy part, but either due to their unwavering friendship or general exhaustion, there were no more arguments to be had in the booth. Come seven o'clock, they were stood around the futuristic sound board with Albert, listening to what would go on to become the scrap pieces of the Marauders' very first album. The recording was messy; rough-hewn and clearly amateur—and yet Remus had never felt so proud of anything he'd help create in his entire life.

On their way back to Shepherd's Bush they passed a bottle of Jack around in hard-earned celebration. They got caught up in traffic along the way, but were already on their second or third wind of the night and couldn't be bothered to give a crap. These were morning commuters, all of them on their way to the boring mundane desk jobs that paid for their boring mundane lives. They were eighteen—and they had just finished recording a studio demo. Soon that demo would be passed on to the execs at EMI, and if all went well there, they'd hopefully be signing contracts within the coming New Year. Invigorated by this knowledge, (and the whisky) Remus looked out the window at a bus full of morning pedestrians and flipped them the victorious bird. Life was good.

Of course they all crashed the moment they arrived home, barely having the energy to bring the gear back inside with them to avoid being robbed. It wasn't until several hours later, at around four o'clock, when Remus awoke to Lily knocking on their door. Regulus had called.

Sirius immediately leapt out of bed, and when Remus eventually found the energy to follow, he found him draped over the kitchen phone, regaling his brother with all the fantastical realities of being a real-life recording artist.

“No, seriously, it was amazing! The studio was damn impressive, they had an isolation box and everything… No, not like in prison. It’s meant for—well, if you knew what it was meant for then why bother taking the piss? … Mhm… Ugh. I still don’t know why you’d bother, it’s not like anyone ever has a good time at those fucking parties, least of all us... Sod Mum—why don’t you just come out here for Christmas? Potter’s parents are putting everyone up and there’s plenty of room. You can sleep at the end of the bed like a little cat.” Sirius paused, and slowly his little smirk faded, replaced instead by a deep, unsatisfied frown.

“Fuck family, Edge," he spat. " You’re my family. You should be coming out here. Have a visit—you’d love it, I know you would. You can join us, even—fucking—find yourself, I dunno. We’re always on the lookout for a decent roadie anyway…” Sirius sighed again, rubbing his free hand over his eyes. “Right… Yes, yes—I get it! … Christ... Fine. Talk soon… Yeah, you too... bye.”

When he hung up, Remus was waiting with a cup of tea.

“No good?”

“Eh… Maybe Easter.”

He could tell Sirius’ plan to mend the broken bridge between himself and his brother was wearing on him. For months he’d clung to the sparse phone calls, dreading the weeks that Regulus didn’t see fit to ring them. Remus wasn’t sure just how deeply entrenched Regulus remained in the Black family values, but it was enough to still consider them blood. He knew it upset Sirius, but none of them had any right to tell Regulus off. It was a complicated thing, family. And big or small, all of them had their own issues. Similarly, Remus had long since made the decision that he would not be returning to Lupin Estate that Christmas. Instead he and all of his friends were due back at Potter Cottage, where they’d hang tinsel made of freshly popped corn and give another stirring performance in front of all of Effie and Fleamont’s closest friends and family. Looking forward to it most of all was James. Having missed his parents more than he’d care to admit, he rang Effie repeatedly to ask if there was anything they could bring, and every time Effie told him to just bring themselves.

Though he was better at hiding it than James, Remus could tell that Sirius was excited too. And he was happy for him; Sirius deserved a good Christmas after all he'd been through. And this time Remus was determined not to run out on him.

To avoid thinking about the hard things, like Tomny and how he'd spent nearly every Christmas at the flat for the last six years, Remus tried thinking of the friends he would get to see. There were the Potters' of course, as well as Peter's family. Word on the street was that Simeon was bringing a new Oxbridge girlfriend with him, though Sirius strongly suspected this one of being another beard. There would also be Lottie and her older-by-several-years-boyfriend, Roger. Then of course there were James' many cousins, among them Ajay, the coolest Boston-bound Van Halen fan Remus had ever met. For a while it appeared as though the most up in the air attendee was Lily, who couldn't decide whether she should spend the holidays in the city she'd come to love or return home to visit with the family she missed. In the end she went with the former. Her sister was getting married at the beginning of March anyway, and it was quickly determined that taking the train twice would've been a waste of money.

"Vernon proposed back in October, and Pet wants it over as soon as possible so he can't keep making excuses as to why they can't move out together," Lily explained.

"Sounds to me like the bloke doesn't want to be married all that much," Sirius ragged. "You sure he's not bent or something?"

"You think everyone's bent," Peter said.

"You just haven't met Petunia. Vernon'd be a fool to rush into a marriage with that one," James sniggered. "Kidding, Daisy— kidding."

And so with the demo out of the way, and nothing to do but wait for Albert to cut it together ("How long does that even take?" Peter had asked. No one had a real answer.) Remus resigned himself to a bit of holiday shopping with the girls.

"Before you ask—no, Lottie's not coming," Mary announced sourly, upon his and Lily's arrival to her South Kensington flat.

"She says she'll be back in time for Christmas," Lily said in favour of her love-sick friend. "Apparently she's got a big surprise too."

"As long as it isn't a baby," Marlene murmured snidely, picking at the pilling on her wool jumper. She seemed to realise what she'd said a second later, and they turned to look at each other nervously, then at Remus in apology.

"I-I didn't mean that Remus. I'm sure Tomny is—"

“We taking the tube or shanks’ pony?” Was his only reply.

Yes, in true Remus Lupin fashion, he’d neglected telling any of his friends what had exactly gone down between him and Tomny outside that Whitechapel cafe. He didn’t pretend to be entirely innocent, but he kept the details to a minimum even as Sirius berated him for answers. All anyone really knew was that Remus had fucked up. Badly.

I’m sure you’re worried for nothing, Sirius had said. You do that. Mooning Moony, remember?

And because he didn’t want to admit to just how horrible he’d really been, Remus let Sirius believe it.

With Christmas looming, Remus thought more than once that he should at least send a gift. Not in apology—Tomny would’ve never accepted charity in exchange for such a slight—but rather, something for the baby. But when the girls finally dragged him down to Harrods, he nearly had a panic attack simply walking into the baby section. In the end it was Lily who picked something out on his behalf. He asked her not to tell him what it was; he simply gave her the money and they posted the package the next day.

“Yes, Mum, we’re going to stay the night,” James said, as he prattled to Effie over the phone. “No, we’ve all got Boxing Day off work. Miracle, innit? ... I'm sorry— 'isn't it' . Now are you sure there isn’t anything we can bring? … Yes, I think we can manage bread rolls… Huh? What do you mean Aunty Jai’s doing the canapés? … Tell her no! She always overdoes it with the mascarpone.”

Across the living room, Sirius smirked wryly in Lily’s direction.

“Got yourself a real winner there, Evans.”

She glanced up from the book she was reading. “What can I say, the lad’s got priorities.”

They all sniggered, except for Peter, who was tucked up beside the coffee table, eyebrows furrowed in concentration. He’d been there all morning, sketching out ideas for their first ever band poster. It’d taken him several tries, and unsurprisingly, Sirius turned out to be quite the critic, but Remus enjoyed watching Peter's process. In the end he'd settled on a sort of collage-style design, similar to the ones bands like the Buzzcocks and Sex Pistols had plastered around the city's seediest underbellies in the past. Using one of the magazines Mary had left lying around the flat, he cut up an advert meant for sunglasses and used the model's pretty black and white image as the poster's centrepiece while replacing the inside of lenses with large mish-mashed letters spelling out 'Marauders'. Around the woman he'd painted swirling black lines, some solid and others dotted like boundary lines on a map, and near the bottom, a checker print pattern advertised their Saturday night shows at the Shoestring-upon-Thames. The entire thing had a sort of 'ransom note effect'—cool, and eerily eye-catching. Remus loved it.

"Right, so Mum says everything's sorted for Christmas," James said, rejoining them only to squeeze in between Lily and Sirius on the sofa. "Hope you don't mind, but I told her you and Moony would be fine sharing a room."

"Ugh, again?" Sirius scoffed. "Fine, but keep him away from the asparagus. He gets gassy."

"Yeah, well, Sirius sleeps in the nude now," Remus retorted.

"And you just love it. In fact, I'll bet you're picturing it right now. My bare arse, right in your f—"

Just then, Peter stood up from his spot on the floor and cleared his throat.

"As much as we all love picturing Sirius nude, do me a favour and picture this hanging on a brick wall in Soho instead."

He turned the poster around for all of them to see, and Remus got to witness it as James and Sirius shot spine-straight on the couch.

"Looks fucking ace, man!"

"Absolutely dynamite!"

Remus resisted a grimace. Weirdos. Six months of living in London and his friends still managed to sound like utter toffs anytime they attempted to lend themselves to any sort of modern slang.

"I think it looks stunning, Peter," Lily said, the picture of loveliness.

“Thanks! But that’s not all, either.” Shoving one hand into his pocket, Peter revealed what appeared to be a small torch no bigger than his thumb. “Voilà!”

“Brilliant,” said Sirius. “Now what is it?”

Without bothering to answer, Peter quickly set the poster down again and rushed across the room. He went first to the front curtains and tugged each of them shut, then he got the lights, plunging them all into moderate darkness.

“Uh… Pete?”

“Just wait for it! ... Shit, I hope this is dark enough.”

There was a short rustling as Peter grabbed the poster and raised it into the air. Then he clicked on his little torch, turned it toward the poster's front, and just like that—all of them gasped. The ink, while invisible under daylight, glowed neon green, revealing a hidden message beneath Peter's work. Staring at it, it was as though the poster had come alive, swirling with neon patterns that glowed in the dark. It felt like an acid trip contained on paper—hatching lines, swirling checkerboard, smiley faces, and little footprints like some ironic homage to the most confusing map of all time. In the very centre was their name, ‘Marauders’, painted on like dripping graffiti.

“Holy shit!” James cried. “Pete, you did that? How?!”

“It's cool, right?” Peter grinned, his teeth shining like tiny radioactive pearls. “It’s a black light. Without it, the ink disappears. See?” He illustrated by flicking the torch on and off. “Nicked it from work. They use ‘em in the print rooms—something to do with photography.”

“ Very cool,” Sirius agreed. “Imagine how that’d look in a club, with all the lights down! We could pour it over our instruments—they’d see us from space!”

“I don’t think it works like that,” Lily cautioned.

Still beaming, Peter set the torch down and got the lights. “I’m gonna print them off at the shop, I think. Dad says he’s willing to give us a discount on ink. Afterwards we can hang 'em up around town, just like Fletcher said.”

“Magnificent plan, old chap!” Sirius declared, leaping up from the sofa. He snatched the poster from Peter and rushed to hold it up against the wall, right next to a large photo of the Rolling Stones playing in Madison Square Garden.

“Whaddya think, lads—lady? Is this the stuff of rock legends or what?”

“I think it looks wonderful, Peter,” Lily commended kindly, standing up from the couch herself and giving Peter a kiss on the cheek as she passed. “I’m going to have a bath before supper. Hopefully you ‘rock stars’ aren't too famous just yet to boil your own rice.”

James saluted her, and Lily smiled once more before disappearing out into the hallway.

“It really does look great,” Remus commended, coming to stand by Peter’s side while Sirius frantically ordered James to get in the kitchen and find enough blu-tack to hang it.

Peter shrugged sheepishly, clearly not used to the praise.

“Not like anyone’s gonna see the rest of it without the black light, but I liked the idea of a secret message.”

Remus nodded. “Very clever.”

Just then the doorbell rang, and Peter volunteered to be the one to go fetch whoever it was. As he slipped out into the hall, Remus strode up to Sirius with his hands in his back pockets.

“S’a bit crooked.”

“Wanna help me then, you giant?”

Remus smirked, stepping up behind him and pressing the length of his torso along Sirius' back. Rather than reach for the poster, Remus cupped the underside of Sirius' wrists and trailed his fingernails along the soft flesh there, slowly drawing his sleeve downwards. Sensing his meaning, Sirius pushed his thighs and arse back toward him, face tilting round—

"Looks like it's still a bit crooked, Moony," called James. Then he stepped up behind Remus and Remus could feel his friend's entire front sandwiched along his spine.

"Hey, Prongs?"

"Hm?"

"Never change."

James smiled. In the end it took all three of them (what's that they say about the idiot and the lightbulb?) but the poster was stuck, and afterwards they were able to stand back and admire it.

“That’s gonna look really fucking good hanging in outside Roundhouse,” Sirius hummed.

“Think we’re gonna have to copyright some of this?” James asked, stroking his chin.

“Eh, we’ll ask Fletcher next time we see him.”

“Speaking of Fletcher…” Peter rounded the doorway, clutching a large gift basket wrapped in cellophane. “Looks like Christmas has come early, lads.”

Alarmed by the sudden gift, they stood back while Peter set the basket down on the coffee table with a short grunt. Already they could see piles of goods—flowers, bottles of champagne, wine-infused chocolate, even a customary tin of digestive biscuits—all peeking out from beneath the wrappings. On top, tied to the cellophane with a comically large red bow, was a note.

‘To my favourite band of ragers,’ it read; ‘Congrats on recording your first demo! Here’s to many more. Love your ol’ pal Fletch’.

“How nice of him,” James said, as Sirius and Peter tore away the wrappings. It was a generous gift, but none of them knew just how generous until they got further down to the bottom.

“Now this is what I’m talking about,” Sirius said, opening a box of Cuban cigars thicker than his thumb and popping one of them into the corner of his mouth. “Ol’ Fletch has taste.”

“Oh yeah, real tasteful,” Remus said, pulling several nudie magazines from the bottom of the basket. Sirius and Peter howled with laughter, and eagerly grabbed them to take a quick flip-through.

“Those can’t be real…”

“Holy shit, would you take a look at that minge!”

"That can't be underwear, can it?"

“Think she flosses with it?”

“Now, now, there’s no need to be crude,” James scoffed virtuously, while turning the page himself. What he found was the centrefold, and he held the magazine vertically to take all of it—or should we say, her — in. “Well, there,” he drawled, “I’ll be she enjoys long walks in the moonlight.”

Sirius sniggered. “More like short walks to the corner, where she—”

“Potter!”

It was Lily, shouting as she made her way down the staircase. Suitably alarmed, James quickly threw the magazine at Sirius, who only panicked and threw it right back. Then James tried to pass it on to Peter instead, who'd already escaped round the coffee table. Desperate, he turned to Remus with the magazine.

“Uh, yeah, nice try.”

Silently groaning, James had just enough time to shove the dirty magazine beneath his shirt before Lily strode into the living room in naught but her robe, her hair twisted up in a green towel.

“Potter, do any of you know where we put those spare towels? Someone keeps forgetting to do the laundry and we’re all out.”

“I was gonna do it tomorrow!” James insisted, a strained smile on his face.

“There’s some in our bathroom, Evans,” Sirius offered. “Take your pick.”

She nodded in thanks, and then spotted the gift basket.

“Oh? What’s this?” She strode forward to pluck out the flowers and raise them to her nose. “These smell lovely.”

“Fletcher sent it over,” Peter said, offering her the bottle of champagne as well. “A little congrats for the demo.”

“That was nice of him.”

James cleared his throat, cheeks slightly rosy. “Yeah, that’s er—what I said.”

Lily raised the bottle. “We have a bit of time before I wanted to start supper anyway, shall we celebrate early?”

Each of them shared an enthusiastic look, and Lily smiled and headed straight into the kitchen. As soon as she was gone, Peter, Sirius, and Remus broke down sniggering again, while James sagged in relief.

“Potter, can you come grab the glasses?”

“Coming!” Flashing them each a glare, James ripped the magazine out from under his shirt and tossed it at Sirius before following his girlfriend. Sirius was still chuckling as he opened the rumpled magazine to a woman with a particularly accentuated bottom.

“Hey Lupin, you’re an arse-man right? Get a load ‘a this.”

Remus glanced down at the page.

“Yeah, it’s nice but…” Cheekily, he grabbed a handful of Sirius’ bum through his jeans. “Not quite what I’m looking for.”

Sirius raised his chin smugly.

“Pervert.”

Next to them, Peter gave a sigh, which ended abruptly as the phone rang again.

“I’ll get it!”

As Peter rushed off toward the nook and Lily and James made themselves busy in the kitchen, Remus pulled the magazine from Sirius’ hands and quickly gathered him around the waist, holding them together. Now chest to chest, Sirius reached down and tucked either hand in Remus’ back pockets.

“I like this,” he purred. “You—being affectionate. You’re normally so stingy.”

“Am not,” Remus retorted. “You’re just insatiable.”

“Mmm… maybe.” With a cheeky smirk, Sirius dropped his head down against the top of Remus’ chest. “Christmas is in a few days.”

“Apt observation, Padfoot.”

“I only mean to say that, are you sure you don’t want to go home?”

“What do you mean? This is my home.”

“I know, but Giles—”

“Called him already. Everything’s settled. I’m going to the Potters’ with you. That is… as long as you still want me to.”

Sirius pinched his arse sharply. “See? Stingy.”

Remus grinned, and rested his chin against the top of Sirius’ head. They stayed there a while, unconsciously rocking, until the sound of the cork popping made Sirius straighten up and cheer; “Yeah, pour us a round, Potter!”

James called back eagerly, ready to comply, but just then Peter’s surprised voice cut through all of them.

“I don’t understand… You're saying there’s something wrong with the demo?”

All of them froze, the same thought shooting through their brains; Demo?!

Sirius was moving first. He rushed Peter, already set on wrestling the phone from his hands while Peter fought back and James attempted to separate them.

“Bloody—give it here, Pete!”

“Gerroff, Sirius!”

Remus came up from behind, reaching past both of them to hit the centre button on the speaker phone. Instantly Fletcher’s quick babbling cut through;

“—Nothing’s wrong, don’t get your knickers in a twist. Just let me explain and you’ll see that—”

Sirius made a grab for the machine, holding it up to his face. “Fletcher!”

“Ah! Mr. Black, if it ain’t my favourite—”

“Yeah, yeah, we’re all here. Now what’s this about our demo?”

“Nothing! Nothing! Recording went great—s’being cut together as we speak. It’s just that we’ve hit a little snag with the rights, is all.”

“The rights?” James echoed. “What rights?”

“Oh, you know, the ones that say you own your music and all that. Ooh, speaking ‘a which, you get my gift? Was supposed ‘tah arrive today.”

“Yes, we just opened it but—”

“Fantastic! Can’t trust the post nowadays, I’m telling ya. Pour one out for little ol’ me, would’ya?”

“Fletcher.” Remus grabbed Sirius’ wrists, leaning his mouth into the speakerphone. “Tell us what’s going on.”

There was a slight pause, in which Fletcher cleared his throat.

“Well, you's see, it's like this—as an unsigned band you’ve got the right to record wherever you want s’long as you can pay fur’ it, but I guess EMI’s come out with these new rules, right. According to them and their poncy lawyers, your use of studio equipment means that any and all right to the music is fifty percent theirs, and until we pay that fifty percent’s worth, they won’t release it to us.”

“But we didn’t even use their equipment!” James insisted. “We brought all of our own instruments. Didn’t even touch an amp!”

“It’s not the amps, son. We paid for the studio time, not the use of their tapes and machinery. You’ve heard the phrase ‘red tape’, yeah? Well, they’re covered in it. Can’t so much as re-record on a paper plate without infringing upon some bullshit rule or the like.”

“Shouldn’t you have known all of this beforehand?” Peter asked scornfully. It earned him a sharp swat from Sirius, which he rebuffed with an eager smack of his own. Stuck between the two of them as they crowded around the machine, Remus was forced to separate the two again before turning back to the speakerphone with a ragged huff of his own.

"Explain it to us again, Fletcher."

“Yes, this can’t be legal," chimed Lily. "I've never heard of any blasted rental agreement that's required you to forfeit fifty percent of your work.”

“Who’s that?” Fletcher demanded.

“My girlfriend,” said James. “But she’s right, ain’t she? What kind of studio makes us pay to use the room and doesn't expect us to record anything?”

“Well, uh—business is business, ya see. Can’t do much when the studio’s withholding the tapes, and it’ll be Christmas in a few days, so our hands are tied until—”

“You promised we’d have that demo before Christmas,” Peter interjected.

“Pete!” Sirius hissed. “Shut up and let the man speak!”

“You shut up!”

“Now I understand any unease,” Feltcher hummed genially; “S’real messy stuff, this is. You know how it goes, the industry takes no prisoners—yada, yada. But don’tchu worry, we’re gonna getcha outta this! It’s just gonna cost a bit more. Copyright charges, legal fees for EMI’s team and whatnot, but it’s really not something to be—”

“Fletcher," Remus cut in, "how much more?”

“Just... twenty-five hundred pounds.”

A short gasp went up from each of them, as if they’d just been sucker-punched in the collective gut. Even for those raised like they’d been, twenty-five hundred pounds was an astronomical amount. It was near the cost of a full term at Hawkings; over twenty times what they’d paid for the van. You could take half that and feed a family of four for a year, maybe two.

“Twenty-five hundred?” Peter shrilled.

"Give or take a few hundred."

"Holy christ... Do you know what we could do with twenty-five hundred pounds?!”

“Buy yerself a whole new album, I suspect,” Fletcher chuckled. “But look, none of us wanna do that. I’ve listened to what Alfred’s cut together and it's really—”

“You mean Albert?”

“What? Oh, yeah, yeah. But I’ve listened to what he’s got going, and lemme be the first to tell ya, that it’s great! You lads could be on the radio in mere weeks, but not if we don’t get this sorted. This is why I didn’t take no managerial fee up front—thing’s like this pop up all the time, them's the brakes. But I'm tellin' ya, we don't pay the charge they're asking for? They keep everything. You Marauders'll have to start over from the ground up."

The gasp became a reluctant whimper as each of them looked at each other. Their songs! Their music. It'd taken so long to get to this point; having to start all over again would be agonising.

"If… we get the money," Sirius started, "what comes next?"

"I've passed what we do have so far onto my pals up at EMI, and they liked what they heard so much that they're offering a contract. Got no details yet, but depending on whether or not they think the full demo's got promise, you could be signed by the end of January."

Signed with EMI? Remus wasn't sure if he wanted to be sick or jump for joy.

"Alright," Sirius said finally, "we'll pay the money. Just make sure we get the rights to our songs back."

"Smashing! If you're quick you can post the cheque today. Just make it out to the office and I'll have my guys work out the rest. It's Christmas soon, so I suppose we'll just have to touch base in January. Look, I know this ain't the news you wanna hear, lads, but you'll learn quick enough that the music industry's just one bottomless pit. You just gotta keep throwing money and promises at it until it throws something back. Cheers."

They hung up, and stood around the phone silently for several minutes. Remus could tell his friends were worried, but he didn't realise how fractured the news had made them until Peter began shouting.

"Did you really just promise to give him twenty-five hundred pounds?"

"Yeah, I did! And we all know where it's gonna come from so you can cut the whinging right there!"

"You don't just get to make all the decisions, Sirius! You're not our bloody manager!"

"You're right, I'm not! But in order to get one, we need a demo, dimbo. So why don't you just stop bleating so the big boys can sort it all out?"

“Screw you! You can’t just promise whatever you want without talking to us first!”

“Easy for you to say, when it ain’t your songs on the line!”

Peter threw his arms up, storming out, and while Lily and James went after him, Remus turned to Sirius.

“You know Peter didn’t mean it that way. Alphard left that money to you, we should find some other way to pay for the rights. You don't have to do it all alone, Sirius.”

“I know,” Sirius said, “but it's my money, and I’m gonna do what I want with it. This isn’t for EMI, or for Fletcher—it’s for all of us. You’ll see, Moons.”

In hindsight, they were stupid to let the issue go so easily. Peter would prove disgruntled over the news for weeks, repeatedly whispering to James how the situation ‘didn’t sit right’, and twenty-five hundred pounds was far too much money to just be ‘tossing away like nothing’. Despite his reputation for playing mediator, James surprised everyone by taking up arms on Sirius’ side. As far as they were concerned, they’d pay out the back end to get their songs back. Adversely, Remus remained more neutral. He couldn’t quite wrap his head around why there was such an issue. It wasn’t like anyone outside of the Shoestring even knew their name; could their unsigned songs be really worth such a fight? Paying for compositions they hadn’t even made any money off of yet felt like paying for thin air. It felt... off.

Come Christmas Eve, Lily had stocked up on any and all entertainment law texts she could get her hands on, almost as determined as Peter to prove that something was wrong.

“I just don’t get it, how could they keep something that’s already paid for? It’s downright stealing. You should've gotten a copy of that rental contract, I can't believe you were so stupid as to not ask for one,” she hissed, standing up from the kitchen table as James waited across from her, dressed in a smart-looking sweater and matching black slacks.

"Didn't think we needed one, Daisy."

“Maybe I should go to the library one more time,” Lily went on saying, “see if there’s a book I missed. Something that could help. Or I know! Maybe one of my professors could...”

“Shush,” James hummed, kissing her hand. “It's Christmas, everyone's at home. Now the library’s closed and we have a party to attend. Think this could wait until tomorrow?”

Reluctantly, Lily nodded, then apologised to the rest of them and excused herself to go get ready for the party.

“She’s right, you know,” Peter said later, already draped out over the sofa with a beer in hand. “We posted that cheque to Fletcher without a second thought."

" 'We' is coming on a bit strong, Pete," James griped.

"I'm only saying, who knows what’s really going on with EMI. I haven’t heard from ‘em—have you, Black?”

“Leave it,” Remus warned him. “Like James said, we can fight about this after Christmas.”

The look Peter gave him was sour, but he said nothing more on the subject and a few moments later Sirius appeared at the foot of the stairs, dressed in an all black suit with his hair handsomely slicked back, a red rose tucked neatly into his lapel. Where he’d gotten it, Remus had no idea.

“Ready to go then?" He asked. "Where’s Evans?”

“I’m here!” Lily called, appearing next to Sirius in the entryway. She was wearing a pretty silk dress the colour of irises and was fiddling with an earring. Before she could even finish, Sirius had her clasped around the waist.

“Don’t you just look gorgeous!” He declared, sweeping her into a waltzing dip right there on the rug. Lily shrieked, embarrassed, then batted him on the arms once he’d put her back on both feet.

“Don’t be silly. It’s only a dress.”

“That’s fucking rubbish.” Sirius tugged on his suit collar pointedly. “Prongs! Come tell your girl she looks absolutely ravishing before I’m forced to seduce her myself.”

“Just try it! I’ve a devious plan of my own if you do,” James replied, grabbing Remus by the face and planting a kiss directly on his cheek.

“Oh yeah? Two can play at that game, Potter.”

Sirius surged Lily from behind again, clasping her in a hug. “Evans! Tu es absolument magnifique,” he moaned. “Les anges se jettent du ciel juste pour témoigner de votre beauté. Si jamais je m’intéressais à la gent féminine, je serais honoré si tu envisages de m'épouser à la suite d’une déception amoureuse avec ce connard. Il ne mérite pas ta ardent beauté!”

“Oh, Sirius, get off of me already,” Lily laughed, struggling out of Sirius’ grip and rushing to grab Remus’ arm instead. “You know I love Remus far too much to cheat. You and Potter will just have to make do with each other.”

“Can do,” James grinned, struggling to give Sirius a fat snog of his own. While they tussled, Peter pushed past with his coat in hand.

“You’re all bloody idiots,” he grumbled. “I’m gonna bring the car ‘round.”

As he went, James grabbed Sirius in a headlock and the two fell onto the ground, a mixture of grunts and laughter following them. Shaking her head, Lily pat Remus’ arm.

“They’ll never change. Shall we go then, darling?”

“Yes, darling,” he replied, “let’s.”

Christmas Eve at the Potters went much like it always did, with warm company, charming decorations and food that was positively to die for. The real party wasn’t to start until the evening of the 25th, but Effie’s penchant for combining her family’s heritage with the Christian holiday always made for a home alight with flavour and festivities. Diya lamps were lit, holly was hung—she even managed to wrangle all the kids into a few rounds of "Jingle Bells". Yes, the home was so warm and inviting that not even Mary and Marlene could be kept away. In Mary’s case, her father and step-mother had decided to holiday in the Canary Islands. Though Mary would have generally preferred warm beaches to icy London winters, she’d remained behind to—as she’d put it—‘work on herself’.

“And who’s to say I can’t do that with a bottle of Bordeaux in either hand?” She’d teased.

Marlene was a bit more complicated. Her family still lived in Lambeth, not far from the Shoestring where they played every weekend, but relations between the McKinnons and their only daughter had been strained ever since Marlene had left home and stopped going to church. Apparently Mrs. McKinnon had attempted contact toward the end of November and Marlene had agreed to return home for tea, but when that meeting ended with a surprise visit from their church's local priest, Marlene had decided to sever all ties indefinitely.

“I’m not giving up my faith,” she’d assured Remus, the first time he’d asked; “but it’s like, you start seeing the world differently when you don’t have the same neighbours around to tell you how everything's just supposed to be. I'm glad my parents sent me to Hawkings. Otherwise, I'm afraid I would've ended up just like them.”

And because he could, Remus had hugged her just a bit tighter that day.

While the addition of Mary and Marlene to the party's already growing guest list was hardly cause for calamity, Remus still couldn't quite understand how the Potters did it. Ever the gracious host, Effie was pleased by the arrival of every new face, and no matter how many appeared in her entry way, she was always able to magic up room for them to rest their feet. Potter Cottage was always a bit extraordinary like that.

After supper, the eight of them congregated in James’ childhood bedroom for some much needed friendship overhaul, and Remus was struck by the realisation that he’d quite missed seeing all of their faces in the same place. Their flat at Number 43 Knoxbridge Road was home now, but there was something nostalgic about cramming into a tiny bedroom with tiny bottles of sherry they’d nicked from their parents' stores. They passed the bottles around until they were all suitably inebriated and afterwards, drew straws to see who got to choose the music. Lily had won most recently and has surprised all of them by putting on a Stevie Wonder album. Perhaps the worst lightweight among them, James had grown drunk off his dad’s Guinness early, and had promptly began singing every track aloud to her.

“Isn’t she loooovely? Isn’t she wooonderful?! Isn’t she precious! Less than one minute—”

“Potter—Potter!” Lily grabbed his face in her hands. “You know that this song’s about a baby, not a girl, right?”

James gave her a bewildered look like it’d never occurred to him before, and then simply smiled, planting a kiss on Lily’s cheek as he continued on with his song.

“—Isn’t she prettyyyy? Truly the angel’s best! Boy, I’m so happyyyy—we have been Heaven-blessed!"

"Ugh, someone please save me from this gross public display of affection," Mary moaned, reaching over to Marlene and snatching the bottle from her hands. She grimaced when she realised it was beer, but by then Marlene had already nudged her pointedly.

"You'd love it if that were you."

"With Potter?!"

"No! Just—getting all the attention."

Mary shrugged, handing her back the beer. "Naturally. Who doesn't like a bit of attention? It's the gooeyness I can't stand."

"I think the word you're looking for is 'bathos'," Sirius snarked. "Moony, bend down so I can chuchoter des mots doux à ton oreille."

"That sounds vaguely dirty."

"Lend me your ear and find out."

"Assez!" Mary hissed. "Bunch of lovesick jessies you all are. C'est incompréhensible."

"I'll cheers to that," said Remus.

"Shall I ask James to give you a kiss as well, Mary?" Lily offered. Mary snidely waved her off, and turned to Marlene once more.

"What's up with you then? Haven't seen you flying solo in ages. Don't tell us Dorcas didn't want to come for Christmas dinner?"

Marlene shook her head. "Tonight's the first night of Hanukkah, so she's spending time with her family."

"You didn't want to be with her?"

"I'll see her on the twenty-sixth. She's promised to save me some sufganiyot."

"Those them little donuts with the jelly in 'em?" Peter moaned, nursing a half-empty bottle of brandy. "Shit, I love those."

"Does it ever make things difficult between you two?" Lottie asked. "You know, growing up with different religions and all."

"Well, we're already both women, so it's not like we can get married even if we wanted to. Dee and her little sister converted after her mum met her step-father. She was only six, but she's got two older brothers and they're agnostic." Marlene began picking at her thumbnail. "Both of our religions denounce homosexuality as a sin, but I know there's more liberal-minded folks out there. Even a few in here, if you know where to look."

"You're welcome," Sirius said, teasing her with a bow. Everyone laughed, and Marlene knocked his shoulder fondly with one fist.

"Dorcas said that America's got its own gay rabbi now, and last year they ordained a lesbian priest."

"Have you found a new dream job then?" Asked James. Marlene shook her head, smiling.

"No, it's just nice to know that we're not alone. Reform is hard, but," she sighed and looked at Lottie, "I guess you could say we're working on it."

Lottie took her hand, and then Peter passed along his bottle of brandy, from which Marlene took a deep swig.

"How is it that America's always ten steps ahead and ten steps behind at the same time?" Mary asked, sounding indignant. "England should have its own gay priest by now."

"Oh, I'm sure we do," Sirius said out of the corner of his mouth. Mary didn't seem to notice.

"I mean, we all know they're there, it's just prejudice keeping things swept under the rug. Like, the last guy I was seeing—"

"Oh my god, did it finally happen?" Marlene cut-in; "Did you finally end up dating a gay guy?"

"Unlabelled actually, although I should've known something was up when he started making lemon drop martinis in my kitchen at three in the morning." Mary smiled to herself. "He was good though, and the lemon drops really were fantastic."

"Glad to see you're already over the last one," Marlene said, before turning to Sirius. "She met him when we were down on Portobello Road, said he was dead gorgeous but he had a prick like a—" She wiggled her pinky suggestively while Mary's jaw dropped and the rest of them descended into copious amounts of laughter.

“Alright, alright! Very funny,” Mary grumbled. “Let’s have a new topic of conversation before I kill myself.”

“Wait, I have one!” Marlene declared, apparently not done in the spotlight. “Potter—” She paused long enough to hide a small beer belch behind her hand; “why didn’t you ever tell us your mum was so fine?”

“McKinnon!" James bellowed, aghast; "You have a girlfriend!”

“And eyes.”

“Nah, she’s right, you know,” Sirius said. “Effie’s just so—blimey. I'm not usually one for Oedipus—mostly 'cause my own mum's a fucking hag—but I swear, Potter, if I were any straighter you'd be calling me Dad."

"Fuck off," James scoffed, cutting Sirius off with a swift pillow to the face. “That’s my mum you’re talking about, dickhead!”

Sirius peeled the pillow back, looking devilish. “Oh, I know.”

“Hey, Lottie,” Lily called, already suitably curled up on the carpet with her head propped up on one of James’ thighs. “When are you gonna tell us about this ‘big surprise’ of yours?”

All heads turned, and Lottie flushed slightly as she made herself busy straightening her skirt. “Well, I wanted to save it for Christmas. Tell everyone all at once, you know?”

“Yeah well, we’re your friends and I’m your brother so out with it,” Peter insisted.

“You’re not pregnant, are you?” Mary asked, making all of the boys seize up. “ ‘Cause if you are, I know this darling shop over on St James’s that makes the cutest babygrows. Kara-Ann used to dress Gigi in them all the time.”

“No, I’m not pregnant!” Lottie snapped. “I’m… I’m getting married!”

For a moment no one breathed. Remus could've heard a pin drop, if not for the party noise going on downstairs. Lily had sat up from James' lap so quickly he was nearly left sprawling, but for all their worldly views and adult-like tendencies, the announcement had come as a sure surprise. Of course, it was Mary who spoke first.

"So just to be clear," she started, "you're not pregnant?"

"Oh Mary!" Huffing and rather than show them a ringless finger, Lottie stood up from the carpet and scooped up her purse, which she'd left lying on James' bed. From inside, she produced a small velvet box. “I couldn’t very well wear it, Mummy’s like a hawk with these sorts of things and I wanted Roger to be there when we told everyone,” she explained, opening it and revealing a diamond the size of Remus’ front tooth. “It belonged to his mother," she crooned. "It’s a family heirloom.”

"Now that's a fucking rock," Sirius gaped. Lottie smiled and slipped it on, and from there the girls crowded around, admiring the ring and showering her with compliments. As the girls celebrated, Remus looked to Sirius, who—with an indignant frown—had reached for Remus' right hand and found it empty.

"Oi, where's your ring?" He hissed quietly. In answer, Remus raised his left hand, showing off the silver band.

"Thought it might keep some of the aunties downstairs at bay if I wore it over here tonight."

"Aunties—bah," Sirius scoffed. "What you should be worried about is keeping me at bay."

He grabbed the front of Remus' jumper, bringing him in for a kiss that left butterflies twirling in his gut. The moment may have stayed a blissful one, had Peter not shot upright on the carpet.

“Married!?” He cried, making all of them jump. “You’re seriously getting married?!”

Lottie looked up from her girls’ huddle. “Don’t get your knickers in a twist, Petey, it’s not like I’m telling you to go out and propose to Moira tomorrow.”

“But we’re eighteen! And Roger’s like—twenty-five!”

“Twenty-eight, actually,” Mary corrected. “He’s an Aquarius with an Aries moon. Very spontaneous, that.”

“Don't start that, Mary, I thought you hated love!”

“Oh, I love love, Peter. It’s the happiness I can’t stand.”

Mary's sarcasm aside, Peter threw his arms up and the others turned back on Lottie once more.

“When did he pop the question, Lot?” Asked Marlene.

“Yesterday."

"YESTERDAY?" Peter bleated. Lottie ignored him;

"I was getting on the train back from Reading and Rog pulled me aside and he never wanted to be apart again. I didn't realise how the distance was affecting him—I thought it was only me. But then he got down on one knee in front of the whole platform and asked me right there! Even the train whistled for us..." She blushed, pink as a little girl; "He kissed me out the window as it was pulling away.”

“Ugh!" Mary wheeled back, hand to her forehead. "The romance of it all!”

"And he's the one then?" Lily asked. "He's the one you want?"

"Couldn't imagine anyone else."

“Then I say congrats, Lot,” James called over to them, already opening his arms for a hug. Beaming, Lottie went around the room to embrace all of them one at a time. Last of all was Peter, who did not so readily open his arms in congratulations and merriment. Instead the two siblings squared off, their expressions so similar it was a wonder they weren't looking in a mirror.

“You really aren’t going to say that happy for me?”

“You want me to lie to my own sister?”

“You could at least pretend then.”

Peter’s nostrils flared. “And do you such a disservice? You don't want to marry him, Lottie, you’re only saying yes 'cause you want to play house. Because without him you don't know who you really are, and you can't be arsed to figure it out on your own.”

Lottie slapped him.

“Screw you, you stupid fucking wanker!" She howled. "Wanting to be loved isn’t a bad thing, Peter! You’re just afraid that no one’s ever going to pick you like Roger's picked me. Just because Moira's family has decided that they don't like you doesn't mean you get to take your pain out on me!"

She stormed out, and with a shared look of anxiety, the rest of the girls inevitably followed. Remus, meanwhile, didn't know what to say. They all shifted their weight uncomfortably while Peter stood by, rubbing his sore cheek and clutching a bottle of Guinness against his chest. Finally, he flopped back down onto the rug and met James' eye.

"Don't say it."

"I think you were a bit harsh there, Pete," James replied anyway.

"A bit?" Echoed Sirius.

"Oh come on, everyone was thinking it! It's not my fault I'm the only one with balls enough to say it." Peter snarled, then waved the bottle of Guinness toward the door. "She's never even been on her own! Always had to have a boyfriend, telling her what to do and where to go! Now what—she's just gonna get married and play housewife forever?"

"If that's what she wants," Remus said.

"Aren't you listening? She doesn't know what she wants! She doesn't know who she is."

"She seems to know enough about you though, didn't she?" Sirius prompted. "C'mon, Wormy, what's the real reason you've flown off the handle? Is it really something to do with Thurnberg?"

"None of your business!"

"Pete." James sidled over, placing a comforting hand on his friend's shoulder. "You can tell us, mate. You know you can tell us, right?"

It didn't take much more than that. Peter had never been one for keeping secrets to himself, and as James bared his familiar sympathy, the explanation came tumbling out.

"You know how Moira and Lottie sometimes hang out?" He moaned. "Well she told Lottie that her parents don't want her seeing me anymore. They don't think it's smart, right? What we're doing with the band... And now that we've left school I guess they don't want their daughter dating some bum."

“Man, fuck them,” Sirius retorted. Remus gave him a sharp look for it, then;

“Did you talk to Moira yourself about it?”

“ ‘Course I talked to her about it.”

“And…?”

“She says she doesn’t want to break up, but if it comes between me and her family, I dunno what she'll choose.”

The words 'not me' seemed to hang in the air, and Sirius gave Remus a look that said ‘I told you so’. Ignoring it, Remus leaned in;

“Have you told her about the demo? How Fletcher’s gonna introduce us to EMI?”

“That’s just more promises. She's tired of promises and I don't blame her.”

“Maybe you should get her to come to a show then,” James offered instead. “It’s been so long since she’s come out to one. Lots has changed since then! Who knows, maybe seeing us actually do something in front of a crowd’ll bring her more on board.”

Peter pursed his lips. “Maybe…”

“And you should apologise to your sister,” Sirius added. “Otherwise she might not invite you to the wedding. Miss all the cake.”

“She never apologises to me,” Peter griped. “Give it a day, she’ll calm down.”

There was a knock at the door, and Simeon stuck his head inside.

“Ho, boys. I know I just arrived and all, but does someone want to tell me why my baby sister’s downstairs crying her pretty eyes out?”

Simeon’s entrance marked the true beginning of the holiday season as far as the Pettigrews went. The next morning the two families came together for a stellar Christmas brunch, and for the first time Remus found himself willingly intermingling with a slew of adults. They asked him things like what he’d been doing since school and what he thought about the housing market and current rate of inflation. When he professed that he didn’t pay much attention to such things they laughed and wrote it off as adolescent charm. It made him wonder how long he'd be able to get away with it.

After they'd all eaten and presents had been opened, James and Sirius managed to corral several of James' cousins and uncles into a game of footie in the back garden. Marlene joined in of course, as did Mr. Potter, who proved surprisingly spritely for a man who'd woken up complaining of a crick in his neck. It still hadn't snowed, although Effie appeared hopeful for some come the evening.

After having spent most of the day avoiding others, eventually Lottie reappeared without so much as a puffy eye in sight. Not long after Roger made his grand entrance and everyone welcomed him, apart from Peter that was. No, Peter stared at Roger like he was a wad of gum stuck to the floor of the Underground. But they all knew Lottie, and she'd never made a habit of asking permission from anyone; Lottie simply did as Lottie pleased. Now, on Christmas Day, Roger had barely managed to get a glass of Mr. Pettigrew's famous mulled wine into his hand before she was gathering the entire house together to make her big announcement.

"We just wanted you all to know," Lottie called, "that Roger and I... are getting married!"

The excitement was immediate; the shriek of joy Mrs. Pettigrew let out could've been heard from space.

"I hope this means you're next," one of James' aunts cooed at Simeon afterwards, as he and his new girlfriend Lorraine stood by to congratulate the happy couple. A humble raconteur himself, Simeon gave an off-hand dismissal and distracted the auntie with talk of his days at Oxford. Remus had only just met Lorraine, but she didn't appear to him all that jealous at the attention Lottie was getting. He could only assume that Simeon picked his girlfriends very meticulously.

"I've never seen such a big Christmas," Lorraine said to him, after the two of them had convened by the buffet table on sheer happenstance. "So many people."

"It's pretty normal around here. You get used to it."

Lorraine cocked her head. "I hear you're in a band."

Remus smiled. Never ending, that.

As the evening slid into night, Remus watched as all of the 'proper adults' traded fruity cocktails for Remy Martin Cognac and expensive red wine imported from France. Mr. Potter broke out his personal stash of cigars, which he offered to each of the boys despite his wife's griping.

"Don't just keep it in your mouth," Simeon instructed. "You gotta bring it down into your lungs. Nice and deep, like this."

He set the cigar against his lips and breathed in, while Peter nodded sharply.

"I know how to do it, I'm not an idiot."

Peter inhaled, and promptly began to hack up a lung.

"Oh Petey," Simeon chuckled, smacking his brother on the back.

"Here, have one of mine," Roger said, offering a packet of Senior Service cigarettes. Peter took one look at him and declined out-right. On Roger's other side, Lottie shot him a nasty glare.

"Think he'll ever get over it?" Lily asked Remus, having apparently been spying as well. They were both sitting across the room, a sofa away from where James and Sirius were playing their own version of "Jingle Bell Rock" to entertain all the little cousins. As they strummed their guitars, Mary appeared behind each of them and fit a Santa hat over their heads. Neither complained.

"Eventually," Remus answered. "I think he's just upset she didn't tell him first."

"I know how it feels."

"Petunia?"

Lily nodded. "Petunia."

He fit an arm around her, cigar poised in the other. He knew things between Lily and her older sister were complicated, and had been ever since Lily left home for her scholarship at Hawkings, but very rarely did she get down about it. Remus resolved that it was good of her. No way he could've tolerated such a sour bint for a sister.

"Looks like you're going to be buying two bridesmaid dresses next year, huh?"

"Looks like it," Lily sighed. "Pet's vicious too. She'll probably have me in some hideous colour. Like chartreuse."

"I dunno, I think you'd look quite good in yellow."

"Chartreuse is more green."

"Even better."

She stuck her tongue out at him. "I'm just glad Pet agreed to let James come so I don't have to take the train alone this time. Took Mum days to wear her down for it."

"Now I'm almost offended you didn't ask me to go."

"Are you?" Lily leaned back to look at him; "Alright. Remus, would you consider coming to meet my entire family at a wedding where you'll be forced to smile and dance with me all night while my wonderful sister judges the fact that your suit isn't perfectly pressed?"

"I'd rather cut off my own leg, Evans."

"Sweet talker." She fit her head onto his shoulder. "Have you given any thought to what you and Sirius'll do while we're away?"

"Work, probably. Write some more songs."

"James has asked that you refrain from having sex on the couch."

"Sirius bought that couch."

This time, she bat him with her hands. "And what is it Tomny's doing for the New Year?"

He was half-laughing when she'd said it, but the moment the thought crossed his mind, Remus' smile began to wane. Already reading his face, Lily clutched his arm tightly to apologise.

"I didn't mean to make you sad, Remus. I only wanted to know how you felt about it."

"S'fine."

"No, I'm sorry… Have you not heard from him at all?"

"No."

"Have you tried calling?"

“Once.”

“And?”

“He didn’t pick up.”

She returned her head to his shoulder, so close that the top of her Santa hat was tickling his cheek. Then she took his hand and squeezed it ever so tight.

“It’ll be alright, love,” Lily said. Her hands were warm.

Across the room, one of the young cousins that had been listening to James and Sirius play suddenly leapt up from the carpet and ran headlong toward the nearest window, screaming for his father to join him.

“Baba, look! Snow!”

The entire room moved at once. A true white Christmas hadn’t been seen in London in almost a decade, and so when everyone pulled the curtains back to reveal the thin blanket of snow covering the back garden, a cheer of awe and excitement went up. Mr. Potter celebrated by breaking out a fresh cask of wine for the adults and toboggans for the kids, who were bundled up in winter kits within the hour and shooting out the back door with their scarves whipping in the wind like racing stripes.

“C’mon, Moons!” Sirius urged, trading the red Santa hat for a woolly cap and shoving it down over Remus’ head himself. Remus let him, and during the split-second when the hat’s rim covered his eyes and doused the entire world into darkness, he pushed all thoughts of Tomny from his mind. It was easier now, after all—Sirius was laughing.

The snow cover was thin but they took turns on the toboggans anyway, flying across the slick grass like melted butter. Potter Cottage’s back garden boasted a wonderful hill just beyond its fence, and they raced around under the blue-cover of the waxing moon. It didn’t take long for the first snowball to be thrown either, and from there on out it became a full-on battle. Remus took a nasty shot to the back of the head, courtesy of James, but was avenged by Lily when she feigned in close only to shove a handful of powder down the back of James' jacket. Remus had no time to gloat; already he was being forced to flee as Sirius began pelting him with several snowballs of his own. He managed to outpace Mary easily, who was struggling not to trip in her heeled winter boots while being chased by a small troupe of James' baby cousins.

“No, no, no! I’m Switzerland!” She shrieked, dodging most of tikes. Unfortunately, Marlene had also followed, and her aim was true—snowball bursting over the back of Mary’s head in one glorious shatter of white.

Remus could feel the sweat that had begun to gather on his back. He’d stopped running long enough to watch James and Peter race down the hill on toboggans, only to come colliding with the frosty ground as Sirius tackled him from behind.

“Moony!” Sirius gasped, pushing his snow-speckled hair out from his eyes; “I’m out of fags. Come get some more with me?”

Remus nearly laughed. It was Christmas, and near-on midnight. Nowhere nearby would be waiting with its lights on to sell them a packet of Silk Cut.

“Here.” He rolled over, pushing Sirius off. “Have some of mine.”

Sirius looked down at the carton Remus offered, then back up at him with an arched brow.

“I said— I’m out of fags. Now come get some with me.”

“Ah.”

They helped each other up from the snow, and after checking to make sure no one was paying attention, made a beeline back toward the house. A circle of aunts and uncles had organised themselves around a fire pit, which was being faithfully tended to by Mr. Potter. They were nearly home-free until Simeon stepped out the back door, a bag of marshmallows in one hand, securely blocking their way with the other.

“You two are in a rush,” he mused.

“Forgot fags inside,” Remus lied, at the same time that Sirius said; “Need to use the loo.”

Looking between them both, Simeon simply smirked and tipped the bag of marshmallows in their direction before stepping past without another word. Only slightly mortified, Remus listened to the chuckle Sirius let out and allowed himself to be pulled inside. They made way for the stairs, but retreated when they heard Effie's voice coming from the first floor landing.

"This way!" Sirius hissed, grabbing Remus by the arm.

“You’re crazy,” Remus laughed, as he was practically dragged through the house and shoved inside one of the hallway cupboards. It was dark and fully crowded with winter kits and the like. Remus was practically tripping over the sea of boots strewn about the floor, but Sirius was already tugging at his clothes—ripping his jacket off of his shoulders with eager fingers.

“Curse you and your infernal hatred for all things cold,” he hissed, while fighting with the thick fleece jumper Remus was wearing underneath.

“Why aren’t we doing this in our room?” Remus demanded, busy feeling around the wall for a light switch.

“Too impatient. Need you now.”

“It’s just upstairs.”

“C’mon, Moons. Where’s your sense of adventure?”

“Absolutely mental, you are.”

“Fuck. You always know just the right things to get me going.”

"I can't bloody see anything."

There was a little click, and Sirius had turned on the single free-hanging light bulb over their heads. He had a right smirk on his face, and when Remus glanced up, he spotted a single bushel of mistletoe wrapped around the bulb.

“Wow," he smirked, "wonder who put that there.”

“You did.”

“Did not. Must’ve grown on its own. Like Christmas magic.”

“I think it’s a fire hazard.”

Sirius tugged off the light.

“Better?”

Remus kissed him. Hard and deep, until they were fully stumbling over the mess around their feet. They were alone, but the house still thrummed with life; they could hear laughter, the call for more firewood, a Christmas album playing off the lounge stereo. The closet smelt of dust and damp, simultaneously wrapped up in cinnamon and cloves of Effie's home cooking. Remus pushed his hand up into Sirius' hair and he felt the remnants of leftover snow tickle his skin. When Sirius spoke, it drove shivers down his spine. It blocked out all other noise, until it was just their bodies and the hazy breaths they traded in the dark.

"Shit, Moony. Little to the left—"

"Fleamont Potter—"

"Oh, fuck. Right there—"

"I don't care if you're hot as the devil himself—"

"Want you—"

"You're going to wear that jacket— oh my!"

For a moment they were blinded by the yellow of the hallway light. Mrs. Potter had swung the closet door wide, looking for a jacket only to come across a pair of boys attached at the lips instead. To her credit, she did not scream, but the look on her face was clearly that of astonishment. Ripping his hand out of Sirius' trousers, Remus leapt away as if electrocuted, lucky they'd really only gotten as far as their dishevelled shirts.

"Hello, dears," she chirped. "Is there any particular reason why you've chosen to coalesce in the hallway cupboard?"

Try as he might, Remus could not come up with an excuse for the life of him.

"This isn't what it looks like, Mrs. Potter!" He cried.

"It isn't?"

"No, we—!"

"Yeah! I—I–I mean, we… We just—!"

It was Sirius who'd finished stammering. He continued on like this for several seconds while Effie simply stared at him, and only shut up when Mr. Potter's voice came hollering down the hall.

"It's the blue one, Effie! The blue one!"

"The blue one…" Mrs. Potter murmured to herself.

"Mum—" Sirius drew up short, flinching as though saying the word had brought him physical pain. Then he opened his mouth again, as if to offer some further desperate explanation, but Mrs. Potter only pressed a single finger to her lips. Slowly she drew the cupboard door toward herself while also reaching into the closet between them. With a sharp tug she freed a blue duffle coat from its hanger and draped it over one arm.

"The blue one," she said, nodding gently. Then, with a knowing smile, she shut the door. For a moment neither of them said anything—as if waiting for the dreaded gotcha!

It never came.

"… Moony?"

"… Yeah, Sirius?"

"Did that really just happen?"

"Y-Yeah... I think it did."

"Oh..."

"Mm."

"Moony?"

"Yes, Sirius?"

"Happy Christmas."

A hand reached across the darkness and found Remus' wrist. He followed its slender fingers, right down to the softness of its palm, and squeezed. Remus smiled.

"Happy Christmas, Sirius."

* * *

Ev'rywhere I hear the sound of marching charging feet, boy,
'Cause summer's here and the time is right for fighting in the street, boy,

Well now what can a poor boy do
Except to sing for a rock n' roll band?
'Cause in sleepy London town
There's just no place for a street fighting man

- "Street Fighting Man" The Rolling Stones, 1968

January 1979

New Year's that year had fallen on a Sunday, and thanks to the British Parliament's great Sunday Observance Act, this meant that there was very little to be done in lieu of partying. The Pettigrews' still hosted their usual get-together, but it was much more subdued compared to the grand ball they'd put on the year before. To respect the sabbath, they served only red wine in tiny crystalline glasses and people mostly mulled around, chatting and smoking in pairs. Mrs. Pettigrew still begged them to perform, and even gifted them a brand-new Marshall amp that helped blow James' old sound out of the water. The songs she suggested were rather drab for a group of wannabe-rockers on their way to the world's stage, but of course they played them for her anyway.

When the holiday lull was over, replaced instead by a blisteringly cold January, the Marauders returned to their home in Shepherd's Bush and got straight to work. Predictably, Lily had made near-on perfect marks in her first term at UCL and rather than drinks, celebrated with a brisk trip to the library to review everything she'd managed to get wrong. Sirius meanwhile had gotten it into his head that if they could excite the studios with their first demo, keeping enough material in their back pocket for a second debut would surely impress. Remus wasn't confident that all of their new tracks would be a hit—Sirius' latest song was called "Wag the Dog" and was really just a thinly-veiled allusion to oral sex with an unsavoury title—but there was something to be said for the effort. When Fletcher called, they'd surely be ready.

Except that Fletcher never called.

Day and night they waited, hoping for even a single scrap of news. When nothing came, they tried phoning the office directly, but they never got anything more than the telephone answering machine and its cheery reel-to-reel tape message.

“ ‘ello! You’ve reached your ol’ pal Fletch, managerial-extraordinaire! ‘Fraid I can’t take your call at the moment, but m’sure I’ll get to it whenever I’m back in me office. Cheerio!”

They’d left so many messages that the machine inevitably over-flowed, and after finally coming to the conclusion that they weren’t getting through, the Marauders were forced to return to their excruciating waiting game. To James this was dismal news; he’d had to spend all Christmas dodging his family's incessant questions about work and future plans for university. Peter was also in a tizzy, though that could’ve been chalked up to his similar problems with Moira.

“We just have to be patient,” Sirius told them, each day they went without any word.

It was laughable of course; Sirius Black had never been patient a day in his life. Despite his stubborn confidence, Remus hadn’t missed the way Sirius would jump every time the phone rang, racing to make sure he was the first one to pick it up. Mid-way through January, James had bitten every nail down to the quick and Peter had struck up the annoying habit of drumming his hands against any available surface at all hours. Even Remus was beginning to feel the burn of it. Each of them had developed a rather poor sleep schedule, working all day to support themselves only to stay up writing and practising through the night. They were smoking all hours, whether it be fags or hash, which led to one late, red-eyed session where one of them had tossed a still-burning roach into the garbage and accidentally started a small bin fire.

In attempts to cull any further acts of arson while also ‘maintaining and expanding their creative minds’, Sirius managed to get his hands on some magic mushrooms from one of the Shoestring’s regulars. While waiting for them to take effect, James had a brilliant breakthrough on one of the riffs he’d been working on. The lyrics came to Remus instantly and while he scrambled to put pen to paper, Sirius grabbed his guitar and Peter picked up his sticks and just like that they were blessed. It was the best song they’d ever written, Remus was sure of it, but then the mushrooms kicked in and everything went black.

When they woke up the next morning, the paper containing Remus' lyrics was missing, save only a few leftover scraps as though a dog had gone at it. With no ferocious animal in sight, they were forced to come to the unfortunate conclusion that one of them must've eaten it.

It wasn't all bad though. Later Remus would look back and reminisce, wishing they hadn't rushed themselves so badly. It all felt rather menacing, the idea that only a few precious months lay between life as an immutable rock and roll idols or a boring nine-to-five. Perhaps the reason James and Peter had thrown themselves into the work head-on was because they couldn't bear the thought of reapplying for unis or spending the next four years in lecture halls; their need for stardom would always appear lesser when compared to Sirius', but that didn't mean they didn't want for it.

"I just don't get why we can't go over there ourselves," Peter huffed. "Fletcher promised us that demo weeks ago! You gave him the money, Sirius, so where is it? He said it'd be a done deal by now."

"We know what Fletcher said, Wormtail. We were all there," Sirius grumbled, draped across the sofa with an arm over his eyes. It was a Wednesday—or a Thursday. None of them had slept, and if they had it'd been fitful and unproductive. Lily was cooking breakfast, and James was fighting with the coffee machine while Remus flicked through the morning radio, hoping to pick up one of the pirate stations that sometimes floated down the Thames.

"Fletcher said these things take time," James reasoned, coming out of the kitchen.

"It's been time! No where's our bloody record contract?"

"How 'bout this, if we don't hear from him by next week then we'll head over there ourselves?" Sirius offered.

"NEXT WEEK?!" Peter smacked his hand down on the sofa arm. "Oh that'll make a real difference. Better yet, why not just wait for Easter, or the Queen's next bloody jubilee?!"

With a frustrated grunt, Sirius swung himself upright on the sofa. The anger in his expression might've culminated as something he'd certainly regret saying, but just then the phone rang, making all of them flinch.

Sirius was on his feet in a second—leaping across the room in a few short strides.

"Hello?!"

For a few seconds Remus was hopeful, but then Sirius' glower returned and he was shouting down the line;

"No, we ain't interested in your bloody election! You can take your Iron Lady and shove 'er up your arse!"

He slammed the receiver down, just as Lily came around the kitchen counter, unfazed by the anger as she offered him a cup of coffee.

"Sirius, maybe it is time you guys pay that manager of yours a real visit."

Sirius took the coffee and stared down at it before finally raising his head in Remus' direction. Having already given up on the radio, Remus met his gaze, and nodded.

"Doesn't feel like there's much else we can do. I'm sure one visit wouldn't hurt."

"Fine," Sirius relinquished. "But I'm gonna call again first. If he doesn't pick up, we'll go over to the bloody office ourselves."

All of them seemed to find this agreeable, and Sirius began punching in the numbers, leaving the phone on speaker-mode as the rest of them waited anxiously, clinging to the edges of their seats. At first the line just rang. And rang. And—

"Wilson, that better be you! About time, been waiting on you all day! Now where's my bloody van? You think this ruddy piano's gonna move itself!?"

Sirius' mouth dropped open, and he quickly shut it.

"Fletcher…? Fletcher, it's me, Sirius Black."

Silence echoed through the phone, and then a short clatter, as though someone had dropped the receiver.

"Blimey—Sirius!" Fletcher cried a moment later; "Didn't realise it was you, son. I was just—er… Waiting on this repair guy! Piano's gone outta tune, gots to get it checked. What can I do for ya?"

"We—uh…" Glancing back at his friends, Sirius cleared his throat. "We've been trying to contact you, Fletch. For ages. It's about our demo. You promised us that—"

"Ah, right, right, the demo! Sorry 'bout that, lads, went outta town for the holidays. Then the missus made a massive stink about going up to visit her parents. They're getting old, you know. Can't hardly get outta bed on their own nowadays, and the government won't do nothin' tah support 'em. You always know a society's gone downhill when it stops taking care 'a its elderly."

The never-ending speech felt like Fletcher's usual harangue, but they were tired and too hungry for answers to entertain it. Luckily Sirius wasn't a complete fool.

"Look, Fletcher, you promised us that demo before Christmas—we paid you for the lawyers' fees for EMI, so what's going on?"

"Tell you's what, how 'bout you and the boys come by my office sometime this week and we can talk all about it? After that we can get the show on the road quick 'nuff, you's jus' got a few more papers to sign, s'all."

"Papers? What papers —Fletcher, we haven't signed anything!"

"What's he talking about?" Peter demanded.

"Er—that's right!" Fletcher cried, still upbeat and dreadfully personable. "Can't do anything wif'out signing them papers first! Gotta set it all straight before we head over to EMI, don't we? Show the big boys we mean business. So let's say you lads come over sometime next week and we'll sort it all out then, yeah?"

"How about today—"

"No!" The manager yelped, before giving a very hearty laugh. "Ahem —I mean, today's no good for me, lads. Got lots of meetings lined up with the studio. Plus I gotta sort out that piano, y'know? In fact—I, uh —I think that's Al with the van now! So I'll see you lads next week, let's say 3 o'clock Wednesday. Sounds great to me. Now ta!"

He hung up very quickly, and they were left to stare at one another. No one said it, but it was clear they all had the same bad feeling.

James reached for his coat, hanging on the back of one of the dining room chairs.

"Right. Who's got the van keys then?"

* * *

BUZZ! BUZZ! BUZZZZZZZ!

“Sirius, he isn’t answering.”

“He’s gonna answer!” BUZZZZ! BUZZZZ!

Remus sighed, turning away from the door.

“Let me try!” Peter insisted, pushing Sirius away from the ringer. He tried several times to no avail, and finally James took a turn. BUZZ! BU–BU–BUZZZZZZZ!

Irritated by the noise, Remus retreated across the pavement and lit a cigarette. Cars passed him by, as did the people, most of them shuffling along quickly so as to avoid the chilly wind that was cutting through Soho like a knife. The next door ‘SEXX’ shop’s neon sign was out, it being before randy-hours, and a bum was sleeping in the doorway opposite the street from them. The whole thing felt as grey as the sky, and not for the first time, Remus got the feeling that their ‘too-good-to-be-true’ moment had finally reached its end.

“Maybe he’s left for the day,” he overheard James say.

“Or maybe he’s still trying to pull the wool over our eyes,” Peter said, ringing the bell once more. With an unhappy grunt, Sirius shoved him out of the way and began hammering his fist against the bell. BUZZ! BUZZ! BUZZ!

“UGH! Moony, come see if you can pick the door!”

“I don’t have a pin or nothing on me,” Remus said, ambling back over. “C’mon, let’s just come back later.”

"He could be in a meeting," James suggested.

“You really believe that shite, Potter?”

“Don’t you? I know you would’ve this morning.”

Sirius scowled at him and turned back to the door. “I don’t care if Rod Stewart and the bloody Queen are shooting a porn rag in his office, he’s—” BUZZ ; “gonna—” BUZZ ; “answer!”

B–BUZZ! B–BUZZ! B–BU—

“Bloody—ALRIGHT!”

It was a woman. She opened the building's front door with a vexing hiss, revealing hair that was bleached to a fry and a robe that was little more than a bit of black lace with a wrap around her middle. She might've been pretty once, but a combination of age and poor luck had left her face looking saggy and tired-looking, smudges of mascara impressed beneath either eye.

"Can I fucking help you?" She shrilled, mouth drawn up to reveal uneven, yellowed teeth.

"We're here to see Fletcher."

"Who?"

"Doug Fletcher," James clarified; "The music rep."

The woman slumped against the doorway, raising a cigarette to her lips. "Sorry, boys. No 'Doug Fletcher' 'ere."

"Yes, yes there is!" Peter insisted. "There were two of them, Doug and Albert! Second floor, office three!"

"Nuh-uh. No offices 'ere either."

"But we were just here last month!"

She drew a deep breath and blew the smoke up over their heads. "Listen, I manage the whole building, and I'm telling ya, I didn't rent to no 'Doug Fletcher'."

"Who's in number three then?" Sirius snapped.

"Can't say. M'sure it goes against some sort 'a renter's agreement or clause or whatever."

"How about if we made it worth your while?"

Shoving his hand into his pocket, Sirius withdrew a pair of rumpled tenners and held the money up. The landlady eyed them sceptically, before reaching out and snapping up the notes, which she tucked into her bra.

"You said flat three? That was a short term rental, only asked for a couple month's lease. Paid in cash too. Guy's name was Mundungie."

" 'Mundungie?'"

“Somethin’ like that, yeah.”

“Do you know if he’s in now?” Urged James.

“Unfortunate if he were, what with the way you four were wailing on the bell, but no. He and his skinny boyfriend moved out this morning.”

“This MORNING?!” They all exclaimed. Unfazed, the woman ashed her cigarette on the doorway and shrugged.

“Bad luck, boys. But hey, maybe you can still catch one of ‘em. I saw the skinny one carrying things out into the alley earlier. Normally I don’t let out to those who I figure are buggerin’ each other, but these days I can’t really be arsed. A tenant’s a tenant, s’long as they pay on time and don’t bring the work home. Are any of you looking for a place then? I could … OI!”

None of them had stuck around long enough to even hear her offer; they were off like lightning the moment she mentioned the alley. Like with much of London, they were forced to leg it all the way down the street, where they looped the corner and found an entrance to a long, grime-encrusted back lot. There they kept running, racing past back doors that lead to various businesses and the steel bin lorries set outside. As they neared the end, Remus nearly tripped on a manhole cover that was left to teeter precariously off to one side. While he was busy having flashbacks to that night in the pit back in Hawkings, Remus heard Sirius give a deep bellow;

“ALBERT!”

Looking up, he spotted Albert near the end of the alley, loading boxes into the back of a large white van.

“Oh shit!”

Scrambling to toss the rest of the boxes inside, Albert threw the van’s doors shut and ran to jump in the front; too bad for him, Sirius got there first. He grabbed Albert by the back collar of her jacket just as he was climbing inside and threw him up against the side of the van, pinning him in place with arm across the base of his throat.

“Talk!” Sirius hissed. “Before we rip your arms off and beat you with them!”

“Alright, alright!” Albert keened. “I’ll talk, just—just don’t hurt me!”

“You little fucking wanker!” James yelled; “You thought you could take our money and just run off? Where the hell is Fletcher?!”

“I–I don’t know!”

Sirius slammed a fist against the side of the van next to Albert's head. “THINK!”

“Okay! Okay! He’s gone, not like, dead or anything, b-but he ain’t here anymore!”

“Where is he then?” Remus barked.

“I dunno, I swear! He dropped me, same as you! Scam’s no good once people start figuring it out so he never sticks around in the same place for long.”

“So it was a scam!” Peter huffed furiously.

“ ‘Course it was a scam! You really think a guy like Mundungus Fletcher had ties to one of the biggest music labels in the country?”

“Mundungus?” Remus echoed. "You've got to be fucking joking me."

Albert shrugged haplessly. “Can’t help what our parents name us, right?”

The Marauders all shared a defeated look. Fuck.

“Look,” Albert rasped, before straining his neck to lessen Sirius’ grip on it; “You seem like nice kids, so I’m gonna do ya a solid and fill you in— eugh!”

“Stop talking,” Sirius growled, bearing his weight down further; “You’re gonna tell us the truth, and you're gonna tell us where our money is, or we're gonna be using your face to scrub the fucking pavement.”

“Alright, poshy, alright. Just ease up a bit, okay? Can’t hardly breathe ‘ere!”

Remus reached over and grabbed Sirius by the shoulders, slowly walking him back until he’d released his grip on the miserable man. Still wheezing, although laying it on entirely too thick, Albert took a moment to massage his windpipe before straightening up.

“It’s a common scam for those who know their way around the industry, innit. You take a group of wannabe rock stars and you promise ‘em big things. Recording contracts, houses, cars, girls, drugs —it don’t matter. They always fall for it, because we're all just as desperate for a piece ‘a the pie as everyone else.”

“You’ve done this before then” James scowled. “Tricked honest people out of their money.”

"They ain't all honest," Albert griped. “It’s easier with young guys—guys like you, fresh off the mummy-daddy money train. You think you know how the world works but you don’t. You think anyone would bend over backwards to make you happy. Give you the shirt off their backs if you only asked for it.”

“I'd be careful not to insult us,” Sirius warned, “or you’re gonna need an extra shirt just to mop up all the blood after we cut you open and sell your kidneys to make up for our losses.”

Albert shrugged, running a hand over his jaw. “Fletch’s been doing this a long time, kid. Longer than you've been around. Hell, even did it to me and my band a few years back.”

“He scammed you too?” Peter asked. “Then why are you working with him?”

“Money’s money. You think you can survive on a janitor’s wage?”

“You’re a janitor? But what about EMI?” James echoed. Then it dawned on him. “You don’t really work at EMI… do you.”

“Sure, I do,” Albert said. “I’m the night janitor. Or I should say, I was the night janitor. Got sacked last week when they found out I’d let you guys inside. Quite enjoyed the sound stuff though. Think I could make a real career out of it one day?”

Looking about ready to explode, Sirius turned away and aimed a sharp kick at the alley wall.

“ FUCK!”

“Nah, don’t sweat it,” Albert said dismissively; “I know exactly how you feel, lads. But my piece of shit band wasn’t gonna get anywhere anyway—realised it when I figured out what Fletch had done. You want my advice? Get out while you can. You boys don’t have a snowball’s chance in hell of making it anywhere. The music industry’s gonna take one look at 'chu, bleed you for all yer worth, and leave ya for dead. Hopes and dreams? That's all bunk. And you're gonna realise it one day when you've woken up feeling like you are dead, wishing you were, and working on crap because the whole world's crap and you're the crappiest crap of all and then maybe—!"

Albert never got to finish. Before he knew what he was doing, Remus had stepped forward and swung at him. He caught the janitor upside the chin, felt the scruff of his stubble against his bare knuckles, and watched as Albert went down beside the van's front tire like a bag of bricks.

"Aw shit, Moons!" James moaned, as they rushed to check that he hadn't done any worse damage. Fortunately, Albert was still breathing. He sat up on the dirty cement, holding his jaw and looking up like he couldn't believe Remus had actually hit him.

"Wha' the 'ell, man?"

"You should've stayed scared of us," Remus said lowly.

Wincing, Albert pulled his hand away and gently tested his jaw. Since it was clearly not broken, he reluctantly stood up and began dusting himself off. "Alright, I can see you're very serious about all of this, so you might as well get what you paid for. Mind if I step back into the van for a moment?"

"Nice try," scoffed Peter. "You tell us what it is we're looking for, and we'll get it for you."

Rolling his eyes, he gestured toward the back doors. "Blue box. Tiny one with the handle."

Eagerly, Peter sprung into action. He went around the side of the van and after a few seconds, came back with a tiny PVC case, filled with various unlabelled tapes.

"What's this?"

"Whaddya mean 'what's this?' That there's your demo."

Four jaws dropped. The contents of the box was little more than a mess of tapes—there had to be at least twenty of them, and most appeared to be wound incorrectly or else had bits of film sticking out. It was a far cry from any professional demo recording.

"You've got to be joking," James said, peering over Peter's shoulder to get a look.

"You keep saying that," Albert remarked. "Sorry lads, but if you wanted something better maybe you shouldn't have hired the janitor to do it."

Already fuming, Remus jumped toward him a second time and Albert fell back into the side of the van with a loud thump, hands up in surrender. "Sorry!" He yelped; "Not funny—not funny at all. My bad, really. Bad Albert, bad! S'just… at least you have something now, right? S'more than any 'a the other poor sods got."

"Have what? This is just a pile of crap," Sirius hissed.

" 'Pile of crap'?" Albert crossed his arms indignantly. "That crap got me fired, I'll have you know. You're lucky you got anything at all. Fletcher's never gone so far for one of his scams before. Getting you in at De Lane was totally unnecessary, if you ask me. Most don't even make it to the office, though I guess that just means he thought you were worth your salt after all. Maybe you should take it as a sign. Maybe you could be that diamond in the rough! That is, if you remember to sign a contract first."

Sirius grabbed hold of Albert's collar again. "We want our money back, shite-for-brains!"

"Hey, I hear you, I really do. But my wallet's empty, mate. Check for yourself. Search the entire van if you must. All you're gonna find is a busted piano and some plastic gold records."

"We should take him to the police," said James.

"You could, but really, what're they gonna do? You have no proof, just little ol' me. I'll bet they don't even hand you a tissue."

"We could crack your damn skull open," Sirius threatened.

"Couple 'a posh school prats like you? Nah, you don't have the guts."

Remus growled; "Try us."

At that, a wide grin split across Albert's face, this time with blood in his teeth.

"Alright, go ahead, beat me into the dirt. But it ain't gonna get you your money back. Ain't gonna bring good ol' Fletch out of hiding. You ain't rock stars, and you ain't no diamond in the rough neither. You're nobodies, and like every other nobody in this Godforsaken city, you four got scammed. So best wake up, lads, 'cause you got about as much chance of making it as rock stars than I do of becoming the Queen of fucking England."

Chapter End Notes

A 'rolodex' is one of those desktop card index used to record names, addresses, and telephone numbers.
A 'live room' (also known as the 'recording booth') is the room in the recording studio where all the sound happening. On the 'other side of the window' would be the recording computers and the sound tech.
A 'babygrow' is like a sleep suit for babies, obviously.
'Footie' is just short for football.
A 'roach' is the butt of a weed/hash cigarette.

De Lane Lae Studios is a real recording studio. It used to be located in Holborn but was moved to Wembley in the early 70s. Lots of big names recorded there, including Jimi Hendrix, Pink Floyd, Queen, and Deep Purple.

The 'Sunday Observance Act' was an act of Parliament in Great Britain that essentially prohibited the use of any building or room for public entertainment or debate on a Sunday. While not necessarily enforceable in private homes, it was generally frowned upon to hold big gatherings on the "Lord's Day". It was repealed in 2005.

Also this probably doesn't need to be added but in the UK the "ground floor" is the equivalent of the first floor in North America, so a "first floor landing" is technically one floor off the ground, ie. "second level".

Ellen Barrett was the first [openly] lesbian priest in America, ordained in 1977 following the Episcopal Church approved the ordination of women. America's first openly-gay rabbi was Allen Bennett, who declared himself gay in 1978. He was the rabbi who would later officiate the funeral of Harvey Milk later that same year.

The first night of Hanukkah would've indeed fallen on Dec 24th in 1978, and although it's not the most important holiday to the Jewish community, it felt important to me that Dorcas would've been spending the night with her family. Also it probably [very likely] didn't snow in London on Christmas Day in 1978 but I'm pretending it did.

Okay that's all for my notes, see you guys next week on the 18th for the first day of 2022's Hanukkah!

Chapter 100: Phone Off the Hook

Chapter Summary

Tensions are mounting as the boys struggle to pick up the pieces following Fletcher's betrayal. Remus' birthday rolls around, and the band takes a much needed holiday.

Chapter Notes

Happy first day of Chanukah! I wish all those celebrating a wonderful time. Hanukkah Sameach!
Also, happy 100th Cadence chapter as well! I remember picturing a number like this and being absolutely boggled and now... Well, I'm still boggled lol.

This chapter is dedicated to Nour, my rotten solider, my sweet cheese, my gOoD tImE bOy! I seriously love you, Nour, and I'm so thankful for you. Happy 100th chapter, it's yours! (And it's a good one <3)

Note: There is some sexual content in this chapter. Again, it's pretty mild by ao3 standards, but if you wish to avoid, look for the ">>>" and resume reading again at the following "<<<". Other than that there is only mild drinking and angst, lol.

Finally, I chose to feature the song "Vienna" by Billy Joel within this chapter despite the fact that its come to be a bit of a meme what with the rise of tiktok. Really, I had no choice but to put it in. It was the only song for the scene, so to speak, and Billy Joel really is an amazing lyricist. As always, I've timed the song's pacing to my own general reading speed. Feel free to play it while you read.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Saturday night, gotta gig with a band,
Playing the electric guitar;
Someday I'm going to make it,
Going to be a super-duper-star;

Get a big flashy car,
And a house for my Ma;
The big break better happen soon,
Because I'm pushing twenty-one…

- “Success Story” The Who, 1975

Late February 1979

It would’ve been easy to pretend as though Fletcher hadn’t gotten to them. As though his scam and subsequent betrayal hadn’t knocked the wind from their sails and left them stranded in a sea of doubt. Remus imagined it as headlines:

Armageddon: London Band Strikes Fool’s Gold!

Verdict’s Out on Marauders—‘Mental Makes NO MONEY!’

Messers See Themselves Out: What’s next for this band of willfully ignorant twats?

They each laughed when one of them made a joke about it, but eventually the laughter would filter off into unease, and then came the restlessness. What was next for Marauders? Could this really be it? They'd promised their parents one year... Was fate finally telling them it was time to throw in the towel now? After all this time?

“Bollocks!” Sirius would growl. “It’s just a setback, all bands have ‘em! We’ll work harder—practice every day. Eventually we'll get into a real studio! And fuck managers, they’re all money-grubbing bastards anyway. We’ll do it ourselves, no one knows Marauders like we do. No one knows us like we do.”

And for a while they believed him, but then life began to creep back in—as it tended to—with its usual responsibilities and when no grand opportunity had presented itself on either the real or metaphorical doorstep, the Marauders were finally forced to admit that their music might be taking a back seat. All of their friends were busy these days; Peter had quit working in the basement of his dad’s paper company to go ink illustrations for the comic artists upstairs, and James had been promoted to head waiter at the restaurant. Still madly in love with her fiancé, Lottie continued splitting her time between London and Reading, planning her wedding around train rides and taxi fares while Marlene continued working hard at the non-profit and on her relationship with Dorcas. Out of all of them, Mary was the easiest to pin down. So far she had invited them to several showcases at her conservatory. Being generally busy and not really that big a fan of opera, Remus had only gone to the one, but even he couldn't deny the fact that Mary was brilliant. In just one year she'd managed to expand her voice enough to garner her own solo.

"Brilliant!" Sirius declared, once the concert had ended and they'd all gathered in the lobby. "Assolutamente fantastico! Best contralto in the county."

It was as close as Sirius came to being upbeat since the Fletcher incident. They'd all taken it hard, but Sirius more-so, perhaps just because he'd been the one to vouch for Fletcher the most.

Humbling accepting Sirius' praise, Mary kissed his cheek as Lily handed her friend a small bouquet of roses. Then she beckoned another man over. He was handsome; Remus recognised him as her partner in one of the duets.

"Everyone, this is Claude."

Claude was gone a week later. Last Remus heard Mary was dating some Austrian guy now she'd met while clubbing in St James, but she'd dumped him too the minute things started getting too serious. As far as Remus could tell, Mary quite fancied most of the men she dated, but she knew how to call it quits when they inevitably began pushing for more than she was willing to give. If only they could all be so pragmatic.

Still nursing the gaping wound Fletcher's betrayal had left on his pride, Sirius insisted they made use of every moment the four of them were home together to work on their music. While Lily was busy with school or otherwise fielding phone calls from Lottie as she fussed over wedding caterers and floral arrangements, the Marauders were downstairs in the basement, hard at work. Perhaps too hard. Sirius had deemed their usual 'jam routine' practice-style a futile effort, with too much time spent on haphazard drivel and not enough on overall cohesion. He came at James like a drill sergeant, and Peter like a prison warden—viciously instructing them on their own instruments and not accepting anything less than perfect.

It was unlike them to argue during practice, but after Sirius had spent an entire afternoon meticulously scrutinizing their latest composition, James slumped down on the basement couch with an irritated huff.

"I don't get it," he moaned, "the song's already finished, and I say it's fine!"

"It's badass," added Peter. James nodded, one arm thrust outward in ready agreement.

"Yeah, it's... Shit, it's punk."

"Haven't you been listening?" Sirius snapped. "We're not punk! Tell 'em, Moony!"

Remus said nothing, cravenly plucking at a string on his bass and making himself look busy as though the instrument was ever anything less than in-tune.

"Punk is in," James rebuffed.

"And already on its way out! God, I swear we walked into Fletcher's office and you were staring at the ceiling."

"Who gives a fuck where I was staring, he conned us!"

"Yes, and maybe if we stopped looking at it as just a bad thing, we could learn something!"

"Dunno what you're gonna learn," Peter grumbled quietly. "That demo tape we got back was all rubbish. Not a bit of it was usable."

Sirius ignored the comment, as he did with most things that refused to go his way, and went to stand in front of his mike stand.

"Now again, and bloody do it right this time!" He barked, loudly enough that the feedback from the microphone made all of them wince.

One didn't have to be a genius to realise that Sirius was buckling under the pressure. He had been ever since Fletcher, but Remus knew the real reason for the fire that'd been lit under his arse hit a lot closer to home. Near the end of January, a letter had arrived for James stamped with the University of Exeter's seal. They'd all puzzled over it initially, but when James refused to let any of them read it, Sirius' contemptuous side began to rear its ugly head again.

“Exeter? What’s Exeter University doing sending you post? Are they that desperate for a decent football team?”

James didn’t rise to the bait, and so in answer, Sirius leaned over the back of his dining room chair and snapped the letter up. James was on him in a second, but already Sirius’ teasing smile had vanished.

“They’ve accepted you,” he said, clutching the letter hard enough that his knuckles turned white. “Faculty of Business and Economics…

What the fuck do you know about economics, Prongs?"

"It's just an admissions letter," James replied bitingly. "Dad has an undergraduate degree in economics, right, so when I applied I just thought that—"

"You applied?!"

"No, I deferred, you nob! Last year. It's just that time, I expect…"

Sirius laughed humourlessly. "So will you go then? Be a good boy and head off to college just like Mummy and Daddy expect?"

"Sod off. I'm here, aren't I?"

"For now."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

Sirius ignored him. "Did you say yes?"

"No. But could you really blame me if I had?"

The tone in James' voice was deadly, and Remus could tell by the way Sirius flinched that he felt it too. Desperate to fuel his anger, he whirled next on Peter, who'd been quietly scribbling in a notepad as though he couldn't be bothered with any of it.

"And you?" He demanded. "Have you gotten any fancy letters you'd like to share with the class?"

Confused, Peter faltered, and Sirius snatched the notepad from his hands.

"What is this anyway, huh?! More illustrations for work? Work—work—bloody work! When's the last time you put some real practice in on the drums, huh?! I thought you wanted to be the next Ginger Baker, not Walt fucking Disney!"

James got between them;

"Come off it, Black—leave Pete alone!"

"I'm only saying, he's been real quiet!"

Things might've gotten worse, had Remus not reached over and snatched the letter and the sketches away from Sirius himself.

“That’s enough, Pads. I think it’s probably time we all take a break… Cool down a bit.”

The look Sirius gave him could’ve turned a lesser man to stone, but off he went—ashamed and still entirely pissed off. They heard every stomping step on the staircase, and after that—the slam of a bedroom door. Quietly, Remus mourned. He'd never been exiled to the couch before, but he supposed there was a first time for everything.

“I’m not going to Exeter, Moony,” James said later, when Sirius still hadn’t come down.

“I know, Prongs.”

“Sirius just thinks he wants it more than anyone else.”

Out of loyalty for his boyfriend, Remus nearly found himself telling James that he was right—that Sirius did want it more than anyone else. The band had been Sirius' dream for longer than Remus had even known him. Once Remus had asked him who his favourite was. He'd been expecting Bowie, maybe T. Rex or Roxy Music, but Sirius had shot them all down.

My band, he'd said, because my band's gonna be the best.

Remus hadn't believed him then, but he'd believed him a month ago, and he wanted to believe him now.

Only, he hadn’t anticipated what that really meant.

No one brought up James' Exeter letter after that night, and eventually days—and then weeks, had passed altogether. They continued with their Saturday gigs at the Shoestring, but it was clear something had changed. All of their naive enthusiasm had been traded for frustration; the Marauders were tired. Any frequenting fans they’d managed to garner before Fletcher had been put off when they’d realised that their once beautiful singer had been replaced by an angry boy too obsessed with perfection to bother with a simple pint during working hours. As a result the band’s showmanship was suffering. They barely had the energy to play their instruments anymore, let alone interact with their audience. Not all days were tough though, just most of them.

Remus’ nineteenth birthday was set to fall on a Saturday that year, and a sure cause for celebration. Though the ridiculousness of his eighteenth would be hard-pressed to be outdone, the anticipation of an entire pub of inebriated strangers, all singing directly to him, made Remus want to crawl into the deepest, darkest hole he could find.

It was one week to the day of his approaching humiliation when the Marauders arrived in Lambeth for their usual gig. The night had started alright, but then quickly spiralled out of control. James' new amp kept losing power and Sirius' microphone insisted on screeching feedback into the audience's ears, and the drinks they'd downed to help with their hangovers wasn't doing anything for their general playing. It was mortifying to see the room jump with every squeal of the mike, but not so mortifying as the face Sirius made when the first bout of heckling reached his ears.

"Christ, give us a break already, why don't cha?"

"Yeah, get off the stage! Send up someone who can actually play something!"

And that was all it took. No less than three seconds later, the entire pub was bearing witness to the great eschaton that was Sirius Black's temper.

"FUCK YOU! If you think you can do better then how 'bout you peel that crusty arse of yours outta that chair and give it go, fuckin' tosspot!"

The enraged men stood up and Sirius leapt down to meet them, backed up by an equally inebriated James and a heavily frustrated Peter. The girls were there too, with Dorcas and Mary screaming threats and Marlene about ready to smash her beer bottle over the head of the first person who dared call Sirius a ponce. Ray managed to break up the scuffle before either group could really start battering the other, but he wasn't very impressed that they'd driven off paying customers when the night had barely begun. After their set he pulled them aside and gave them the grave news. Ray was cancelling next week's show, as well as the one after that, and Sirius was to go on an immediate holiday.

"What the hell, Ray?!" Sirius demanded. "You're sacking me?"

"Don't tempt me, princess. You four were an utter disgrace up there tonight. This is a pub, not a bloody boxing ring! Now the show's been cancelled, so do yourselves a favour and take the time to get your bleedin' act together."

It was another defeat, this time from someone they admired, and they were all thinking it;

Go home, you're not good enough today. Come back tomorrow. Or never.

Deep down Remus knew that Ray had good intentions, but none of them dared say anything in his favour as they packed their instruments into the back of the van, and especially not after Sirius screamed and hurled a glass bottle against the brick wall of the alley for good measure.

"Well, I for one think it's a good thing," Peter grumbled on the drive home. "Could use the practice anyway. We sound like shit."

"We sound fine!" Sirius snarled at him.

"Yeah, well since when has 'fine' gotten anyone a record deal? We're all out of sync. You can't decide what key it is you're singing in and half the time it's like the rest of us are playing completely different songs."

"Then maybe you should take a look at the setlist for once, Wormtail, instead of getting off your face on Ray's free Guinness!"

"You can piss right off, Sirius! You've been like this for weeks, always slagging off. You used to be cool about everything—or most things, anyway. Now it's like you've gone and turned into your bloody mother."

Remus had to hand it to Peter, he always did know how to go for the throat.

As Lily spun around in the front seat, face engulfed in abject horror, Sirius pulled the sweat towel from around his neck and whipped it at Peter's head.

"Here, Pettigrew, have mine! Since you're so intent on throwing in the bloody towel! Boy, you and Ray sure are a pair!"

Remus groaned, trying to reach between then; "C'mon, guys, that's enough."

"I ain't throwing in the towel!" Peter cried, snubbing Remus completely. "And neither is Ray! He only told us to take a break—"

"WE DON'T NEED A BREAK!"

"Enough!" Lily wailed, slamming her hand down on the passenger's side armrest. "Keep it up and you're going to make Potter drive off the bloody road! What the four of you need is sleep. Sleep and some actual rest. No more killing yourselves over all this, and for God's sake, no more fighting! Now… James and I are going away for Pet's wedding in a few days, and I think the rest of you should do the same."

"Ah, and I suppose that means dear Petunia's extended a few more plus-ones?" Sirius drawled.

Lily's eyes narrowed vexingly. "No, I only meant that you should get out of the house for a while and stop moping around like miserable, squabbling children. Lottie's wedding is coming up too, and I won't have you ruddy idiots ruining it by being in such a mood."

"And where would you suggest we go, o' wise one?"

"Well, Peter's going to Moira's, for example."

Sirius shot Peter a nasty glare. "I'm sure Stratford's just idyllic for taking the air."

Before Peter could fire back a retort, Remus reached across the van's bench and took his friend's shoulder. "He doesn't mean it, Pete."

"Don't talk for me," Sirius snapped. "You're not my sodding mother."

The comment left a sour note in all of their mouths, and no one spoke any more of of mothers or weddings until they'd passed from Kensington back into Shepherd's Bush.

"Maybe a holiday would be good for all of us," James suggested haggardly. "It's like Daisy said, she and I are going up to Liverpool, and Pete's off with Moira. Moony, Black—the two of you could take the van and go anywhere you wanted. How 'bout Devon? The house there is always empty this time of year. It'll be chilly, sure, but I'm sure Mum and Dad wouldn't mind lending you the keys."

"Oh, yes, Devon!" Sirius sang tersely. "Where the young go to cry and the old go to die. I'm sure there'll be plenty to do. We can go to the pub with all the locals—dip our toes in the ocean and see how long it takes them to fall off."

"I've never been to the sea," said Remus, blandly. This was apparently quite the revelation, as Sirius and Peter whirled on him very suddenly. Up ahead, James was already adjusting the rear view mirror while Lily craned her head around as well, mouth open in a tiny 'o'.

“Never, Remus?”

“Well… Maybe once when I was really young, but I don’t remember it.”

"You came all the way to Dover to get me," Sirius pointed out.

"Yes, and I was a bit too preoccupied to go hunting for seashells, if you didn't notice."

Sirius looked away, but in the front seat, James was practically doing a jig.

“There then!” He declared. “Black, why don’t you take Lupin to the sea? It’ll be like an early birthday trip. You can take the van—make a road-trip out of it if you'd really like. I'm sure Moony can swing the time off work, hasn't very well asked for any time off before, have you, Moons?”

Not wanting to step on any toes, Remus glanced warily at Sirius. He didn't look excited by the idea, but at the risk of sounding like an absolute arse, Sirius simply turned his cheek into his shoulder and muttered a quiet, "Whatever."

Remus tried not to let it show, but secretly he was glad they were getting out of town for a while. Ever since Fletcher, the flat had taken on a rather dismal disposition. Dishes had started to pile up in the sink, and more than once they’d missed putting the bin out on the curb for pick up. It wasn’t that they’d all suddenly become slobs, more like there was so little time for anything else. Work, band—no play. Lily did her best to stay on top of things, but none of them had ever considered her a maid, nor would she tolerate being treated as such. That evening, when they returned to an entryway in desperate need of a mop, Lily turned on them and said just three words.

“Clean. Then pack.”

No one argued.

The next morning, Remus called Dorcas and begged her to cover his shifts at the music shop. She agreed, only after much bribery and enough begging that Remus swore his pride would never be the same again. Come Tuesday, when James and Lily were set to leave on a train from King’s Cross, the rest of them gathered their things together and said their goodbyes. Peter had already caught the early train to Moira’s, and Remus was just getting ready to give his friends a lift to the station when Mr. Potter made an unannounced visit. He'd been kind enough to drop off the keys for the holiday house and even offered to drive the happy couple to the station himself so that Remus and Sirius could get on the road at a reasonable hour. Positively buzzing, he stood in the entryway pouring over an A to Z road map that was probably as old as they were.

"Effie told me of your plans last night, and I think it's brilliant!" He declared, in the same up-beat tone as his son days before. "The house itself is in Dawlish, remember, but Exeter's just a half hour up the road if you get bored. Sometimes the power gets a bit finicky right after winter, so if it goes out just flip the circuit breaker in the garage. Much easier than when I was a boy—they were all real fuses back then. If you have any questions you can always give Effie and I the bell. Though… I suspect the two of you will be just fine."

He gave them a sort of cheeky side-eye, and Remus was left with the feeling that Effie had let him in on more than just their spur-of-the-moment holiday plans.

"Thanks, Dad," Sirius said, wrapping his arms around the older man. Remus hugged him too, albeit less firmly, and afterwards Sirius nudged him, already turning for the stairs.

"I'm gonna go get out bags," he said, folding up the map. He passed James and Lily on his way up the staircase, and while Lily simply embraced Sirius and left a kiss on his cheek before carrying on down, James took a moment to pull him aside.

"It'll be good," Remus heard him murmur; "Just try and relax."

If Sirius said anything in reply, Remus didn't catch it. Already Lily was approaching him and Monty, suitcase in one hand, handbag in the other.

"Lily!" Monty cried. "You get lovelier every time I see you."

"Hello, Monty," Lily smiled, setting down her bags so she might hug him also. "Thank you so much for offering to drive James and I to the station. We really could've taken a taxi."

"Nonsense, it's no problem at all. Is this everything then?"

"Yes, should be. James is just bringing his suit down now."

"So what's the verdict, Evans?" Remus asked. "Are you wearing chartreuse?"

"Worse." Bending down, Lily opened the top of the suitcase to reveal a pastel yellow dress covered in frilly satin flowers. "I'm considering spilling wine on it halfway through the ceremony just so I can change."

"If you really want to stop the show you could just spill the wine on Petunia instead."

Smirking, Lily began to rifle through her things. "Here," she said, pulling out a tiny vinyl bag and pushing it into his hands. "My camera. Thought you might want to take it with you."

Remus stared at the device dubiously, afraid any sudden jostle might break it. "Your camera? But don't you want it for the wedding?"

"Knowing Pet, there'll be plenty of cameras around already. And besides, she's got me on child-rearing duty the entire time anyway. Vernon's got cousins coming in from the countryside and she's invited all the neighbours... Now there's two full rolls of film in there. It should work fine so long as you don't drop it into the sea or something."

"No promises," Remus smiled, but he clutched the device protectively.

With a quick kiss on the cheek goodbye, Lily zipped up her suitcase and made to carry it out the door. Remus went to help, but was instantly rebuffed by Monty as he gathered Lily's things in one arm and used the other to walk her down to the flat's front steps.

"All ready then?" James chirped, flouncing down to the main floor with a garment bag over one shoulder.

"Yup. That your suit then?"

"Mhm. Freshly tailored, matter-of-fact. Had to let it out a bit in the waist… I think I've gained weight, Moons."

"You mean since secondary school?" Remus gave him the quick once over. "Think it's normal, mate."

"You're probably right. 'Sides, Lily says she likes it. More padding to cuddle." James pat his gut fondly. "We'll be back next Sunday. Now are you sure you and Sirius are going to be okay on your own?"

“ ‘Course. I’ll feed and walk him twice a day.”

“That’s my boy.”

They embraced, and after a quick check to see that he had his keys, James blessed Remus with his final goodbyes and slipped out the front door. The instant he’d gone, Sirius’ voice echoed down from the floor above.

“Moony! Did you see what happened to that copy of ‘NME’ I left on the dresser table? I just bought it…”

“I packed it!” Remus called back. “Thought you might like to have it on the road.”

“Oh. Good thinking.”

Sirius descended the steps a few moments later. He brought with him their largest trunk—their! Felt a bit crazy to think about—as well as a familiar leather guitar case, still just as worn and chipped as the day Andy had gifted it to him.

“Are you sure you want to bring that?” Remus asked, eyeing the guitar warily. “I think the whole purpose of this is to… you know, get away from it for a while.”

“We have to practice, don’t we?”

“You’re not going to get rusty in one week.”

Sirius looked down at the case, lips pursed stubbornly. Remus was already readying himself for a row, when Sirius sighed and set the guitar down against the entryway wall.

“Ready then?”

Remus blinked, trying not to seem too stunned.

“Er... Y-Yeah! Let’s get going…”

They met each other on the threshold of the rug, and there Sirius turned his head up for a kiss. Remus nearly melted. He knew Sirius' chronically bad mood hadn't entirely dissipated, but he’d never been so looking forward to a real holiday in all his life. Perhaps Mary was wrong; maybe romance wasn’t so intolerable after all.

“I’m driving,” Sirius said, as they stepped out the door.

“Oh, you are so not driving…”

They got into Dawlish just a few minutes shy of midday. It was a straight-shot along the M4, then down toward Exeter, and it rained the whole way, beating the van’s front windows until Remus was half-sure they’d be swept off the motorway.

“Do you feel like stopping at all?” Remus asked. “Monty said Exeter’s got all the decent pubs.”

“No,” Sirius replied, busy glaring out the window.

Remus kept on driving.

The downpour had lightened by the time they were pulling onto the seaside town’s main road, but the day's previously poor weather had cleared the pavement of all pedestrians anyway. They passed rows upon rows of sleepy houses coloured in worn white, yellow, and blue, and retaining walls made of original brick and mortar. Just over the rooftops Remus could make out the dusky blue waters of the English channel. It was exciting; he’d never wanted much for the ocean, but now that they were there, he could feel the swell of it in his chest. When he cracked his window the briny sea-smell of it seeped in like the rain, clearing his sinuses and giving him the first real breath of fresh air he'd taken since leaving Scotland last June. He'd read once that those who lived by the ocean tended to live longer. Seeing it—smelling it—Remus now understood why.

“Should be your next right,” Sirius said, squinting down at the A to Z and turning it around several times.

“You sure? Your last right almost took me to Glastonbury.”

“Are you gonna sass me or are you gonna turn right?”

“Aye, aye, captain—turning right.”

They arrived at the house when the sky was only drizzling, and there on the corner of the lane that overlooked the sea, they found a mini Potter Cottage sitting idly, just as quaint and as sleepy as the rest of its distant neighbours. The summer house had a private drive for the van, with an attached garage, white stucco walls, and a terracotta roof. All of its windows were framed white as well, with several of them bearing panes made of the most dazzling stained glass. The key stuck in the lock a bit but when it finally gave way, it revealed a cosy living room made up of light pine furnishings and cashmere rugs. Attached to it was a kitchen, with cupboards painted grey and adorned in matching rainbow glass. The rest of the interior was modest—or modest for its means, anyway. There was no television, but there was a radio. The bottom floor was split up between the kitchen and dining room as well as an office that doubled as the guest room, while the upstairs held two bedrooms and the single bath, all decorated identically to the little beach-themed bathroom the Potters' kept in their home back in London.

"It's nice," Remus said, peeling out of his winter coat. "Ceilings are a bit low though."

"You're just too tall," Sirius mused, stretching up to brush his fingers along one of the wooden ceiling beams. "At least it's not completely freezing inside. Flick on the radiator will you?"

While Remus did so, Sirius shook the damp from his hair and strolled into the kitchen. He went to the fridge first, opening it and sighing. Empty, as expected.

"We're going to have to make a shop run for dinner. How's the weather?"

"Think the rain's mostly stopped," Remus replied, peeking out the lace curtains.

"Might as well go now then. Just let me change first."

Sirius grabbed their trunk and headed down the hall for the guest bedroom, and Remus continued peering out the window. The cottage itself was just a few kilometres from the sea, situated on top of one of the majestic cliffs the town was known for—making for the most amazing view. It being early March, the beach was mostly empty, but he could just make out a few wandering gulls soaring down over the shore.

Letting the lacy curtain fall back into place, Remus strolled back over to the radiator to warm his hands. It was then that he noticed the small wall hutch hung up over the dining room table. Covered top to bottom in photographs, the hutch bore memories from every summer James had been alive; James in the garden, no taller than Monty's waist, James without his two front teeth, wearing swimming bottoms and a woman's sunhat, James on the end of a pier, holding a crab bigger than his head. There were other family members Remus didn't recognise, even a few of Peter; his chubby arm wrapped around James' shoulders while James grinned his very James Potter grin and held two fingers up behind Peter's head.

"Ugh, just look at them and their happy childhoods," Sirius drawled, strolling up from behind while tying his hair into a half-knot behind his head.

"Sorta makes you want to punch an eight year-old in the face, don't it?"

"Just a bit."

Remus snorted, turning to look at him. "Oi… That's my jumper."

Sirius glanced down at the burgundy knit jumper he'd pulled over his t-shirt. "Obviously. Now are you ready to go?"

They walked instead of taking the van, and though it was chilly, Remus appreciated it. It was the air—the smell of it, the clarity; like his lungs were breathing for the very first time. Overhead the gulls cried, and when they reached the promenade he made Sirius stand at the edge while he fumbled with Lily's camera.

"Do you even know how to use that thing?"

"Just shut up and smile."

He snapped the photo and as it was printing, Sirius came forward and snatched the camera for himself.

"Let's take one together."

While Remus bent down next to him, Sirius raised the camera. He smiled, but for several seconds there was nothing.

"Aren't you—"

KA-CHICK!

"Moons, you ruined it!"

"And I think you've blinded me. Ugh…"

As Remus straightened up and rubbed the flash from his eyes, Sirius gave a snort and ripped the spoilt photo from its spout. "Here," he said, raising the camera once more, "give us a little snog this time."

"A snog?"

“Yeah, why not? It’s not like anyone else’s around.”

That was true enough. They’d only passed two people on their way down from the house, a man pruning the dead branches from her front hedges and an old woman walking her dog. Now that they were there, a quick glance in either direction told him that they were the only two on the promenade. They might as well have been the only two in the whole world.

“Alright,” Remus said, secretly giddy. “But only one.”

Sirius smiled and leaned his face back in. They met in the middle, and one more flash and shutter sound later, he was waving the fresh photo through the air.

“You better not show anyone that,” Remus warned, taking the camera and hanging it around his neck by the strap.

“No, I’ll save it for the grandchildren.”

They made their way down onto the beach, past the craggy stones and onto a soft brown sand that clung to the soles of their boots. Remus regularly found himself sinking into the mud holes and little tide pools, but Sirius danced along like it was nothing—winter scarf billowing behind him in the wind. Not far off they could see a family enjoying themselves near the very edge of the shore; every now and then the kids would shoot into the water up to their ankles, scream, and rush out again. Eventually their mother bundled them up into little towels and they retreated back toward the stone stairs, until they were naught but tiny specks in the distance.

“I used to love coming to the sea,” Sirius said, busy kicking up sand as he stared out over the horizon. He had a far-away look in his eye Remus could relate to, like he was thinking about somewhere else.

“Wasn’t aware the great city of Bath had a sea,” Remus called, raising the camera. He snapped a photo of Sirius impressed in the creamy orange glow of the early sunset and afterwards Sirius turned around to smirk at him.

“It doesn’t. Our governess, Gisela—”

“The one who ran off with the gardener?”

“And don’t forget the twenty-thousand pounds from my dad’s safe,” Sirius added keenly. “Before she split she’d sometimes take us over to Bristol in the summertime. They had this nice beach over in Portishead, bit different from here, but—well, I can't remember much, really… Used to come home with my feet all cut up from walking on all the barnacles though."

"Didn't you swim?"

" 'Course, but Reg hated it. Hated the whole thing, to be honest. Though, s'probably my fault. See, I used to dig up the tiny crabs and put them down the back of his shirt… Once I even brought one back with me and left it on his pillow for him to find. Told him it must've crawled into his ear and drove all the way home with us."

"You are an absolute terror. No wonder he hated you."

"Yeah, maybe... We're better now though."

In a moment of vulnerability, Sirius looked up from the sand and Remus saw all the memories impressed onto his face like a tattered mask.

"I never really was a very good brother," he murmured. "Just… left him there, didn't I?"

"You were a kid," Remus said, overcome with a sense of déjà vu.

"So was he." Sirius sniffed, his cheeks rosy from the cold. "I was a bad brother… Think I waited too long to fix things. Now I'm here and he's there—"

"Regulus is at Hawkings."

"For now. But what about after? He's almost finished with school, and sure—he could go to some fancy university far away, 'cept Mum's never gonna let that happen. He's all they've got now... What if he never gets out?"

Remus shuffled closer, bending in so he and Sirius were nearly nose-to-nose.

"He will."

"And if he doesn't want to?"

"Then he'll have to decide that for himself." Remus sighed, touching their foreheads together. "Regulus is smart, Sirius. And you two are more alike than you think."

Somehow, it was enough for Sirius, and he smiled quietly while accepting the quick kiss Remus offered next. Afterwards he raised both hands up above his head, giving a long stretch before a brisk wind came and left him trembling beneath his coat.

“Fuck—alright. That’s enough beach for today. Let’s head over to the shops before they close, I'm starving.”

They turned together, setting sun at their backs as they made their way back toward the concrete promenade. Halfway there, Remus glanced down at Sirius’ hand, his knuckles red from the cold. When he reached down to take it, Sirius snapped his face toward him.

“We’re holding hands in public now?”

“Why not? It’s not like anyone else’s around.”

“Mm… Clever you.”

* * *

Wednesday 7th March 1979

Reading by the seaside was better than reading anywhere else, Remus had decided—save maybe the middle of the night with Sirius sleeping beside him and the sound of rain pattering against their bedroom window. He learned to love the sound of the waves rolling in, and the wind as it whistled off the water. For the first time in his life he was waking feeling fully rested—eager to get out and breathe the fresh air.

“Maybe we should get a house on the beach,” he said the next morning.

“Yeah, like in Santa Monica,” Sirius replied, busy brushing sand from their blanket while munching on one of the butteries they’d picked up for an easy breakfast. “We’ll get ourselves a big place, with a killer view. Throw massive parties—Prongs can even invite Farrah Fawcett. It’ll be a blow-out.”

Remus didn’t hate the idea, but he returned to his book anyway, pretending not to notice the antsy way Sirius was bobbing his leg. His fingers too, were incessant. It'd been less than twenty-four hours and yet they were constantly tapping or flicking, as though he was just desperate for a set of strings to set them against. He tried reading—the Potters kept an impressive collection, even way out in Devon—but it was clear that it was mostly for Remus' sake. Sirius held the book, considered its pages—but just appeared bored. Remus wished it were summer, so that they might actually find something to do other than sit in silence or listen to Radio 1's Top 40.

"Feel like heading over to the pub for supper?"

"Sure," Sirius shrugged. "Could use a pint."

So dinner was settled, but they still had an entire day to kill. When the wind inevitably started to pick up again, they fled the beach for warmer accommodations only to find that the power had gone out back at the cottage.

"Monty did warn us this might happen," Sirius sighed, as Remus smacked the radiator and found it cool to the touch.

"To the garage we go."

It was your typical crowded storage shed; few windows and barely enough room for a car but plenty for a mower and a decently-stocked tool bench. Rows of shelves along the back wall held an assortment of boxes and summer commodities, while several tarps covered what appeared to be a table and chairs set for the front garden.

"I found the fuse box!" Sirius called, after they'd fumbled around in the dark for a while. The tiny door squealed when he opened it, but after a bit of trial and error, Sirius flipped the correct breaker and the entire room lit up.

"There! Like magic."

"Good job," Remus said, still hanging on to the string of the only free-hanging light bulb. Sirius grinned back at him victoriously, before his eyes shot wide and he thrust his finger out toward the ground.

"Shit, watch out for that rat!"

The yelp Remus let out was absolutely garish, but it was nothing compared to the clatter when he practically levelled the tarps near the back of the garage. Before he could even clarify about the rat, Sirius was full-belly laughing.

"Sorry, Moons, I was only joking! Didn't realise you'd get so worked up over a little mouse."

"Oh, go do one, why don't you!" Remus snarled, pushing himself back up to his feet. "Shit… Think I fell on a rake or something."

And then Sirius' face really lit up. "That's not a bloody rake!"

He raced over and grabbed the edges of the tarp, ripping it back to reveal an old two cylinder motorbike. It was missing its seat and flat in both wheels, and appeared to Remus as though it was rusted to the very floor. Remus had never much fancied the things—they were like mechanical horses, except they could go a hundred miles per hour and didn't need to dislike you to kill you—but Sirius spared the bike one glance and was instantly in love.

"Holy shit! Monty never told me that he was hiding one of these! Do you know what this is, Moons?"

"Yeah, it's the biggest bout of tetanus I've ever seen."

"No! It's a relic."

"Well, that relic of yours just about displaced my spine." Remus sighed, glaring at the handlebars. "I'm gonna go make sure the radiator's working. You coming?"

"In a sec," Sirius said, already kneeling down beside the bike. "I'm gonna check her over a bit. See if I can't get this beast running."

"For that you're gonna need real magic."

He left Sirius to his own devices, and didn't hear a peep until several hours later when he'd set his book down only to realise they'd missed lunch entirely. Quickly whipping up a few sandwiches, Remus slipped his boots on and made his way back out to the garage.

"Thought you might be hungry," he called, pushing open the door. Sirius regarded him with a nod. He was still bent over the motorbike, face now streaked with hints of grease. He'd since moved the rest of the tarps and furniture out of the way, scattering various tools about the floor as he worked.

"You got the tires off," Remus said, while Sirius stepped back and wiped his forehead.

"Yeah… Body's almost a total write-off though. I think there's rust inside the motor."

"You sure Monty's gonna appreciate you messing around with it?"

"He told us to use whatever we liked, didn't he?"

"In that case, I found these inside. Thought they might be helpful."

He handed him the wrapped sandwich, as well as a beer and a stack of magazines, each of them bearing a different style of motorbike on its cover.

"Huh. Guess Monty was looking for a new hobby." Cracking his beer tab, Sirius flicked through the magazines a bit before setting them aside. "Thanks for the lunch. You alright inside?"

"I'm not your fragile little wife, Sirius. I think I can handle a few hours on my own."

He smirked, biting into the sandwich. "Would'a fooled me, what with the way you jumped for that rat."

Remus boxed his ears lightly. "Ready for that pint then?"

"Mhm. I'd like to stop into the shops too, see if they have any rust-remover."

They didn't, but it was too late to check anywhere else so after chatting up the shop's owner, Sirius settled for a large bottle of vinegar hoping it would do the trick instead. Nearby, the local pub wasn't exactly crowded when they arrived. They were the youngest there by at least twenty years and for the most part all of its patrons kept to themselves. It was an old building made with thick wooden beams and cracked leather seats, dated even by the Shoestring's standards. But the beer was decent and no one stared at them when they walked in so Remus had no complaints.

"Look," he said. There was a piano across the room, tucked away in a corner with its key lid shut and missing its bench. Sirius had looked earnestly when Remus pointed at it, but turned back around when he realised what it was.

"Thought this was supposed to be a music free holiday."

"Not music free—stress free! You should play something."

"Yeah, maybe, except something tells me the guys around here aren't used to a house band."

Remus wanted to push, it'd been ages since he'd just heard Sirius play to play, but just then the barkeep came over to collect their empty glasses.

"Say, does anyone ever play that piano?" He asked the man.

"Nah, not really. Hell, I'd put money on it being out of tune."

Remus frowned, disappointed. "Thanks."

"No one can say you didn't try," Sirius said, patting his arm as the barkeep strode off. It felt rather blithe considering he spent the rest of the evening shooting little glances back at the instrument.

Neither of them felt much like eating out so after they'd finished their fair share of ale and lager, the two of them stumbled home in the dark, quietly poking fun at the locals they'd witnessed and whistling at the moon. In the end they took the beach promenade because it was empty, enjoying the feeling of being able to hold each other's hand outside their own home. City-dwelling was starting to look less and less appealing by the hour.

"We still got some eggs in," Sirius said as they staggered inside. "Feel like breakfast for dinner?"

"Yeah, go on."

While Sirius got to cooking, Remus hung up their coats and began fiddling with the radio. The reception was surprisingly good, and soon enough they were being serenaded by the likes of Ian Dury and his blockhead gang.

'Hit me with your rhythm stick—
Hit me, hit me!
Je t'adore, ich liebe dich!
Hit me, hit me, hit me!'

"Wow. Don't you just love the radio?" Sirius called.

"It's certainly eccentric enough." Remus flicked gently through the Potters' record collection. Mostly rhythm and blues, some gospel. "Did you know Ian Dury had polio?"

“Really?”

“Mhm. And he still moves better on stage than half the pricks they’ve got on ‘Top of the Pops’.”

"You know everything."

"Not everything."

"No?"

"No. Like... I have no idea what he means by 'rhythm stick'."

"Oh, I think you do," Sirius chuckled. As he continued to hum along Remus left the radio behind and joined him at the stove, coming up from behind and sliding his hands beneath the hem of his jumper. Feeling keen, he tucked either thumb into the belt loops of Sirius jeans, and leaned in so his nose brushed against the back of his hair.

“I’m glad we came,” he murmured, placing a strategic kiss along the slope of Sirius’ neck.

“Mm, don’t. I haven’t showered today.”

“I don’t mind. You smell good… like the sea.”

“I think you mean like a garage. I was working on that bike most of the day, and I’m about to smell like bacon grease too so piss off,” Sirius said, shoving him back lightly. Remus whined pointedly and tightened his hold on his hips.

“Are you not glad we came?”

“Never said that. Cheeky prat.”

“C’mon, Sirius…” He kissed his neck again, smirking. “ ‘Hit me with your rhythm stick—hit me, hit me.’”

“So now you’re a singer?”

“Wouldn’t go that far…”

“And just what’s happened to my puritan of a boyfriend?”

“He got bored…"

"And maybe just a little bit drunk?" Sirius looked back at him, and Remus could just tell he was teetering between carnal need and the instinctive urge to remain mulish. He supposed all he needed was a little push.

“You fell asleep early last night,” Remus murmured, rocking both of them to the music. “Felt a bit lonely, all by meself… So cold at night these days…”

“I’ll just have to assume that your right hand warmed you right up.”

“Maybe… but s’not the same though, innit. Yours is so much warmer.”

Sirius waved his spatula around threateningly. “Stop that. You think you can drop your voice a few octaves and speak in hoi polloi and I’m to cream my trousers, just like that?”

“Would you rather me wax poetic? Alright. I could tell you how it feels to kiss you… How it’s like being shocked by an electric guitar cable, right on the mouth. And how I used to get a stalk-on just staring at you. How every morning in our dorm was like going to war with my own body.”

“Now that’s just embarrassing.”

Remus bit his lip over a grin, letting his hands creep down past the waistband of Sirius’ jeans. Perhaps the carnal need was his after all.

“I like you most with your mouth shut—”

“That's rude.”

“—‘cause I know all the best ways to open it again."

"Oh yeah?"

"Yeah. And I know I don’t have to beg for it either… Wanna know how I know that?”

“No.”

“Humour me.”

Sirius tsked. “How?”

“Because from the very moment we laid eyes on each other, you couldn’t have wanted anyone else more if you tried.”

“Ha! Practice that line in the mirror, did you?”

“Only a few times.”

Sirius scoffed, seemingly immune—but then Remus reached past him to turn off the hob and Sirius couldn’t help but follow the gesture with his eyes.

“Well, Pads?”

Another look. Hesitation. And then Sirius licked his lips and Remus knew he was a goner.

‘Hit me with your rhythm stick—
Two fat persons, click, click, click!
Hit me—hit me—HIT ME!’

> > >

“Fuck it.”

A single sharp flourish, and Sirius had spun around, effectively launching himself into Remus' arms and forcing him to catch him. Remus could feel the spatula poking into his back as Sirius wrapped his arms around his neck, but more than that he could feel Sirius' lips on his own. It’d been several weeks since either of them had initiated anything so substantial, not that anyone would’ve been able to tell the difference. They grappled as they always did, hands knocking away hands as they fought to be the first to free the other from their shirt. Sirius won, but only because Remus’ had buttons, which he tore from the holes with a single Hollywood-worthy jerk. As the fabric puddled to the floor, Remus grabbed him around the waist and slid his hands upwards until his thumbs were raking across rib-lines. Sirius had his teeth on his neck, followed by the pillow-soft lips he used to kiss his microphone whenever he wasn’t feeling like a failure. He sunk his fingers into the hair at the back of Remus' neck, like roots into earth, and when he yanked, an involuntary gasp slipped out.

“Our friends are gone for less than five minutes—”

“That’s a bit of an exaggeration.”

Sirius gave another sharp tug. “Five minutes,” he hummed, the other hand slipping down until the rattle of Remus’ belt was echoing off the living room walls; “And you turn into a sexual deviant.”

“I’ve always been a deviant—ah!” Another gasp, this one almost a whimper, and Sirius had his hand in his trousers.

“Well, allow me to straighten you out.”

"Never."

More rattling and Sirius had all but stripped him to the knees. Slightly disgruntled after being the one to incite such amorous congress in the first place, Remus reached around the back of Sirius’ head and roughly cupped his jaw in one hand.

“Mouth—open. Now.”

For once Sirius didn’t argue, and when they kissed Remus tasted teeth and salt and that morning’s bleary-eyed cigarette. He bent into it, core already trembling with the incessant stroke of Sirius’ thumb and wrist. When they broke apart again, it struck him how ridiculous it was that they were still standing in the middle of the room.

“Gonna put you on your back,” Remus swore, already walking them toward the sofa.

“Not if I put you on your knees first.”

“Oh, curse you.” He hooked a finger along those perfect bottom teeth. “You and this bloody mouth.”

Sirius grinned, and bit him at the knuckle.

They scrambled the rest of the way, eager to be off their feet and onto one another. Remus ended up banging his shin against the coffee table, inciting a furious string of cussing, but by then Sirius had already smothered it with another laugh-induced snog. Afterwards Remus ran his tongue along his teeth, tasting all the places Sirius’ tongue had already touched, and slid down the sofa until he had both hands hooked beneath his boyfriend’s knees. Sirius’ jeans came off next, and then his pants, until they were pressed up against one another with nothing but their skin separating them. The sound Sirius made in the base of his throat when Remus pressed his lips to the inside of a single quivering thigh was enough to send them both reeling. He kissed again, and then the other side, and again— and then when he felt Sirius stiffen as he took him in his mouth, Remus closed his eyes and said a quick prayer for the couch.

<<<

“You know we could still do this, right?” He said later, when they were both lying on top of each other, sweaty and panting as though they’d just run a marathon. It’d been a tight fit on the sofa, but they’d made it work. Twice.

“Do what?” Sirius asked. He had his cheek pressed to Remus’ bare chest, using one finger to trace the ‘LE’ tattoo on his left pectoral.

“Make music—be a band. So we lost one battle, what’s that matter when we’re gonna win the war?”

“Just leave it, Moons.”

“I can’t. This is my life too, y’know.”

Sirius groaned, rubbing his nose into Remus’ chest like he were some great human hankie. “I just don’t know how we could do it without them,” he grumbled. “Potter’s gonna go off to Exeter and be some big-shot lawyer just like his dad. And Pete, well he's talented—he’ll find something. You and I are the ones that are gonna get left behind. Practically broken up already haven’t we…”

“No, we haven’t, you stubborn twat."

"Oi—!"

"We’re not breaking up," Remus said sternly; "We’re just taking a break, that’s all. In a few days we’ll all go home and figure our shit out.”

“And what if we don’t figure it out?” Sirius demanded. “What if James decides he’d rather risk university than homelessness, and moves way back here to go to Exeter? Bloody U-of-E?! Certainly the safer option… Hell… He and Evans can get married early, pop out a few sprogs before he’s even set to pass the bar!”

“You’re being irrational again.”

“Yeah? Maybe I am! Doesn't change the fact, does it?”

“Damn it, Sirius. I don’t get why you didn’t just talk to James about all this. He’d tell you the same shit I am.”

“Because I couldn’t.”

“Why?”

“Because I didn’t want to hear him say that he was leaving!” Sirius pushed himself up so their faces were level. “Maybe he wouldn’t have even wanted to tell me! It’s like, if your plane’s going down and you know you’ve got the only working parachute, do you tell the others? Is it not kinder to let them think they actually have a chance?”

“Not James,” Remus said firmly. “He’d never let anyone go down on their own.”

“Couldn’t blame him none if he did... Look at me. I'm no different from my family—I'm not a Potter, I'm a Black. And Blacks ruin everything they touch.”

Remus glanced downwards at Sirius' hand where it rested against his chest. Wordlessly, he grabbed Sirius round the wrist and began gliding his palm upwards, until Sirius had touched the whole of his neck. He guided it up and over his jaw, onto his right cheek, then his left. There, he let it rest, gently cradling his face in his palm. Sirius' eyes softened in understanding, and Remus prised his hand away from his cheek just long enough to kiss it.

"There. Can't ruin me."

"Yes, well, you're an odd sort."

"But we knew that already."

There came a chuckle—a sad one—and Sirius surged forward, pressing his lips to Remus' chastely. "Why do you have to be so good to me?"

"Probably 'cause it's in my best interest," Remus said, jesting as he reached down to cop yet another suggestive feel. Sirius raised his eyebrows when he felt it and then kissed Remus again—hard, and several times on the mouth. When they finally broke apart again Remus tipped his head back against the sofa's arm rest while he watched Sirius return to tracing the tiny lines of his tattoo.

“Sirius, you know you don’t have to take on everything alone, right?"

"Sure, I do. How else am I to garner any character development?"

Remus reached forward and pinched him by the nose.

"Ah—!"

"We're not just a band, we're a family," Remus told him firmly. "The only family you and I have got. James knows this. And he cares. You're his best friend in the world, Sirius, believe in him."

Pulling his face away, Sirius curved both hands into fists on top of Remus' chest. When he swallowed the tendons in his neck stuck out.

"I… It's like, I don't want him to go, but I don't want him to not regret going either."

"Reckon that just means you love him."

"... Fuck."

Sirius groaned dramatically, as was his nature, and finally laid back down, his head resting in the crook of Remus' neck. It was cramped and hot, but Remus wouldn't have had it any other way.

"Everything'll sort itself out," he murmured, "don't worry."

Sirius said nothing, and after several long seconds of silence, he lifted his face and bit Remus directly over Lily's 'LE'.

"OW!?"

"Sorry—heh… Intrusive thoughts... Shall we fuck some more?"

* * *

The next morning they awoke to not a single cloud in the sky. It was Thursday, which meant that Remus' birthday was only a few days away. Emboldened by the sudden warmth and good weather, half the town it seemed had flooded to the beach. There were couples walking, dogs jumping in the surf, children playing in the sand. Remus and Sirius had gone down to the shoreline for their obligatory morning 'lie-out', as they were calling it, but had retreated back to the cottage for more privacy when others began drifting too close.

Eager for a distraction, Sirius returned to his beloved hunk of junk in the garage and this time Remus joined him, bringing along the radio and one of the books from Monty's office. He'd wrestled a lawn chair down from one of the shelves which he set up in the corner, sitting and listening to the BBC's midmorning show as he flicked through his novel. Sirius tended to talk to himself when he was really concentrating, and neither that or the clanging bothered Remus all that much—if anything he was amused by the amount of cursing that came out of it. After scouring one of the dingy manuals while Sirius went on and on about something called a 'flywheel', Remus had learned that the bike was a ‘1959 Triumph T120 Bonneville with chrome plating and a parallel-twin four-stroke engine’—whatever that meant. Sirius almost never missed the chance to say the full name, but beyond that, didn’t seem to have a clue how to fix the thing.

“You have no idea what you’re doing, do you?”

“Shut up, Moony! M’trying to concentrate…” Tucking a tiny screwdriver behind his ear, Sirius continued flicking through one of the manuals. “So that there’s the stator… and this here's the wire for the ignition... mm, neutral, battery… but what the hell’s this one for—lights? … Ugh, fuck me…”

It was dark by the time Sirius looked up at Remus and called it quits. He had even more grease on his face than the day before, but was smiling in the end. Remus had never thought him more handsome.

“So… Pints?”

Off they went. The pub was rowdier than they’d last seen it, which felt odd for a weekday, but they were served their swill and left alone and once again the old piano in the corner sat empty.

“I’m gonna see if I can patch the wheels today,” Sirius said the following morning while Remus was washing the dishes leftover from breakfast.

“You’re not actually thinking that you’re going to be able to ride that thing, are you?”

“Why wouldn’t I? I only need it to start.”

“It doesn’t have a seat, first of all.”

Sirius shrugged. “It’s just a hobby anyway.”

That, Remus was glad for. He knew Sirius had a penchant for all things exciting and life-threatening, but he didn’t look forward to the day he’d be scraping what was left of his boyfriend off of the M25.

“Do you know what you want to do for your birthday?” Sirius asked on their third morning at the cottage. Remus almost didn’t hear him; he was too busy marvelling Sirius from afar. How he managed to make holding a cup of coffee in one hand and a toothbrush in the other look so effortlessly sexy, Remus would never know. It must've had something to do with the deadly no-shirt-big-trousers combo he was currently sporting.

"My birthday isn't until Saturday," Remus said, sipping his own coffee and trying to remain focused.

"My point exactly. We should celebrate."

"I'm happy doing what we've been doing."

"Sleeping and drinking?"

"Don't forget the sex."

"You think I could forget? After last night?" Sirius raised a suggestive brow, spitting toothpaste into the sink.

"You've got your bike, I've got my books," Remus hummed, pouring himself a second cup of coffee. "What more is there to want?"

"Well, I'm sure more sex couldn't hurt."

"Ha." Remus shook his head. "I'm happy. I just like being with you. But if you really insist…"

Sirius slid closer, already biting his bottom lip. "Yeah…?"

"I'd really love it if you'd… No, it's stupid."

A kiss along the back of his neck from Sirius, then another.

"C'mon Moony, don't be shy."

"You're sure?"

"Anything," he cooed. "As long as it's within my power, of course."

"Oh good." Remus set his coffee mug down and clapped either palm around Sirius' cheeks. "In that case I'd like to see you play that piano down at the pub."

"You… You play dirty!" Sirius grabbed a nearby dish towel and began swinging it around like a lasso, sending specks of dishwater everywhere. Remus laughed and dashed away, and for a while they chased each other like newlyweds straight from the altar. It was bliss, or good as. Eventually they would return to their books and bikes, and after three days of nothing but Top 40s, Remus was able to connect to one of the pirate radio stations moored somewhere in the middle of the English Channel. These bootleg disc jockeys didn't have to bend by the soulless will of the insipid BeeBeeCee, which meant no more pop music, at least for a little while.

'Breakin' rocks in the hot sun—
I fought the law and the law won!
I fought the law and the law won!'

"Finally! Some real fucking music, for once," Sirius cried. He pumped his fist in the air a few times as the Clash began blaring through their radio, effectively usurping any peace leftover from the morning. Remus didn't know the song personally, but Sirius apparently did. He maxed out the radio's volume and banged his head along to the guitar, belting out the words and occasionally offering quick one-liners such as "KILLER LYRICS!" and "I LOVE THESE GUYS!"

Tomny might like them too.

The thought caught Remus in the gut terribly. He wished he hadn't had the notion as soon as he heard the rest of the lyrics.

'I killed my baby and it feels so bad,
Guess my race is run!
She's the best girl that I ever had—
I fought the law and the law won!'

Fuck Tomny, came the voice. He hasn't called in months. Not one word. You tried—you tried apologising! He wouldn't have it.

It was true, partly. Back before Christmas he'd called and left several messages, most of them rather tepid and deprecatory at best. Tomny hadn't returned any of his calls.

You see? It's him. He's the one causing it.

'I fought the law and the law won!
I fought the law and the law won!

I fought the law and the law won!
I fought the law and the... '

The song eventually ended, and Remus decided then that he would push all thoughts of Tomny from his head. He didn't want to be worried about it. He wanted to be with Sirius.

"Go on, just one song. When's the last time you played music just for the hell of it?" He urged, when they inevitably arrived back at the pub that evening. The crowd had grown again, leaving few tables unoccupied and leaving a dull roar in its wake. It was nothing compared to the Shoe, even on a slow night, but it might as well have been a rock concert for all the action they'd been seeing lately.

"No one wants me to," Sirius rebuffed.

"They don't know that they should be wanting! Come on, you're nervy —you've gotten too used to the audience expecting ya. Remember what it was like when we first started playing and they stared at us as though they'd all forgotten how to blink? That's all you're missing."

"If it's so easy then why don't you do it?"

"I can't play the piano."

"Bet you could if you tried."

"Please?" Remus smiled, knowingly. "It'll be like my birthday present."

"It isn't your birthday yet," Sirius grumbled, tipping back the rest of his pint in one go. He stood up and much to Remus' glee, meandered over to the barkeep. The guy seemed surprised when he pointed at the piano, but if Sirius was hoping that he'd tell him off for trying, he was left disappointed. The barkeep tossed a rag over one shoulder and shrugged. Have at 'er.

Nobody noticed it when Sirius stole a chair and sat down in front of the large wooden piano. When he lifted the key lid dust came flying off, making him glower. Remus was expecting a beautiful melody, maybe even a bit of singing if he were lucky, but after several minutes of watching Sirius merely stare at the keys, he got up and shuffled over.

"What's the matter? Why aren't you playing?"

“I don’t know what to play.”

“Don’t know—?!” Remus let out a breath. Oh you. “Just play whatever feels right.”

Sirius sighed, nodding and shaking out his hands. Happy, Remus reached past the piano to pat him fondly. He had no doubts Sirius would do great, but when he turned back to his seat he suddenly realised that they’d garnered more than a few new sets of eyes. Almost everyone sitting at the nearby tables had turned to watch, either intrigued or confused by the display that hadn’t even started yet. While they sipped their lagers, Remus slipped back the way he’d come, feeling suddenly nervy himself.

Go on Sirius, he thought as he gripped his pint glass. You can do it. Blow them away.

Sirius did not bother glancing at the audience as he lifted a finger and checked every key; Remus doubted they would’ve been able to tell if the instrument was out of tune anyway. They only wanted to know whether they should be cheering or heckling. As it was, neither would happen. They'd be too busy gawking at him to even know what to shout.

When Sirius began to play, Remus was relieved that he knew the song. Personally he preferred Springsteen, but as far as Americans went, Billy Joel wasn’t all that bad.

For a while it was just the chords. He’d played several minutes of it, lips pressed together so that Remus could tell he was humming the melody. Maybe he was just trying to make sure he was playing it right —Remus didn’t know. Eventually he'd given up hoping that Sirius would sing, but he should've known better. Never underestimate a Black.

“Slow down, you crazy child,
You’re so ambitious for a juvenile.
But then if you’re so smart, tell me—
Why are you still so afraid? Mm…”

It was moments like these that Remus was truly envious of the audience. While he was stuck trying to keep time with Peter's drumming and balance out James' incorrigible solos they were rewarded with nothing short of nirvana. The last time he could remember feeling like this was that day in church when Sheila had forced Sirius up in front of the entire school to lead the church hymns. He hadn't been nervous then either. It was as though being on stage was his purpose—the one thing his soul was made to do. There was nothing else for him. And like the audience, Remus was awed too.

"But you know that when the truth is told,
That you can get what you want or you can just get old.
You're gonna kick off before you even get halfway through, ooh—
When will you realise, Vienna waits for you…"

Sirius had his eyes closed but he played every note perfectly, to the point that Remus needn't hold his breath. This was rapture if there was such a thing, he was sure of it.

"Slow down, you're doin' fine,
You can't be everything you wanna be before your time.
Although it's so romantic on the borderline—
Tonight, tonight…"

The crowd was dazzled. All noise and chatter had fallen away when Sirius had begun, and now everywhere people were craning to get a better look. One woman took out a camera—'handsome young piano player springs up in local pub' probably made for big news around seaside towns like Dawlish—but Remus couldn't take his eyes off Sirius.

Go Sirius, he thought.

"You've got your passion, you've got your pride,
But don't you know that only fools are satisfied.
Dream on, but don't imagine they'll all come true, ooh—
When will you realise Vienna waits for you…"

Somewhere someone clapped. Then another, and when Sirius' cadence quickened they clapped some more. Soon enough people were calling out to him, encouraging him and raising their pints in the air as cheers. They didn't just like it—they didn't even love it—they saw him.

Someone nudged Remus. "Is that your friend? Bloody brilliant, inne?"

Yeah. Yeah, he was.

“Slow down, you crazy child!
Take the phone off the hook and disappear for a while!
It’s alright, you can afford to lose a day or two, ooh—
When will you realise…”

Then Sirius looked up, right at him. And Remus felt it.

Rapture.

“And you know that when the truth is told,
That you can get what you want or you can just get old!
You’re gonna kick off before you even get halfway through, ooh—
Why don’t you realise... Vienna waits for you?”

I love you, Remus mouthed. For a moment he was afraid it hadn’t reached him, but then that smile touched Sirius’ lips and he knew.

“When will you realise… Vienna waits… for you…”

A few rolling arpeggios later and the rapture was through. For several seconds no one did anything, there was silence among the mob. Remus waited for the applause they were used to—the hollering that accompanied every one of their London performances—but there was nothing. Finally, when Sirius looked about ready to flee the piano altogether, a man up front leaned forward.

“Well? You gonna play another, son?”

The breath of relief Remus gave mirrored Sirius’, and when he smiled, everyone began to cheer and clap. Between them, Sirius looked at Remus and matched his giddy grin. It’s good! Remus mouthed back, flashing him a thumbs up and a subtle 'go on'.

Someone came forward and set a pint on the edge of the piano, which Sirius snatched up immediately.

“Rule number one!” He called, with all his usual Sirius-vigour. “Never put a drink on a piano. Do that, and it’s bound to go end-up.”

Then he knocked the glass back and finished it in a single breath. The pub cheered, and after he'd wiped his mouth, Sirius set his fingers back on the keys.

"Gonna take it back with this one. See if you know the words… 'The warden threw a party in the county jail! The prison band was there and they began to wail! The band was jumpin' and the joint began to swing! You should've heard those knocked out jailbirds sing—"

Let's rock!
Everybody, let's rock!
Everybody in the whole cell block—
Was dancin' to the jailhouse rock!

They left in a hurry, as all good stars do, with bellies full of beer they hadn't paid for and grand smiles on their faces. The barkeep had told Sirius to come back anytime; apparently the drink sold better with a show. Who would've thought it?

"God—I missed this!" Sirius exclaimed, as they emerged from the pub and the crisp midnight air hit them dead in the face. "We should do more shows! A few nights a week at the Shoe ain't enough to get us anywhere."

"We could try somewhere new! Like Soho! Or—Or Camden!" Remus suggested, more than willing to humour him after what he'd just witnessed. "Maybe one of the local universities will like us."

"Whaddya talking about, everyone likes us!"

"It's a first step."

"Yeah okay, but we'll want bigger! Remember—Madison Square Garden in four years!"

"Let's start with a few polytechnics first and see what happens."

Sirius laughed, then stumbled—barely able to stand up on his own anymore.

"Bugger, we should've drank more! S'not like we were the ones payin' for it."

"You've drunk enough," Remus told him, clutching the arm Sirius had slung over his shoulders. "Here, wanna stop for some fags."

They turned into a passing corner shop and while Sirius slipped down the sweets aisle, Remus went for the front counter, pressing the bell until the attendant appeared out from the back office.

“One packet of Embassy Golds, please.”

“We’re out. Got Players.”

“Eh… Yeah, that’ll do.”

As the guy rang him up, Remus noticed a radio playing from inside the office. He recognised the voice as the disc jockey from that morning’s pirate station, but it was what he was talking about that really interested him. Every now and then he caught a word —“London”, “concert”, “clash”.

“Can you turn that up, please?”

The attendant glanced at him, and then drifted back into the office, raising the volume loud enough for Remus to overhear.

“Yes, you heard it here first, folks!” The DJ trilled. “The Anti-Nazi League’s hosting a rally in Westminster in protest of the Metropolitan Police’s lack of support following several attacks within the city, and rocking punk act The Clash—fresh off their Pearl Harbour tour—have volunteered to play in support. The attacks are thought to be a result of the rising influence of far-right groups such as the National Front and it is the hope of those participating to force those negligent MPs into direct action! All proceeds from the concert go toward local charities and supporting those affected by the violence, so YOU too can catch the Clash live Friday —tomorrow night, at the Lyceum Ballroom in the West End. Be there, or be a sodding bigot.”

Remus’ hand shot out.

“Sirius! Sirius, come over here!”

Sirius wandered over, chewing on an open packet of giant coke bottles. “Wha…?”

“The guy on the radio says that the Clash are having a concert. They’re playing in the Lyceum tomorrow night.”

“But that’s in London.”

“I know.”

Sirius squinted at him, still chewing. “Tomorrow's your birthday. You think we should go?”

“Why not? We can do what we want with our own holiday, can’t we?”

“I suppose so.”

“Are you gonna pay for those?” The shop attendant asked, appearing in front of them and pointing at Sirius’ coke bottles. Remus sighed and snatched the sweets, setting them on the counter.

“This, and the pack of Players.”

* * *

Saturday 10th March 1979

Despite the night’s excitement leaving him absolutely wired, Remus slept hard. When he woke, he turned over to find that Sirius had already gone from their bed. He could still feel the warmth left on his side of the covers, as well as the tail-ends of what might’ve been a dream weighing on the forefront of his mind. Already he could feel it slipping away from him, no different from all the others he woke up forgetting, except that this time, all he could remember was Tomny.

They'd been talking. Just talking. About what, Remus couldn't recall. Happy birthday, Lu—had Tomny said that? Maybe. But then a baby started crying, and well…

Remus pushed the thought away. They were going home today, no need to get weepy with a four hour drive and an entire rock concert ahead of them.

“Sirius?”

There was no answer from downstairs, and when he came into the kitchen Remus found the dishes washed and sitting in the drying rack. Scratching the back of his head, he went to the backdoor and opened it to the brisk Devon chill.

“Sirius?”

Again, no answer; but this time Remus could hear the distant sound of radio music coming from inside the garage. He was just in time to witness the local dust lorry as it rumbled up the road toward the next house. Stuffing his feet and pyjama bottoms into his boots, Remus scuttled down the driveway and picked up the now-empty tin bin, carrying it back to its place amongst the heap of rubbish that had been left piled next to the garage. He couldn't remember putting it out the night before, but clearly one of them had been sober enough to do it.

"Sirius?" Remus banged on the outside of the garage, once he'd wrestled the bin into place. "Are you alive?"

"Yeah, in here, Moons!" Sirius hollered back. "Mmm… 'Mommy's alright, Daddy's alright, they just seem a little weird… Surrender! Surrender!"

It might've been Sirius' singing that'd distracted him, or just his own horrid luck. Either way, Remus turned for the garage doors and got his boot caught on a dirty old tire that'd been left out to rot in the rain. He stumbled, cursing, and straightened up to give the tire a sharp kick—sending it rolling backward and straight into the rubbish bin. A colossal crash sounded as the bin took a tumble of its own, and then the radio cut out.

"Moony, you okay?"

"Fine," Remus huffed. "Dropped the bin."

Grumbling under his breath, Remus righted the bin as well as the old tire. He'd just fit the lid back on when he noticed something sticking out from behind the rest of the rubbish. It was vinyl, like the cushion from a car seat, only much thinner. Too wide for a bike, it was… oh.

"I'll assume the bin said something particularly nasty to you to earn such treatment," Sirius said. He was crouched down beside his precious motorbike despite the early hour, a predictable smear of grease on either cheek.

"It deserved it," Remus replied, wiping his hands on his trousers. "You look busy. Did you decide that we aren't going home today after all?"

"No, no! Just thought I'd give Gisela here one more tune up before we go."

"You've named the bike after your old governess?"

"What can I say? I'm nothing if not sentimental." Sirius tapped a screwdriver against the metal body, before tossing it away and popping to his feet. “You’ve got perfect timing though, I was just about to see if I could start her up. I fetched the petrol myself just this morning, now stay right there!”

Not entirely convinced it’d work, Remus crossed his arms and leaned against the garage doorway. He watched as Sirius swung his leg over the sports-bike, hovering over the uncomfortable lack of seat.

“First you turn your fuel line on,” he said, moving slowly like the bike might buck him off. “Then you press this here to see if the fuel’s coming out—it’s called the tickle.”

“Imagine if you’d studied for your A-Levels like you studied this bike.”

“Ha-ha… Now, ignition on.” He flicked another switch on the body. “And finally—the firing stroke!”

With one foot on the throttle and one on the ground, Sirius grabbed the bike by both handlebars and threw himself up—then down. There was a striking sound like a thousand matches being lit and suddenly the motorbike was thrumming beneath him; a dead thing brought back from the brink.

“Holy shit!” Sirius exclaimed. “I–It turned on! Moons, she turned on!”

“I see that.” Remus pushed off the doorway, genuinely impressed despite himself. “I didn’t think you were gonna get that thing to so much as purr.”

“Well, she’s purring now!” Sirius cranked the handlebars this way and that, flashing him with its single headlight. “C’mon, let’s take her out for a spin. You and me!”

“Sirius, you know we can’t.”

A beat, and then Sirius deflated. “Yeah… you’re right. Don’t even have —”

“I mean we can’t…” Remus smirked, picking up the dirty old seat, “without this.”

Sirius’ mouth fell open. “You found it!”

“It was out with those old tires. I guess Monty meant to get a new one.”

“Aw, dunno why he’d bother. This one’s a beaut already!”

Leaping off the back of the bike, Sirius took the bike seat and set it over the garage bench table. He took a rag to it, wiping away the layers of dirt and grime that'd been collecting for months. The vinyl was cracked in several places and even missing a chunk out of the back, allowing cotton to burst out like a wound, not that Sirius seemed to mind. It only took him a few minutes to slide the seat back into place and screw it down.

"Ah! Feels good," he sighed, practically bouncing up and down. "So whaddya say, Moons? Feel like taking her out for a birthday spin?"

"Oh? Is it your birthday?"

"Aw, please?"

He'd probably regret it, but the look on Sirius' face was too bright to dampen. After rushing back inside to change, Remus met him out on the road, where he found the bike purring and Sirius blowing dust out of an old helmet.

"Found this inside. Here, put it on."

"What about you?"

"Haven't you seen the films? The good-looking guy never wears a helmet."

"Forgive me if I'm not convinced." Pulling on the helmet, Remus swung his leg over just as Sirius showed him, and nervously wiped the sweat from his palms. "Right. You can go now."

"Aren't you going to hold on?"

Oh!

He slid closer until he could feel the elegant curve of Sirius' back forming to his chest. They were so close, Sirius might've been able to feel his heart thumping through his jacket.

"Feet up, Moons, just like I showed ya!"

Remus did so, squeezing even tighter as he felt the bike lurch beneath them. "A-Are you sure you know what you're doing?"

"Nope!" Sirius revved the engine. "But that's half the fun, innit, delinquent boy?"

He only had time to mutter a quick prayer before the bike was moving, curving down the cobble road and onto the main thoroughfare. It might've been alright, had Sirius not jumped the stop sign and immediately cut off an oncoming lorry.

"Oops!"

"Sirius! We are going to die!"

"Everyone dies, Moons! At least we'll die in style!"

With the honking lorry at their backs, Sirius put on a burst of speed, and just like that they were off.

For the first several minutes, Remus didn't dare raise his head. The bike's revving made his stomach hurt and the wind rushed his ears like a slapping tidal wave. The only thing keeping him from being swept away completely was the feel of Sirius' leather jacket lashed between his fists. They hit a pothole and suddenly all Remus could picture was their mangled bodies as they flew through the air, Sirius' brains splattered across the roadway like a Jackson Pollock painting. Not so handsome now, are you, Remus the ghost would say.

"Moony, you big ninny!" He heard Sirius shout. "Have you looked up even once?!"

"You're going to kill us!"

"Better men have tried, believe me!"

Remus resisted the urge to punch him in the gut, fearing a crash.

"What's that?" Sirius called. "Something's in the road!"

"Shut up!"

"Oh god!" The bike wobbled sharply. "Moony, look out! We're gonna __"

"SHUT UUUP!" Remus wrenched his face up, his heart in his throat, and found nothing—only open road ahead of them.

"Knew you could do it," Sirius sniggered.

Right, Remus thought, now I'm going to kill you.

As maddening as Sirius was, he'd released him from his fear—however temporarily. The wind still rushed them, only now Remus could feel the tickle of Sirius' hair as it whipped around and kissed him fleetingly on the face and neck. The bike was sturdy on its wheels, and with them aboard it went roaring down the country road, never straying far enough from the sea that they couldn't see or smell it. The sky was ice blue and the air was colder now, but Remus didn't even care. He was reminded of being back in Sandra's fancy coupe, racing around every bend as fast as the engine could handle. It was as close to flying as he'd ever felt.

Up and down they went, yielding to every bend and racing down the straightaways like lightning. Sirius read the road better than someone on a first ride should've been able, but Remus had already gotten used to being surprised by him.

"I love you."

Sirius leaned his head back. "What was that, Moons?"

"I said—" and he took a deep breath; "I LOVE YOU, SIRIUS BLACK!"

"OH! HA! I love you too! I love you, Moony—I LOVE MOOOOONY! WAH-HOO!"

Remus tightened his hands around Sirius' waist, heart thumping all over again. Sirius put on another sharp burst of speed, and then looked back at him and smiled.

"I love you more than anything. Happy birthday, Moons."

Remus blushed beneath his helmet.

"Sirius, you're really such a—YOU FUCKING IDIOT, EYES ON THE BLOODY ROAD!"

"HA-HA!"

Chapter End Notes

Getting "off your face" is just drunk.
If someone "slags off" they're criticizing or mouthing off.
The "A to Z" is a popular road map in the UK.
"Butteries" are a type of bread roll.

Songs featured in this chapter:
"Hit Me with Your Rhythm Stick" by Ian Dury & the Blockheads,

1978 (It was the band's number 1 single); "I Fought the Law" by The Clash, 1977; "Vienna" by Billy Joel, 1977; "Jailhouse Rock" by Elvis Presley, 1957 (ever heard the Queen version ? 👀); and finally, a quick cameo from "Surrender" by Cheap Trick, 1978.

Fun fact: In the original version of "I Fought the Law" by Bobby Fuller the line is "I left my baby and it feels so bad" but the Clash changed it to "I killed my baby". You won't find it on any recordings except for the original live version of them at the Lyceum theatre, found here, but it was this cover (and this choice) that really helped get the band noticed in America.

Just as a note: for pacing's sake the final chapter count might be pushed to 107 chapters instead of 105, but the last few will be shorter (as compared to these latest ones). Will update you guys when I've reached a decision.

See you next week for Christmas! I will be posting on the 25th
<3

Chapter 101: All the Young Punks

Chapter Summary

I'm King 'a the dock! I'm King 'a the dock!

Chapter Notes

HAPPY CHRISTMAS to all those that celebrate. And also advance happy last day of Hanukkah (Dec 26th) for tmrw~

Major CW for this chapter(!!): TW for ableist language (the word 'spaz' is used once) as well as violence (a real ass-whooping) and strong homophobic language. I don't know how to overstate this—the violence is more psychological than it is physical, but it's still a heavy scene. It's not my intent to glorify anything, so if you are at all trigger by it, please stop reading at the '> > >' pick up at the '< < <', and feel free to come over to my tumblr (@motswolo) to ask for a censored version of the scene instead. A few people did that following the TW's in chapter 99 and I think it worked out very well.

Note: There is a lot of slang used in this chapter. If it helps, check the end notes first. (Though you might risk spoilers.)

- Technically the original "Rock Against Racism" benefit concert this chapter is based on would've happened in 1978 but I'm using a bit of facsimile because this is ultimately fiction. So as far as I'm concerned, the Clash played a show at the Lyceum Theatre in March 1979 and that's that, lol.

- Also the chapter picks up almost immediately following the previous one—March 10th 1979, Remus' nineteenth birthday. Admittedly, I've never been backstage at the Lyceum. In my head it's got tunnels like a stadium even though it's very improbable. Oh well.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I don't know how I'm gonna tell you,
I can't play with you no more;
I don't know how I'm gonna do what mama told me,
My friend, the boy next door;

I can't believe what people saying,
You're gonna let your hair hang down;
I'm satisfied to sit here working all day long,
You're in the darker side of town…

- "That's the Way" Led Zeppelin, 1970

"Say it—SAY IT!"

How had this happened? It was just supposed to be a concert…

"Didn't you hear me? I said say it!"

He couldn't think. Didn't know what to think. Where was Tomny?

"I'm gonna give you one last chance… Either you say it, or things are gonna get a whole lot nastier."

I'm King 'a the dock! I'm King 'a the dock!

He would not say it.

* * *

Earlier that night…

It was a hard sell trying to convince Sirius that they couldn't just leave the van and ride the motorbike all the way back to London. Sirius finally relented after Remus pointed out that he didn't actually have a motorcycling licence, and that he didn't fancy dying a miserable death along the M4 on his birthday, but it took promising to return for the bike come proper weather to get his stubborn ass into the van. So long as Monty didn't mind a little sharing, that was.

"You're sure we can park the van here?" Remus asked, wrenching the gear shift into park. It was just after six and they were in the West End. The streets seemed lively enough, though how many were on their way to the same place as them, Remus couldn't be sure.

"It's fine, stop worrying!" Sirius called, practically leaping from his seat and slamming the van's door after himself. "We don't have time to go all the way home anyway. Now c'mon, we'll miss the opening act!”

Undoing his seatbelt, Remus slid out and came to join Sirius on the pavement. He noticed a smear of grease on his left temple, the only remnants of their wild morning spent zipping up and down the Devonshire streets. “At least you’ll blend in with the dirty punks,” he teased, using his thumb to wipe it away.

The Clash were playing at the Lyceum Ballroom, an old theatre that’d been made over and revamped more times than Bowie’s career. They had to hurry just to make it there on time, but upon arrival, they found a crowd big enough to rival any one of James' covetous football games. There were punks and Jamaican rude boys and mod revivalists with their mopeds. As promised, the Anti-Nazi League had congregated themselves along the Strand with their small rally of banners and bullhorns. There were other tables set up, mostly bearing the names of sympathetic council members and various other trade unions, and along the street a large gathering of police officers had taken it upon themselves to help direct traffic. Remus could tell by their dour looks that they were not as excited to be there. A few were carrying riot shields, pacing uneasily; the only thing standing between the League and those taking offence to their being there in the first place.

Despite the looming presence of police, another throng of people had assembled across the street, these ones carrying boards and placards bearing various slogans in support of the National Front and all their fascist-favouring allies. Through megaphones of their own, they shouted obscenities and foul abuses to all that were gathering. Thankfully the nearby streets were so loud that the noise of the traffic and crowd's eager yammering all but drowned them out. Remus doubted they'd be putting up with the snub for long, but the police were out in force, and they had a concert to get to.

After dodging a few trades activists (and only getting suckered into signing one petition) they managed to shove their way toward the front of the queue. Remus paid for the tickets—a meagre two pound fifty—and while they waited for the usher to rip their tickets, Sirius picked up one of the boot-tramped fliers from the ground and waved it in Remus’ face.

“ ‘The only band who matters’,” he read. “It’s certainly bold enough.”

“It’s a lie. Tossers haven’t seen us yet.”

If Sirius hadn't been broken of his musical blues already, he certainly was now. He grinned at Remus and suddenly a crash sounded as a window somewhere nearby shattered, causing both of them to flinch and duck. The mob was throwing rocks now.

Inside the Lyceum opened up like a palace, everything everywhere gilded and shiny, just ripe for use. The punks stood out as juxtaposed against the historical venue, not that they seemed to care. Egged on by the crowd's inherent competitiveness, Sirius managed to elbow his way into the stage's very front, tugging Remus along without care. The usual velvet seats had been removed in favour of bodies packing themselves into the pit, and it was so hot Remus could feel the sweat already gathering along his spine.

"Prongs is gonna kill us, you know," Remus said to Sirius, half-shouting in his ear just to be heard.

"Eh, let him! Punk waits for no one."

Many times Remus had wondered when it'd be that they'd get to see heroes like David Bowie or the Rolling Stones perform, but they were all off touring the likes of America and Japan. Besides, that was music, sure—but this? This was culture.

They knew the show was starting when the lights came down and a guitar could be heard echoing feedback through the sound system.

The band itself was a riot. Joe Strummer was a frontman for the history books, a complete legend in the making. They played punk rock as it was supposed to be; not angry and self-righteous, but valiant and unafraid, willing to say all the shit that needed to be said—damned be the consequences! They wore shirts with the collars popped, and were decorated head-to-toe in studded belts, zippers, safety pins, with the traditional bovver boots that could curve a head in. Their hair was slicked at the temples like the teddy boys of old, but their voices were powerful, teeming with youthful rage. The ruling establishment, police, alienation, boredom—they condemned all of it. They were provocateurs, yet nothing about them read as a cry for help. They weren't unclean animals champing at the bit, nor were they pretentious shit-bags just looking for a reason to whinge.

The crowd fed into them but never did itself in. No one was spitting at each other as they had in the basement of the 100 Club while watching Sid Vicious play an unplugged bass guitar with blood dripping down his face. The throng simply moved as one, ebbing and flowing like a great metal-studded sea while the band came alive ahead of red and yellow stage lights.

‘He's in love with rock'n'roll, whoaah!
He's in love with gettin' stoned, whoaah!
He's in love with Janie Jones, whoaah!
He don't like his boring job—NO!'

Sirius leapt up and down for the entire set, pounding the air with his fist. With his unkempt hair and leather jacket he could've almost passed for a punk. No one gave him a second glance as he used Remus’ shoulder to hurl himself skyward with added velocity. Toward the end of the show when a large guy in a sleeveless leather jacket began to jostle him unfairly, Remus stepped in and told the prick to fuck off. It didn’t work, and while the encore started and the band began to thrash harder than its audience, Sirius took his arm and together they escaped toward stage-left. They ended up in front of one of the stage monitors, not ten feet from where the guitarist was ripping into his Les Paul. He could’ve sweated on them and Remus would’ve thanked him.

‘Hanging about—down the market street,
I spent a lot of time on my feet!
When I saw some passing yabbos,
We did chance to speak!’

“THINK I SHOULD TRY IT LIKE THAT?” Sirius yelled in his ear.

“TRY WHAT?” Remus yelled back, too busy watching the band and getting battered by the crowd to be paying much attention.

“PLAY THE GUITAR ON STAGE! LIKE STRUMMER! I COULD DO THAT!”

“I’M SURE YOU COULD, PADFOOT! JUST—HA!—JUS’ LIKE ‘IM!”

“WANKER! I SO COULD!”

Remus threw his head back and cackled, nearly butting the guy behind him in the forehead. They were packed in like sardines, sweating through their leather and fever-driven to teenage madness. Remus’ head felt like it was in an oven, but he wasn’t even conscious enough to complain. The music had hold of him; every drum fill was a punch, every riff a stab to the gut. He was sober but he might as well have been on speed.

‘All the young puuuunks!
Laugh your life—
'Cause there ain't much to cry for!
All the young cuuuunts!
Live it now—
'CAUSE THERE AIN'T MUCH TO DIE FOR!'

The entire thing finished with one final sweep of the drums, and just like that, the Clash were forever impressed on Remus’ subconscious. He’d be humming the likes of “Clash City Rockers” and “Tommy Gun” under his breath for years.

As the band left the stage and the theatre lights went up again, the crowd continued to rally. They were desperate for anything more, even the tail wisps of a show well-done. Cupping his hands over his mouth, Remus whooped and fed into the fever until he felt Sirius tugging on his arm. He was pointing furiously at a wall along the side of the stage, where the concert’s previous lack of light had concealed a single inconspicuous door. At first Remus was confused—he didn’t want to leave, the high was there! But then, as he blinked at him dazily, he began to realise just what Sirius was alluding to. The door was painted all black to blend in with the stage, but if they’d come in from behind, then moving forward could only mean one thing.

They had to wait for a short lapse in the security. As the men in black cut-off t-shirts began shepherding everyone out, Sirius slipped past the flimsy barrier and reached the door in a single stride. Then a miracle happened—the door was unlocked.

“Christ, I can’t believe that worked!” Sirius gasped, the moment they were through.

“Stupid luck,” Remus agreed, nodding and still breathless. The hallway they'd found themselves in had walls made of brick, lacquered in a peeling white paint. There were countless doorways cutting through it like Swiss cheese and behind them they could still hear the sounds of life—celebrating fans, endless cries and whistles, the clattering of stage equipment already being packed up. No broken windows, though if the situation outside hadn't improved in the last two hours then Remus imagined it was only a matter of time.

Without any preamble, a roadie came flying out of one of the doorways, wheeling along the usual stack of flight cases. Remus and Sirius just about fled in the other direction when they saw him, but the guy barely glanced their way, rushing past in cargo shorts and a t-shirt with dark stains under either armpit.

Watching him go, Remus glanced at Sirius. Sirius glanced back. Wordlessly, they both descended into a fit of laughter that lasted just long enough for—

“OI! YOU TWO GET BACK ‘ERE!”

They’d been spotted. Their great conquest of the Clash's backstage foiled. Before Remus could even beget an apology, Sirius slapped him in the gut and sprinted away.

“Leg it, Moons!”

They took off together, the security guard roaring at them to return or face the consequences. Within a few seconds they’d caught up to the roadie from earlier, who gaped the moment he realised who was overtaking him. Not willing to give up so early, Remus stayed tight on Sirius’ heels and squeezed past the trolley of flight cases, only to get his jacket pocket caught along the edge of the middle case. It tugged free all at once, taking the rest of the black boxes down with a thunderous clatter and nearly sending the roadie flying over the handles.

“SORRY!” Remus yelped, as Sirius threw his head back and cackled.

The mess slowed down the guard some, but by then the hallway had widened into a full underground passage, complete with stacks of crates sitting idly by. Countless wires lined the floor just waiting to be tripped over. They might’ve been able to take advantage of the head-start, had the noise of the falling cases not drawn the attention of every other person within ear-shot.

As two more members of security turned and darted straight for them, Sirius grabbed Remus by the elbow and yanked him through a doorway off to their left. It led to a concrete stairway that smelt of mould and damp. With little light apart from the glowing yellow lamps mounted on the wall, there was no telling where it might lead.

“Up or down?” Remus demanded, still aware of the shouting out in the corridor. Next to him, Sirius looked frantically at each staircase.

“When in doubt!” Was all he said, before he was wrenching Remus down and further into the heart of the theatre.

They raced over either step, hearts launching into their throats as they heard the door they’d come through slam open and heavy boots fill the stairway above.

“Bloody run, Moons!” Sirius hissed, taking the steps two at a time.

“I am!”

Thankfully they managed to find another door just one floor below. This one merged into a different corridor, packed with theatre hands as well as crates upon crates of different stage equipment. Speakers sat piled against the wall across from them, along with several pieces of a drum kit and a soundboard larger than their entire bed back home. Remus might’ve stayed longer just to admire it, had Sirius not already been pulling on his arm.

“C’mon! We just—”

“Pissing sod—outta the way!”

They’d turned directly into the path of several men, and the one in front—who was perhaps no taller than Lily—waved his hands in their faces frantically until they jumped apart. He scowled beneath his aviator glasses, almost comically large on his face, only to immediately forget their existence the moment he passed by.

“I don’t care what the fucking lawyers have to say, the lawyers know piss-all about what fucking punk is!” He was howling at the guys; “Someone sort it out! We’re in Canterbury next month and if I have to hear Topper whinge one more time that his stash’s been cut, I’ll have ‘em all sacked!”

Sirius yanked his arm again. “Dammit, Moony! Come on!”

But Remus was frozen. Somewhere between 'piss-all' and 'Canterbury' he'd recognised the angry little man from the pages of his New Musical Express magazines back home.

“Don’t you know who that is?” He hissed, standing firm. “That’s Bernie Rhodes." Bernie fucking Rhodes! "He used to manage the Sex Pistols." With that dickhead Malcolm McLaren! "Now he’s managing the Clash."

“Blimey, you sure?”

“Uh-huh!”

“Wicked.”

Too star-struck to realise how long they’d dawdled, Remus was almost tempted to follow Rhodes down the crowded hall until the door leading to the stairway flew open behind them.

“YOU! STOP RIGHT THERE!”

“You blokes just don’t bloody give up, do you?” Sirius floundered, practically leaping several feet backward in surprise. Together he and Remus turned and made another mad-dash up the hall—dodging several people and even more equipment while their ears continued to ring. They were headed straight for a crossroads, but the security guards were only an arm’s length behind, and they did not sound happy.

“This way!” Sirius hollered, disappearing around the right-hand corner at the end of the hall. Remus might’ve followed, but another trolley of equipment emerged out of the bisecting path, cutting him off. With nothing else to do, he threw himself down the opposite hallway and sprinted past several girls smoking while lounging across wooden crates of stage decor. He made a left, then another left and finally a right, wondering how an underground theatre space could feel so endless. When the shouting had finally ebbed some, Remus stopped to catch his breath. He wished he knew where Sirius had gone, or where he’d ended up. There were still people around, mostly loitering in the hallway with cigarettes in their hand. A girl wearing more makeup than Siouxsie Sioux eyed him appraisingly before meandering into a dressing room across the way. Inside Remus could hear plenty of chatter, as well as the occasional bout of laughter.

“Oi, you see a kid running around here?" Someone called distantly. "Bloody berk jumped the barrier.”

Remus groaned. Seemed his pursuers hadn’t given up and were now just barely around the corner. Apart from the dressing room, his only other option was a heavy metal door with an exit sign hanging over it, but when he tried the handle, there was no give. A cardboard sign hung from it, tipped the wrong way. When he turned it around it read; Door handle busted, use south exit.

Typical.

All other options spent, Remus turned to the door the Siouxsie-girl had gone through and slipped inside. It was clear it was a dressing room, but if only he'd known beforehand just who it belonged to.

“So Joe, what d’ya think about the bootleg LPs of the Clash that are going around? I mean that’s bound to be taking money out of your pocket, right?”

Joe…?

“I say good luck to it, ‘cause we ain’t hit anyone wiff a live LP like we should’a. Like they expect, innit. But we ain’t like th’ other bands ‘a our standard—we’re trying to do sum'ffing new. Show up the other groups, say ‘this is what a proper group does’. Not sell old rubbish that ye’ve already bought.”

Remus quite literally froze. His eyes were watering furiously from all the cigarette smoke but he would’ve had to be blind to miss who was leaning up against that dressing room counter. His face was on the bloody tour poster—and every half-decent copy of NME of the last year. It was Joe Strummer, lead singer for the fucking Clash.

“So these bootleg people, I say good luck to ‘em,” Strummer went on. “It’s a pirate business and we’re watching. So if we catch ya, we smash the microphones—we smash the tape recorder, and we wrap th’ tape ‘round yer ‘ead. But good luck to ya, right. If you can get it onto vinyl then I’m not gonna start chasing ya.”

The interviewer nodded methodically, holding the microphone almost directly beneath Mr. Strummer’s nose while Siouxsie-girl passed him her cigarette.

“Joe, is there a message behind what you write that makes it a little more special than anything else on the scene? You call it either ‘the dole or rock ‘n roll’, but do you really think the working class understands you?”

“ ‘Course they understand, and what we’re saying to the working class is… You okay there, mate?”

Remus blinked. He almost looked around to see who Strummer was talking to. Then it hit him.

No way. No way Joe Strummer was actually talking to him!?

The singer arched a brow, glanced at the Siouxsie-girl, and pointed with his cigarette.

“Toilet’s just there, mate.”

Remus couldn’t believe it. Joe fucking Strummer just told him where the bathroom was.

Holy shit!

Before he could do anything else—like sob or soil his trousers—a pair of hands slammed down onto his shoulders.

“Gotcha!"

It was the security guard. He pinched Remus around the neck uncomfortably, fisting the back of his collar and leaving no room for an escape.

"Thought you could take off and run wild back ‘ere, didn’t you, greasy bleeder!" He shouted, then; "Apologies, folks. I’ll get ‘im outta your hair now…”

There wasn’t time for anything else. The guard hauled Remus out of the dressing room faster than he’d arrived. As he marched him back up the hall, grumbling about the ‘other miserable git’ that could’ve only been Sirius, Remus couldn’t help the smile that’d spread over his face. In the back of his mind, he’d already won the night. He could still hear the concert. Or wait—someone somewhere was playing the new Clash record like a hail Mary.

I want to move the town to the clash city rockers,
You need a little jump of electrical shockers!
You better leave town if you only want to knock us,
Nothing stands the pressure of the clash city rockers!

At one point, just after the furious guard had finished swearing up and down that he was going to spend the night in the nick for such a stunt, another man dressed in all black with a stage pass hanging around his neck appeared and complained of a brawl that’d broken out in front of the theatre between several punks and a group of National Front thugs that’d come to crash the party.

“You best be thanking your lucky stars tonight, boy,” the guard told him, as he threw Remus out into a back alley by the scruff of the shirt. It was surprisingly busy outside, the alley filled with plenty of other kids, all mulling around and waiting to see if they'd manage a glimpse of the famous rockers through their back door. A few of them glanced at Remus venomously on his way out, as though they too had dreams of breaking in to get even a whiff of Strummer's presence. Remus didn't care. The feeling of being on speed was back, and lasted even as Sirius threw himself at him from behind.

"Moony, you made it!" He cried, as Remus turned to face him. "Been missing you. Thought I was going to have to spring you from the nick."

"They threw you out too, huh?"

"Caught me by the stairs," Sirius grumbled. "But I almost made it onto the stage! I was trying to snag one of the mikes but they beat me to it."

"Bad luck."

"Yeah... but get this! As I was running away, I spotted this sitting near the side of the stage."

And then Sirius held up a drumstick.

"You didn't."

"I did!" Sirius twirled the stick around expertly, before taking Remus' hand and placing it in the middle of his palm. "Happy birthday, you handsome nob."

Remus beamed down at the gift, before hugging Sirius tightly and tucking it into the back pocket of his jeans. "I saw Joe Strummer," he bragged, unable to help it. "Looked at me and everything. Even offered to let me use the loo."

"No fucking way! You jammy bastard!" Sirius celebrated by punching him in the arm. "Well, you'll be pleased to know that I didn't waste all of my time since being thrown out on my rear. I've been outsourcing as well."

"More drumsticks?"

"Not quite." With a triumphant grin, Sirius held up a tiny baggie of white powder, no bigger than a ten pence.

“You bought cocaine?”

“SHHH!” He hissed, covering Remus’ mouth with both hands. “You trying to get us mugged?”

Remus shook him off, still shocked by Sirius’ brazen attitude. Sure, they’d had the occasional cheeky bump or two at the Shoestring, but none of them had ever gone so far as to buy it themselves.

“It’s not even coke,” Sirius rectified. “Guy called it DMT. Supposed to feel like those mushrooms we had, ‘cept it kicks in faster and won’t knock us on our arses all night. Or so he said.”

“Where’d you even get it?”

“Group of skinheads at the end of the alley.”

“Sirius, you generally aren’t supposed to talk to the fascists at the anti-fascist rally.”

“But all the socialists had was pot.”

Remus sighed and nudged him with his elbow. “C’mon. Let’s get home before you start tweaking for heroin on the corner.”

“Just for that, I’m not sharing.”

They slung an arm around each other and started for the end of the alley, stepping over dirty puddles and piles of rubbish. The other punks watched them but paid no mind for the most part, too busy standing around and smoking.

“Prongs and Wormtail really are going to be so miffed they missed it,” Sirius was saying. “Maybe we should take ‘em to a show. Hey, the Damned's just made a comeback! And I hear Rat Scabies likes to challenge people in the audience to get up and play for him. Think Pete would go for it?”

“Truthfully I think Peter'd have a heart attack if someone like Rat Scabies so much as looked at him.”

“Ha! Probably. Couldn't very well blame him. Man, we should get over to America! I’d like to see Van Halen—and the Cars,” Sirius said, busy gawking at a girl with hair spikes sharp enough to poke an eye out. She flipped him off for it, and he finished by blowing her a kiss.

“America, really? Have you ever even been on a plane?”

“Few times. Mum used to fly Reg and I to Germany every other summer to visit our grandmother. Bitchy old cow. Then another time for my cousin Bellatrix’s wedding in Marseille. Also a bitchy cow. Have you never been on one then?”

Remus shook his head. “Mum always said she hated flying. And I don’t have any cousins.”

“None at all?”

“Not that I know of.”

“Man, first the beach and now planes. Is there anything you aren’t a total virgin at?”

“I can think of a few things.”

Smirking, Sirius slipped an arm around his waist. “Flying ain’t that bad anyway, but hey—if you get nervous, I’ll let you sit in my lap for moral support.” He sniggered while Remus steered them past a set of skip bins covered in graffiti. As they neared the end of the alley, one of the skinheads that'd been loitering caught up with them, hands and neck buried deep in his bomber jacket.

“Looking for a score, lads?”

“Nah, we’re done for the night,” Remus said.

“Jus’ a penny. Whatever you want—I got it all.”

“I already paid up, mate,” Sirius said. “Leave us alone.”

“These cunts ain't givin' you any trouble, eh Whacker?” Another one said, waltzing up from behind. He had the words ‘East London’ tattooed across the top of his forehead and whistled at them like one might a dog.

“Givin' lip, Perry,” the other one—Whacker—told him.

“Don’t mean nothing by it,” Remus insisted, "we’re just not looking to score anymore tonight."

Meanwhile, Perry looked him up and down in his heavy jacket and Ben Sherman shirt. The gaze was scrutinising, and Remus immediately let go of Sirius’ shoulder.

“Oh. You’re with the toff," Perry cooed. "The twee wanker with the cutesy RP. Thought we'd scared the piss outta him already." He elbowed his friend. "Got no balls, them upmarket packers."

"That's not what your mum said last night," Sirius grumbled.

"What d'you say, prick?" The skinhead lunged forward, attempting to snag a fistful of Sirius' jacket, but Remus got between them first, shoving the guy off. He stumbled a moment before righting himself next to his friend, looking furious. Immediately Remus threw his hands up.

"We don't want any trouble," he bleated. "Sorry on behalf of the wanker... Say, how 'bout I just slide you a tenner and we agree not to look at each other anymore?"

"That's a gas, but I got a better idea. You hand over everyfin you got or I'll make it so you can't look at anyfin anymore!"

Remus felt himself sigh. They could probably handle a few pricks looking for a fight—provided they didn't pull a knife, that was—but he knew from the sound of heavy boots down the alleyway that Perry's shouting had already drawn the attention of others.

"Here." He tossed them what was in his pockets; a few rumbled notes, his cigarettes, a cheap lighter, nothing worth losing an eye for. He tried to hide the drumstick, but Whacker noticed it first and snatched it. Then he leered at Remus, waving it in his face and playing at taking an eye out before growing bored and pitching it down the alley. It hurt a bit to hear the distant clatter, but not enough for Remus to throw a punch.

"Moony!" Cried Sirius indignantly. It took another sharp look from Remus before he was reluctantly emptying his own pockets, grumbling under his breath. They took back the DMT, and when all that was left was their keys, Perry took them too and threw both out onto the dark street the opposite way just for a laugh.

"Now there's a good boy," the skinhead jeered, once Sirius had managed to resist throwing himself at him. Remus was thankful. Lily had hidden a key beneath a stone in the flat's tiny garden ages ago, they could leave the van for one night. Better to just get away with all limbs intact.

"I want the jacket too," Whacker said, jutting a thumb at Sirius' leather coat. "Hand it over."

“No, not the jacket,” Remus growled. “It’s cold out. Now you took our money, even got your merchandise back. Let it be done with.”

“And how will you pay our fee?” Another voice called. Remus spun around instantly, furious and about ready to lose it himself.

“What fucking fee—”

“Our handling fee,” Lee grinned. “The one you pay to avoid being handled.”

It was like being stared down by the barrel of a gun. Remus staggered slightly, enough that Sirius looked over at him with concern. But he was there alright, really there. Lee. He strolled up with the rest of his crew, flicking away a cigarette butt as he adjusted the collar of his coat. It wasn't the boy he’d once known, but an angry man, looking to settle a score.

“Hello, Lu.”

Dammit.

“You know these toffs, Lee?” Perry called.

Lee eyed them plainly, hands in his pockets like he were observing a fair game of footie. Similar to the last time Remus had seen him, his hair was shorn short, only now he bore a tattoo of a swallow on the side of his neck along with a single name. Ian.

“Know the skinny one,” Lee replied, turning his head to spit into the drain. “Wouldn’t miss that scrawny pair ‘a legs anywhere... Not his boyfriend though. He’s new.”

A round of scornful laughter echoed from the group at Lee’s back. There had to be at least ten of them, counting Perry and Whacker, and it was clear that they respected Lee enough to not step on his toes when he spoke. The rest of the punks seemed to have moved on, or were otherwise keenly watching from near the theatre’s back door. No one wanted a piece, nor were they about to risk taking a knife to the gut for a couple of strangers. It just wasn’t the way.

“Lee,” Remus breathed. “What are you doing here?”

“In the West End? Or do you mean, here-here? It's a concert, innit. Didn't realise it was invite only. No, I think the better question is, what the fuck are you doin’ here?" Lee paused, looking them up and down with a sneer. "Yer no punk. You're just a posh little cunt who's lost his way. Guess not much else is new."

More jeering, this time accompanied by a sharp smack to Remus' shoulder courtesy of Whacker. Sirius bat him away for it, but the boys had crowded in around them now, backing them up against the alley wall. There came more shoving, leering voices attempting to get a rise out of them; "What 'oo doin' 'ere? What 'oo doin' 'ere?"

Eventually it got to be too much. The next time Whacker went to touch him Remus snapped—shoving him backward into his friends while the rest of them gasped and heckled like a pack of noisy hounds.

"Ohh, I get it," Lee started. "You two came to see the show! The Clash… Fancy yerselfs a couple 'a punks, do ya?"

"Better than you," Sirius scowled. "You look like the shoe-rag Joe Strummer uses to polish his boots."

"You watch yer mouth, 'fore I bash those pretty teeth in," Lee snarled. "You don't even know what 'tis they're talkin' about up there. You don't know what it's like to be us. Blokes like you make us crawl. Right across society's fuckin' underbelly! Drinking the dregs that your kind's leftover!"

"You think you've got it tough? You're the one selling drugs to teenagers. You can eat shit, we came for the art."

"Art? Art?!" Lee let out a loud bark of laughter, which every boy returned in glee. "HA, art—figures! You rich cunts always did have a nasty habit of puttin' suffering behind fancy glass cases to ogle. But reckon I might as well introduce you, Lu." And then he turned back to the group, arms wide. "Listen up, lads! This 'ere is Lu, and he is from Blllllll—ackheath! Though I didn't know it 'til more recently. Before that he'd always said he was from the south side. Now 'ere, show of hands—how many 'a you are from the south side?"

Hands went up, and Remus felt a bead of sweat run down the back of his neck.

"Well, I'll be shittered," Lee cackled. "Recognise any of 'em, Lu? Or were you too busy legging it back to daddy's every night to pop in for a visit?"

"Lee, please—"

“Sh-sh-sh-sh!” Lee swept in, nearly placing a finger to Remus’ lips himself. “Story ain’t done yet, love.” He smacked Remus lightly on the cheek, and while Sirius pulled him back a few steps, Lee turned toward the other men. “Get this, boys, Lu 'ere, i*s so* posh, that his dad breeds dogs in his spare time. Fuckin' dogs! Fancy ones—purebreds—from America! Watches 'em hump each other for a hobby! Oh, and I almost forgot—he also works for Her Majesty’s little government, swiping pennies from the poor and pocketing them for himself—”

“Tory scum!” One shouted.

“—After all, can’t get that rich without picking ‘a few pockets—”

“Go back to Daddy, bloody queer!”

“—Maybe we ain’t so different after all!”

“Kick ‘is head in, Lee!”

The barrage grew in volume, and Remus could feel the stab of the rough brick as he and Sirius held themselves flush against the wall.

“Mhm, that’s right,” Lee goaded, arms still raised like some hellish conductor. “Piss-taking cunt had us all fooled. Told us he was down on his luck—made us feel sorry for ‘im. Then he slithered his way into the group like a fucking snake, telling porkies ‘til he was blue in the face—pretending ‘e was one ‘a us! ... Well are you...? Are you one of us, Lu? 'Cause now’s the time to prove it." He tsked. "I do hope you’s were listening when Doss taught you how to throw that punch.”

Remus could feel his heartbeat in his ears. The shift in the group was palpable, like wolves drooling over the idea of their next meal. He felt his resolve crumble, but he had to say something or else Lee'd probably shut his mouth permanently. And so he resorted to the only thing stronger than his fear—anger.

“H-Hanging with the fascists now, Lee? What’s next, beating up kids who don’t want to shave off all their hair? You’d make a pretty shite patriot… Would'a thought the NF prefers those who can read.”

“Watch it…” Sirius murmured, rather hypocritically.

“You should listen to your mate,” Lee warned. “Y’know I don’t run like that, I’m anti-racist. Got no beef wiff immigrants and I ain’t no white power skinhead. Nah, this ‘ere’s a class issue, ‘n it’s you I got the issue wiff… You, who I’m about ready to kick the piss out of. And this time, ‘fraid there ain’t gonna be no Tomny ‘round to save you.”

Several boys spat at their feet. The rest pulled knives or otherwise readied their fists. Remus should’ve been bricking his pants, but instead all he could think of was Tomny. Even if he was there, would he even deserve his help?

“Look, it’s clear you don’t like him, but Lupin never did anything to you!” Sirius shouted. “You were friends, for Christ’s sake! Doesn’t that count for anything? I thought guys like you valued loyalty.”

“Not for lying scum!” Lee barked. “Now best get outta the way, princess, that is unless you wanna get the shite beaten outta you too.”

The threat was enough to get Remus moving again. He grabbed Sirius by the wrist and pulled him back, already shoving him further down the wall, toward the end of the alley.

“Quick, go.”

“What? Fuck off, I ain’t going anywhere!”

“Just go, Sirius.”

“Aw, the little batty boy’s playing brave!” Perry jeered, shattering the hollow feeling in Remus' chest. “You sure they’re just mates, Lee? Seem like a couple ‘a poofs tah me.”

“That right… Best keep our backs to the walls then, lads.”

“Fuck off!” Sirius screamed, jumping forward quickly enough that Remus had to grab him by the arm. “Let’s see how brave you are without all those miserable bellends standing at attention behind you! Fuckin’ wanker!”

More shouting, and this time the boys retaliated with an armed assault. Sirius took a half-full beer can to the forehead, shocking him enough that he had to stagger back into Remus while the others continued lambasting them.

“I’m going to beat the seven shades of shit out of you!”

“Cheeky twat!”

“Try saying that again!”

“Put ‘em in their place, Lee!”

“Enough!” Remus roared. “It’s me you’ve got a problem with, leave him out of this!”

Lee held up a hand, and the abuse stopped almost instantly. For a moment no one did anything. Lee was staring him down, and yet Remus couldn’t stop to worry about only him. He kept Sirius behind him, who was already bleeding from a split across his eyebrow, whipping his gaze back and forth so he could best determine where the first blow would come from. Finally, Lee reached into his pocket and withdrew a pocket knife, which he opened carefully and showed off as though it were a card in a magician’s deck.

"See this? I could gut 'chu right 'ere... Leave ya for dead."

Remus swallowed. A 'but' seemed to hang in the air, and just when he thought Lee was likely to make good on his words, he passed the knife off to one of his friends and stepped in very close.

Not without honour, then.

“When’s the last time you talked to Tomny? And don't you lie to me.”

It was not the question Remus was expecting. He straightened up, but Lee was already so close. Even in the darkness, he could see the pin-point pupils; the red veins in his eyes.

"December."

Lee scratched his nose. “You hear his girl’s up the duff?”

Remus didn’t speak, but Lee knew him too well. He read his answer off of his face as easily as looking at him.

“Ah, so you did know. Did he tell you he was quitting the gang then? Some pish about family. As if we weren’t already a family! Ha—fucking prick…" Lee stepped away a hair, grinding his teeth together in some sort of ironic smile. It was impossible to keep up; one moment he was threatening to kill him, the next he was smiling like they were old friends.

Lee poked him in the chest, hard.

"You... You just couldn’t help yerself, could ya, Lu?" Lee turned breathless, as though he were struggling to remain calm. "Always slinking back there," he grew louder, "dragging down our Tom! What, you bloody in love with ‘im or something?”

Remus scowled, resisting the urge to shout.

"I don't have anything to do with Tomny's choices. We're not—"

Lee slapped him, but it was Sirius who cried out. Remus held his cheek in a daze.

"I said don't. Lie. To. Me." Lee paused to take several breaths. Slowly the smile returned, but when he spoke his voice was raw, his eyes glassy. "It's all your fault, Lu. You lost me my best friend. So now... I'm gonna take yours."

> > >

A moment of silence followed, and Remus had just enough time to look back at Sirius before Lee raised a hand.

"Take him."

The crew moved all at once, arms locking over Sirius' shoulders like vices. Remus was still free, but in his panic he stepped toward Sirius and the guys holding him twisted Sirius' arms sharply, forcing a cry from behind his teeth.

"STOP!" Remus shouted. "STOP—STOP, LEE—STOP!"

"You want it to stop?" Lee asked. "Fine. Get on the ground."

He didn't understand what Lee was saying. It took another shout for Remus to get moving, and by then Sirius was fighting against his captor's hold like an animal caught in a trap.

"Don't do it, Moony!"

Lee pointed at Sirius; "You keep quiet! Lu's got some apologising to do. And he can start with each one 'a those pretty fingers."

Apparently Remus was not supplicant enough. Lee went around him and kicked his legs out, forcing him down to his knees. The dirty water leftover from that morning's rain shower instantly soaked into the knees of his trousers, turning his skin to ice.

"Give me your hand."

Slowly Remus raised it.

"No. Your right hand."

It took another breath, and by then Remus was sure he couldn't feel the tips of his fingers anyway. But he did feel it when Whacker stepped forward and gripped his wrist, using the other hand to take hold of his pointer finger and wrench it backwards. Not broken—but the threat was there, waiting on Lee's command.

"Now let's see," Lee mused, his words slow as he recounted; "Flacky. Doss. Seesaw. Tomny. Ian. Five friends... five fingers. Sounds pretty fair to me."

"You actually blame him for all that?" Sirius exclaimed, while attempting to kick out at Lee with either leg. "You fucking lunatic!"

"Shaddup!"

An arm went around Sirius' throat, making him gurgle pathetically as Remus' heart began hammering wildly in his chest.

"You can have me," he told Lee, "but let him go. He's not part of this."

"Nice try. But you made him part of this."

With a smug look, Lee crouched down ahead of him. Whacker still had hold of Remus' wrist. One wrong move and he'd be tuning his guitar with his teeth for months.

"How'd you do it?" Lee asked, his voice deadly low. "How'd you fool Tomny into thinking you's were one of us?"

"I didn't."

Lee hit him again. "Liar!'

"—I didn't! Don't you know?! People don't fool Tomny! He sees right through them. Tomny's always known exactly as much as he wants to."

"Then why didn't he kick your sorry arse to the curb, huh?"

"Reckon it's 'cause he liked him!" Grunted Sirius, as he clutched tightly to the arm around his throat. "Bloody f—get off!"

No one listened, and Lee looked at the ground beneath his boots. He murmured something beneath his breath Remus didn't catch at first but should've seen coming. They'd known each other for so long, there was no way Lee didn't know exactly how to get under his skin.

"Liked..." Lee snapped his head up. "You fucking ponce. Always did wonder what you and Tom got up to behind closed doors."

It felt like Lee had sucker punched him. He got the reaction he wanted when Remus moved forward, but he couldn't go any further without feeling a sharp twist in his finger.

“Maybe you're right," Lee grinned. "Maybe he did like you. I mean, after 'ah, he was always so protective of you—even made his girlfriends jealous sometimes. Here’s this skinny little shit from nowhere, can't offer nothing, and yet he's the favourite of all favourites. Tom could’a picked any one of us, but no… He chose you. The miserable little sprog fresh from his mummy’s golden teat.”

Calm down, Remus told himself; It’s what he wants. You can’t lose it now… Sirius—

“Is that it then, Lu? Is that why Tomny kept hush all these years? So you’d feel obliged enough to stick around and—oh… you dirty little boy...”

“Shut your fucking mouth!”

A pair of hands came down before he could even consider lunging at him, and Remus groaned as he was forced to the alley floor. Anticipating the shove, Lee side-stepped him as he fell and was on his feet in a second, slamming a boot down over Remus' back and driving the air from his lungs.

“Moony!” Sirius yelped from somewhere behind him.

“Cheeky sod, you’ve forgotten whose backyard yer in!” Lee leered, stomping on Remus’ back until he could feel the bite of the freezing pavement on his cheek. “Why don’t you just stay down there, eh? Taste the dirt—see how them dregs really feel.”

And he should’ve.

He should’ve just stayed down like Lee told him to. Should’ve shut his mouth and waited for them to lose interest. Should’ve rolled over and shown his belly like the wounded animal he was. But that was the thing about Remus, he’d never been all that good at doing what he was told.

With a heavy grunt, he flipped over onto his side, upsetting Lee’s stance and sending him stumbling backward. For a split second, it almost seemed like he had a shot of getting to his feet, but there were nearly a dozen guys around, and every one of them knew how to best keep a man down. Before he could get off his knees, one of the skinheads slammed a heavy boot into Remus' side, making him double-over in pain. Then another grabbed him by the hair, forcing his chin back until they could capture him in a headlock. He couldn't get a breath in, but that didn't mean he wasn't going to struggle.

"Fuck—you... LEE!"

"Yeah, you's always were a half-decent scrapper," Lee chuckled, before flexing his hand and driving it straight into Remus' stomach.

"Stop it!" Sirius wailed, pinned in a headlock of his own. "Let him go! Stop hitting him—Remus!"

"Ha. Fought best with a damsel to save too!"

The fist came down again.

"Stop it!"

Again.

"STOP IT!"

Again.

He took each shot to the ribs, then the stomach; might've vomited had they not kept his head up. As he retched, Lee stepped back for a breather and wiped the sweat from his brow.

"Well! Nothing like letting off some good ol' steam. And now... Well, now I'm gonna break every single one of those little fingers. Someone hold 'em up for me, would'ya?"

His hand was captured, and no matter how Remus pulled the arm around his throat just got tighter. He gave up when he began seeing black spots in his vision, and by then Lee had him around the wrist, ready to snap his thumb at the joint.

"Shall we say a countdown?"

"Stop it!" Sirius said. "You fucking bastard—let him go!"

"One."

Remus wheezed.

"Two."

He shut his eyes.

"Thr—you know what? I've a better idea."

The entire group of them exhaled, even those of Lee's guys that'd been anticipating the celebratory snap of bone. Releasing his hand, Lee crouched down over Remus again.

"Now I got's an idea for ya, Lu," he cooed, poking Remus tauntingly in the cheek. "How 'bout we let'chu both go? That's right—you and princess there, can waltz on out all on yer own. Hell, we'll even give you yer shit back. All you's got to do is one little thing. Can you do that for me, Lu? Just one teensy-weensy little favour?"

"Don't listen to him, Moony," Sirius croaked, earning himself a sharp jab to the stomach from Whacker and Perry each. Remus cried for him, practically spitting, but he couldn't move with the bicep around his throat. Every time he struggled the skinhead squeezed tighter, until everything began to blur together again. A distant ringing had started in his ears like a far away telephone. He couldn't feel his toes. Were they cold?

"Oi, careful not to kill 'im Keg. Still need the bastard awake…" Lee whistled, then smacked Remus on both cheeks. "C'mon, eyes on me, Lu. You ain't done your penance yet. All's you gotta is repeat after me, then we'll let cha go, orright?"

I'm tired.

The thought came to him slowly, like a leaf drifting downstream. He was so cold.

"Just three little words: 'I'm a ponce'."

It's cold out. I'm cold.

"I don't 'ffink he's listening, Lee."

Another smack.

"Jesus Keg, fucking let the man breathe, would'ya?! Can't say shit with your fist in his throat."

There was a sudden release, and the breath surged in all at once—filling Remus' lungs to the point of discomfort. For a moment he almost believed they were somewhere else, but then his eyes fell on Sirius, still struggling with an arm around his own throat.

Sirius…?

“Cute show, Lu, but you ain’t done,” Lee goaded, close enough that Remus could feel his breath on his cheek. “Go on, you gotta say it. ‘I’m a ponce’.”

He wanted to humiliate him. For all he'd done, Lee wasn't a killer, but he was hurt. And he wanted to take that hurt out on Remus.

“ ‘m… not a ponce…”

Lee’s lip lifted viciously, revealing a sharp chip in his left canine. Remus thought he recognised it. Back when they were fifteen, Doss had bet Lee that he couldn't make the jump across two of the floating docks in the Shadwell Basin. Naturally Lee tried it anyway, and he made it across, only to crack his face open on the way back. It earned him a split lip and a nasty goose egg, but for those few precious moments he’d done it. Lee had bested them all.

Take that! Take that, you shitty tossers! I’m King ‘a the dock! I’m King ‘a the dock!

“Fucking—pay attention!” Lee snarled, driving another fist into Remus' stomach. “This is your last chance, Lu. Either you say it, or things are gonna get a whole lot nastier... Now SAY IT! ‘I’m ponce! I’m a dirty little queer who'd lie to his own friends' fucking faces!”

“You miserable bastard!” Sirius kicked his legs out, like a fitting horse. “Don’t touch him!”

Lee grabbed Remus around the jaw.

“SAY IT! OPEN YOUR GODDAMN MOUTH!”

And because he couldn’t refuse anymore, Remus did open his mouth, just like Lee wanted him to.

Then he spat in his eye.

Take that! Take that! I’m King ‘a the dock! I’m King ‘a the dock!

Lee wheeled back, wiping at his face hysterically. His hands were shaking. Drugs or rage, Remus didn't know.

"You little…" He dissolved into a laugh of disbelief. "Oh Lu... fuck—I warned you."

I can take it, Remus thought proudly. You can't break me.

And maybe he could've stayed proud like that, were it just him, but as Lee wiped the spit from his eye and turned to look at Sirius and he knew just how wrong he was.

"Perry, break his arms."

There was a hint of hesitation probably along the lines of 'Both of them?' but it was quickly dismissed. Perry grabbed Sirius' wrist and braced back against his own forearm, ready to snap it at the elbow. Remus could see the alarm in Sirius' face, the way he stared at his own arm as though it was already taken from him. As though he were already a lost cause. And as Perry got ready to shatter it all, Sirius squeezed his eyes shut.

"NO!"

The cry ripped free of him like an organ from his chest. In a fit of strength, Remus tore his right arm free and grappled onto Lee's trouser leg.

"No, no, please—please, Lee—PLEASE!"

"Gerroff."

"Please, please stop it! Don't do this, you can't do this!"

"I told you!" Lee roared. "I told you to say it! NOW HE PAYS!"

It was like watching in slow motion. He could see the tightening of Perry's hand, the strain on Sirius' face as he waited for the inevitable snap of his arm. It'd kill him, not having his arms. They were already mourning their first failure. If Sirius couldn't play anymore, it'd all be over. They'd never come back from it.

So, Remus turned everything off.

"I'm a—!"

He never got to finish. Like the hiss of hose, a great noise echoed from out on the main street, whistling through the air and ending with a horrible bang. Everyone turned to look, even Lee, and suddenly the sound of yells and rushing books were coming toward them.

The crowd pushed their way down the alley together—anti-fascists and National Front members alike. Marching forward, Lee caught hold of another nearby skinhead and shook him for answers.

"It's the bizzies!" He cried. "Police started shooting off gas bombs like the fucking Provos!"

"Lee, I can't be arrested again, I only just got out!" Said one of the guys. The fleeing man pushed free of Lee's hold, and Lee took a harsh shouldering from another runner. Nearby they could hear the wail of an ambulance, and more hiss-and-bangs as the police culled whatever riot had started beyond them.

"Come on, Lee," Perry said, throwing Sirius into the alley wall and grabbing his friend by the front of his Ben Sherman in a panic. "Forget these fuckin' packers! We gotta go!"

Perry might as well have been asking him to shake hands. Forgetting his revenge, no matter how misconstrued, he couldn't take it.

A police whistle cut through the air, closer than before, and more and more people plunged down the alleyway looking for an escape. Smoke filled the air, enough to make Remus cough—but then he realised it was just the arm around his throat. He stared at Lee, gurgling deep in his throat and begging him with his eyes. You hold all the cards.

"Lee! ... Lee!"

Agony. That was what Remus saw in Lee's face. He was so close. Where was the satisfaction?

"Let him go," Lee growled, "fucking... let him go."

Remus was released immediately, kicked for good measure, and nearly trampled as the boys all turned in the opposite direction. Sirius was by his side in a second, so fast Remus nearly lashed out at him when he felt his hands on his ribs.

<<<

"This ain't over!" Lee was screaming, as his friends half-dragged him toward the end of the alley. "I see you again, and I'll kill you! I'll kill you, you hear me?!"

They were swallowed up by the crowd, and Remus could hear Sirius' voice as he rasped sharply in his ear.

“Remus. Moony, are you alright? Come on, you have to get up. Can you stand?”

He would have to. Gritting his teeth, Remus rolled over and allowed Sirius to haul him upright. Water had seeped in through his trousers and the front of his shirt; his throat felt raw from screaming.

"Did I say it?" He croaked.

Sirius shook his head, confused. "Moons, you're in shock."

"No!" Remus yelped. " 'I'm a ponce'—did I say it?!"

"No. No, you didn't say it."

I...

"I'm sorry."

"Don't be sorry, idiot. We've got to get out of here."

Tugging Remus’ arm over his shoulders, Sirius turned and began leading Remus to the end of the alley. It was slow going, and every scream and pop of a smoke grenade made them flinch.

"You know, for a skinny guy you sure do weigh a ton," Sirius was mumbling. Remus leaned on him just a little bit more for the next few steps, and Sirius responded with an exasperated laugh. "I don't know how you do it," he grunted; "attracting drama everywhere you go—it's mental. Starting to think you're a bigger attention whore than I am."

"No one's a bigger whore than you, Sirius."

"Oi! I'll have you know that I am a single dick kind of chick. Or is it the other way around..."

Remus started to laugh and then seized up. "Ow! Shit... don't make me laugh."

"Laughter's the best medicine anyway, and by the looks of things, you need it. You're hurt bad, Moons. I should take you to the hospital."

"No hospitals," Remus grunted. "Let's just get home."

Stopping just long enough to readjust his hold on Remus' arm, Sirius grumbled something under his breath that sounded a lot like 'bloody predictable' and continued walking. Remus couldn't be bothered. His entire body hurt, and he had to breathe through a sliver in his teeth just to keep himself from wincing after every step.

The idea had been to move away from the fighting, only they hadn't anticipated just how far the rally had broken down. Emerging out of the alley, they found what could only be described as a state of pure calamity. War had broken out ahead of the Lyceum, with police and civilians scattered everywhere. Sirens razed the night while hordes of Metropolitan police were arresting punks and skinheads alike. Down came the rally signs for the National Front and the Socialist Workers Party and anyone who so much tried to stand their ground was beaten into submission with heavy batons.

A group of kids had managed to light flares and were using them to ward off arresting officers while several others had climbed on top of cars, stomping their windows in as well as beating back anyone bold enough to try and stop them. Others clung to the theatre's front steps and massive stone columns with megaphones in hand, screaming their agendas at the top of their lungs.

Everywhere people were running—away or toward the fighting, sometimes Remus just couldn't tell.

"This way," Sirius hissed. "I see an ambulance."

"N-No! Don't need no bloody ambulance—find the van!"

"There's blood on your face."

"It's cosmetic. Stole it from Mary."

"Wanker. Look who's making jokes now." They stepped down a curb and Remus' ankle nearly buckled.

"Shit… Sirius, I'm—"

"Don't talk anymore then," Sirius hissed. "Just walk. Look around for the keys if you can."

As the two of them stumbled along, several police ran past with riot shields and batons, blowing on whistles shrill enough to make their ears seize. The air was thick with smoke, and as they coughed, a bottle soared over their heads and burst against the building wall next to them. Sirius did his best to shield him from the raining glass, but it'd happened so quickly Remus barely had the time to register it.

"FUCKING WANKER!" He heard Sirius bark, though no one came forward to take credit for the act. Across the street, they spotted one of the skinheads roughing up a young punk girl, violently shoving her into a wire fence as she spit and pummelled him with her fits. Sirius was off in a second.

“Get your hands off her, you thick fuck!” He cried as he tackled the skinhead from behind. It was enough to rip the guy off of her and send both him and Sirius sprawling, allowing the girl enough time to bolt. Remus rushed to his aid, but was beaten to the punch by a pair of officers. They wrestled Sirius and the skinhead apart, instantly wrenching their arms behind their back.

“Get off me!” Sirius grunted. “Get your hands off me, ugly prick! Shitty fucking cozzer!”

Then he punched the officer, straight in the nose.

“Sirius!”

Remus took one step—two! He grabbed the cop from behind, ready to rip his arms off should he refuse to release his Sirius. Only he hadn’t seen the other officer come up from behind and raise his baton. It came down over Remus' head like a lead pipe, turning his feet to flimsy paper beneath him. As he collapsed to the pavement, all Remus could remember thinking was that being bashed in by a cop didn’t feel any different from being bashed in by Lee's thugs.

* * *

Remus woke up a few hours later in a holding cell without windows. It was dark inside, the sort of dark that stripped away all time and space. He’d been relieved of his coat, forced to endure the horrible chill that had since settled deep into his bones. When Remus tried to lift his head up off the hard-as-stone bed, he found Sirius sitting across from him in a little ball, forehead resting on his knees. His head was up before Remus had even finished groaning.

“Moony!”

Sirius rushed him in a second, clambering onto the prison cot and cupping Remus' face with either hand. “Shit… Fucking pigs really got you, you’re going to have one hell of a lump. Are you alright, does your head hurt at all?”

“Ngh… No worse than usual.”

Sirius frowned horribly. “Shit, I dunno how to check for a concussion... Here, how many fingers am I holding up?"

Remus blinked. "I'm thinking of a number between two and..."

Scoffing, Sirius pulled away before he could finish, accidentally letting Remus' head slam back against the cot.

"Shit, sorry! Didn't mean to give you another bruise."

“Oh yeah, just add it to the collection.” Remus winced again as he tried to sit up. He needed Sirius’ help to do it, but eventually they were both settled back along the cell wall, shoulder to shoulder against the cement.

“And you?” Remus asked him. “Are you alright?”

“Me? Oh yeah, never better. Always wanted to see what the inside of the nick looked like. Bit dreary. Could use a rug.”

“Hollywood says we get one phone call if you’d like to give Mary the bell.”

Sirius grinned weakly. “One of the assholes that brought us in came by earlier. Said they were gonna hold us for the night, release us in the morning. Honestly, I was expecting worse.”

“What—You think participating in one riot’s gonna get you a trial? You’re not that famous yet, mate.”

“Yeah, but I sure socked that cop though.”

"Knew you were gonna bring that up."

"So you did see!" Sirius chuckled dryly. “Man... Prongs and Wormtail are never gonna believe us. Lottie’s wedding is next week, think she’d find it funny if I made my speech in handcuffs?”

“You're not getting a speech."

"Truly a missed opportunity."

It was so stupid. There they were, talking to each other as though they hadn't just been beaten to a pulp by one of Remus' ex-best friends and promptly arrested and thrown into prison afterwards. Remus nearly called it for what it was, but then Sirius was leaning his head against his shoulder. It was a nice feeling, but the weight was enough to make Remus groan a bit.

“Sorry!” Sirius chirped. “Wasn’t thinking… How’s your body feeling?”

“M’alright, nothing feels broken. Lee was pulling his punches—trying to show off. None of them really stuck.”

“Fucking prick. We should’ve curbed his miserable face in.”

“There were two of us, and almost a dozen of them. Nothing we could’ve done.”

“Still, if I ever see that fucker again, I swear I’ll…”

Remus shook his head. “Don’t think about it anymore. Do you know what time it is?”

“No. Past midnight at least."

"Oh good, so it isn't my birthday anymore?"

Sirius winced as a reply. "You were out for a while... Sorry to say all you have to show for it is a black eye.”

“Better me than you.”

“Oh, because you’re so tough?”

“No. ‘Cause you’re the face. How’re we gonna put you on the cover of the album with a black eye?”

“Ah.”

Quietly, Sirius reached over into Remus’ lap and took his hand. He was warm—the warmest thing for miles. Off in the distance Remus could make out the sounds of other offenders as they paced back and forth in cells of their own; snoring, moaning, or else the occasional curse directed to the officers, God—even their own mothers. It all felt rather stereotypical. But dark rooms were to dark thoughts what lungs were breathing, and despite telling Sirius not to stew on it, Remus couldn’t help but think of Lee.

The evening's events came back into him like a wash of ice. Just… all of it. The concert, the drugs, Whacker, short and rat-like, and Perry, with a face like a decomposing toad. Lee.

Say it!

"Sirius… I…"

I'm a fucking ponce!

"It's not your fault," Sirius cut-in, already reading his mind. "It's not. You were their friend."

"Once."

"Once is enough. Once matters."

And maybe it did… once. But things were different now. If Lee was to be believed then Tomny was on the outs too. Maybe he and Skylar had already headed up to Havering—hell, maybe the baby was already here. He didn't know, he and Tomny hadn't talked in…

"Stop that," Sirius ordered. "I can see those cogs moving inside your head. You can't think about that—you can't. We don't mourn the people who've hurt us, Moony."

"I miss James," Remus said, pathetically. "And Lily, and Peter and Marlene."

"Me too."

"I wish none of this had ever happened. I wish I'd never met Tomny."

"Don't say that."

"It's the truth. Maybe if we'd never met then none of this would've happened."

"Maybe, but then you never would've come to Hawkings, and I..." Sirius bit his lip. "We aren't our parents, you know. I don't care what Lee says. We are not them."

And because Sirius needed to believe it as much as he did, Remus did not argue.

Neither of them spoke for a long time, and eventually they laid down next to each other on the tiny cot, Sirius' back pressed against Remus' chest, their arms wrapped around one another. Eventually Sirius' breathing had become so level that Remus thought he'd fallen asleep. Then Sirius whispered into the dark;

"Moony?"

"Mhm."

"I'm sorry for what happened tonight."

"... Don't think about it. It was my idea to go."

"I know, but I wanted you to have a good birthday. Shit I... I should've found you something better than that stupid stick. I should've—"

Remus leaned forward, burying his face in the crook of Sirius' neck. He still smelled of sweat and the cloying scent of police smoke grenades, but Remus didn't care.

"Tell me something happy?" He asked.

Sirius was quiet for a while.

“Remember last month when Sid Vicious died?"

"Jesus. I said happy, not depressing."

"No, no." Sirius chuckled. "He died and it was in all the papers, right?”

“All of them,” Remus relented. “Even Sheila heard about it.”

“You still write to her?”

“Sometimes. She's a bit more forceful over the phone.”

“That’s nice… You deserve someone to write to.”

“Sid Vicious,” he prompted, when Sirius grew quiet again. “You were talking about Sid Vicious.”

“Right, right. Easy to forget... And that’s the problem, ain’t it? The guy’s been dead—what, a month? And it’s like the whole world’s forgotten about him."

"Not quite. They're saying he murdered his girlfriend."

"I don't believe it," Sirius said, before squirming a bit. "Or maybe he did, I dunno. Not like it matters anyway, it's already old news. Everyone's too busy interviewing Paul McCartney and wondering what colour knickers Rod Stewart's wearing these days."

"Leopard print, for sure."

Sirius chuckled quietly. Then he reached for Remus hand, drawing it tightly across himself and lacing their fingers together.

"I'm not gonna end up like Vicious, Moony. Getting so far only to throw it all away... When I go out, people are gonna remember me."

"And what is it they'll remember you for, Padfoot?"

Sirius squeezed his hand.

"… All of it."

* * *

Sunday 11th March 1979 — The Next Morning...

"On your marks, gentlemen!"

They both started awake, shooting upright on the cot in a hurry. For a split second Remus almost forgot where he was. Then he heard the rattle of the keys in the cell lock and it all came flooding back. Sirius sat next to him, looking disoriented while he blinked the sleep from his eyes.

"Ngnn… What time is it?"

"About half-past five," the officer answered, swinging open the cell door.

"In the morning?!"

"Just in time to catch the first train. Now on your feet!"

Sirius waved him off, clearly irritated to be woken before any reasonable hour, and turned on Remus, eyes suddenly shooting wide.

"Shit Moons, we fell asleep! How's your head?"

Remus groaned, recounting the day before. Clash City Rockers. DMT. Lee. I'm a ponce! Lee, again.

"Well, I'm not dead, so…"

They were released, along with a stern warning to stay away from any further rallies—fascist, socialist, or otherwise—and a warning that if the guard ever caught them sharing a cot again he'd have them arrested under the Sexual Offences Act.

"Homophobic bastard," Sirius grumbled, shrugging on his jacket outside the station gates. "We weren't even doing anything! Try telling a straight couple they have to wait until twenty-one to share a bed."

Remus had no energy to agree; after a night spent in the cells, every inch of him felt like it'd been hit by a train. Still, he swallowed the aches and any urge to complain. He told himself that they just needed to make it home where he could assess the damage properly and sob in the shower should he really feel the need. It was a fine plan, only it fell apart slightly when they returned to the street where they'd left the van the night before and found it missing. After a few stressful minutes of wandering, they discovered that in their hurry to get to the concert, they'd parked in a taxi rank and the van had been undoubtedly towed.

"Man, that Joe Strummer really fucking owes me," Sirius lashed, after they'd jumped the turn-stalls and took the Tube the rest of the way home. "A van and a microphone. They can keep their bloody drumsticks."

"Oh yeah, you can ask him when you're famous," Remus replied blandly, busy counting the building numbers as they turned onto their street.

"So how's it feel? You're nineteen and officially a felon. Bet Sheila would love that phone call."

"You tell Sheila," Thirty-nine, forty, forty-one; "and I'm telling Effie."

"Bastard." Sirius shoved him, ignoring the way Remus groaned. "Okay, who's telling Evans then?"

"No one. Let her think we were in Devon the whole time."

"And the van? They're gonna be back soon—and the sign back there said the tow yard's closed on Sunday-Mondays."

“Then we'll just say that the van hasn’t been towed. That it’s… being lended out.”

“Riiiight. Good one.”

“We can just tell her that Dorcas needed it,” Remus said. “Or that Kingsley called and—oof!”

Remus' chest twinged. He had a curse on the tip of his tongue and was ready to unleash it upon Sirius for daring to stop right in front of him, only they'd made it to the front steps of their flat, and Remus—being much taller—merely had to glance up to see what had stopped Sirius so soundly in his tracks.

“Holy fu…”

Remus could not believe his eyes. It was—

"Regulus?"

He was sitting before their front door, looking young in his school clothes and jacket, his trunk tucked up behind him as though he’d been dozing against it. He looked weary, and when he stood up it struck Remus that he’d grown—that his hair had grown! For a moment he looked so much like Sirius that Remus began to wonder just how hard he’d hit his head.

“About time you got back,” Regulus said, dusting the dirt from his trousers. “Where have you been then—prison?”

They were too flabbergasted to laugh. Sirius held a hand to his forehead, then dropped it as he rushed up the stairs to embrace his brother. Regulus let it happen, wincing only slightly when Sirius began to bark into his ear.

“Reg! Holy shit, what are you doing here?! Scratch that—how’d you get here?”

“I took the train, of course. Had to see you.” Regulus pulled away and regarded Remus with a nod. “Lupin.”

“R-Regulus.”

“You little shit, you told me you weren’t coming!” Sirius smacked his brother lightly on the shoulder. “Out for Easter break then?”

“Sirius, Easter isn’t for two weeks.”

“Oh... Then why’re you here?”

Regulus glanced down at his feet. “Something’s happened back home," he murmured, meeting Sirius' gaze again as his brother went a rough shade of white.

“What is it?” Asked Sirius. "What's wrong?"

“It's father, Sirius,” Regulus said. “He's gone. The funeral’s tomorrow.”

Chapter End Notes

Welp, it was about time they got arrested Did you catch Regulus 'prison' pun?? Lol.

Slang for this chapter:
The National Front is/was a far-right, fascist political party in the United Kingdom. In the 1970s they were very focused on "keeping England white". Disgusting stuff, but very real.
'Flight cases' are the durable black/silver cases that music and film equipment are often shipped in 'Sacked' means fired.
A 'berk' is a foolish person.
'The dole' is the UK's version of unemployment benefits; jobseekers allowance.
The 'nick' is prison.
'Miffed' is annoyed.
'Skip bins' are dumpsters.
Ben Sherman shirts were popular amongst the skinhead culture but had nothing to do with anyone's political views, as skinheads had a wide culture and could be either left or right leaning (see: white power skinhead).
Saying 'that's a gas' or 'that's gas' means you heard something funny.
'Telling porkies' is slang for telling lies.
A 'cozzer' is a police officer.
'Bizzies' are police.
The 'Provos' is a slang term for the Irish Republican Army.
The Sexual Offences Act of 1967 declared that while the age of consent for heterosexual couples remained 18, it was illegal for anyone under the age of 21 to engage with homosexual acts. This discriminatory law was not repealed until 2003.

Songs mentioned in this chapter: "Janie Jones" (1977), "All the Young Punks" (1978), & "Clash City Rockers" (1977) all by The Clash.

The conversation between Joe Strummer and the interviewer is pretty much plagiarized from THIS interview. I still feel a little bit "ehhh" about putting words into real rock stars mouths, so this is just one way I like to get around that.

Also, I wrote another b-side! It's just a quick snippet, but this one is Marlene's. You can find it HEREHERE. (Tomny b-side coming soon xx)

Updating next MONDAY!!!! Jan 2nd (most because I anticipate being hungover on the 1st xx)

Chapter 102: Sunk

Chapter Summary

"You went into the water. Please don't come out the same."

Chapter Notes

CW: Discussions of child abuse, though no specific instance is referenced. Panic attacks and burn scars and discussions of drowning. But also some good ol' fashioned hooliganism so you know it's not allllll bad.

Also, this chapter may as well be Pink Floyd's chapter. It's got several songs from "The Wall", despite the fact that that album didn't come out until November of 1979. Apologies for stretching the truth, but that album just gives me insane Regulus vibes. For those who enjoy this aspect, go ahead and play "Outside the Wall" when you get to the 'bridge' portion of our final scene.

Sirius also plays the piano this chapter! It'd sound something like this, but closer to 1.25 speed, hehe.

Finally, here's a playlist for Gap Year. It took me until now to realise I hadn't posted it. I still have a couple songs to add, but it's mostly fully formed, so enjoy xo

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Hush now, baby, baby, don't you cry,
Mama's gonna make all of your nightmares come true,
Mama's gonna put all of her fears into you;

Mama's gonna keep you right here, under her wing,
She won't let you fly, but she might let you sing,
Mama's gonna keep baby cosy and warm;

Ooh babe, ooh babe, ooh babe,
Of course, Mama's gonna help build the wall…

- "Mother" Pink Floyd, 1979

When he was six years old, Remus watched as his father took a dog behind the family barn and shot it.

They'd left that morning to hunt foxes near Oxfordshire. Remus hadn't gone, he was too young. Instead he'd gotten to stay and have tea in the garden with Giles and his mum, but he'd seen them leave; twelve of his father's best hounds, all trained to perfection, along with several colleagues from work. There had been excitement in the air, jovial handshakes interlaced with the incessant barking of dogs all desperate to be freed from their kennels. Only one of the dogs appeared weary enough to give pause. A juvenile called High Strung, aptly named for its skittish nature, had just been deemed fit for a first run. Normally this would have taken place on private property, with a fence and game birds and all the like, but Lyall wanted to test the dog's limits. The breeding bitch had been brought all the way across the Atlantic, desired for the sleekness of her black coat. Back home she'd produced champions, and when her first litter was born on English soil, it was clear that High Strung was that champion. They praised him for his strong legs, the nobleness of his face. Surely he'd be the perfect hunting animal—he'd win awards!

But then came the accident.

Unused to the sound of a gunshot, High Strung bolted first chance. One of the men foolishly tried to grab him, but the ground was uneven; they caught the side of a ravine. Both master and dog fell.

The man was sent to hospital for his injuries, but the dog they brought back to the estate. There was no hospital for living investments, or at least not ones so far gone. The handlers had taken one look at High Strung's shattered pelvis and declared him a dead dog breathing.

It'll be lame forever, Lyall. Best to put the beast out of its misery.

He's my dog, I'll do it.

Remus didn't understand; when he heard his father's answer he felt a swell of pride for having such a responsible father. Lyall didn't know that Remus had followed him from the garden, that he was watching as he pet the dog's flank and set a pistol to its skull.

Goodbye, poor beast.

* * *

Monday 12th March 1979

"Moony?" Sirius' uneasy voice drifted through the door; "How's it looking?"

Remus didn't answer at first. His eyes were glued on the mirror that hung over the chipped bathroom sink. Lee pulled his punches—that's what he'd told Sirius. A lie, then. Barely a day later, and the skin over his stomach looked like the flesh of a bruised apple.

"Not that bad, actually," he called, dropping the hem of his shirt. Good thing too; Sirius came striding in a moment later with a tie in either hand.

"Black or navy, do you think?" He held either tie up to his throat. "I know black is more traditional, but personally I think nothing screams 'I hate my dead son-of-a-bitch dad' more than looking miserable in navy blue."

Remus pointed weakly to the black, and Sirius sighed, tossing both over his shoulder.

"Almost ready to go then? You've been in here for ages."

"Yeah, yeah…" Rubbing along the back of his neck awkwardly, Remus resisted a twinge. Sirius had been very short with him all morning, his usual sarcastic attitude dialled up to a nine. Not much had been shared between him and Regulus the day before, save for a few details about the funeral. Regulus drifted around the flat like a nervous ghost, while Sirius behaved more like a cornered dog—likely to bite the moment he felt threatened.

The service was being held that morning at some fine church in the city, with a subsequent celebration of life taking place at the historic Black manor later in the afternoon. With no car and no way to get one so early in the morning, they'd been forced to concede defeat where the service concerned. Regulus appeared antsy at this, but if anything Sirius only looked relieved.

"Are you doing alright?" Remus asked him, as they stood facing each other in the bathroom. "You seem…"

"Upset?" Sirius sucked his teeth, revealing a sardonic smile. "You think because my father died and my own family didn't even care enough to tell me they were holding a funeral that I'd be upset?"

“Sirius—”

“Or because my little brother ran away from his train home ‘cause he couldn’t stomach the idea of going back there on his own, despite the fact that he hasn’t asked me for anything in over five years? Or—Or that the only way I can help him is by going back to that fucking place despite the fact that I swore I’d never go back! That’d I’d never see them, or speak to them, or even mention their names again? Ha! No—No, don’t be silly, Moony, I’m not upset at all.”

“It was a stupid question,” Remus amended sorely. “Forget I said anything… Is Regulus at least doing any better?”

“Dunno. Tosser still hasn’t said much.” Sirius crossed his arms. “Half expected to wake up and just find him gone, y'know. It's like, why’d he bother coming to me? He knows what I’d tell him…”

Don't go. It was written across his face like an angry plea, and Remus nodded, understanding.

“You could tell him not to, ‘cept the moment you tell him not to do something, he’s just gonna wanna do the opposite. He’s too much like you, Pads.”

“Yeah,” Sirius scoffed, “it’s how I know the only thing left to do is to follow him. At least if I’m there I can assure that the only person doing something they’ll regret is me. If it were just Reg, he’d probably let mother convince him to do something epically stupid. Like agree to a marriage pact. Or join a cult.”

“Didn’t you once say that your family’s basically a cult already?”

“So you understand the risk? Good.” Sirius glanced back toward their bedroom, where Remus knew a pair of dark suits would be laid out over the bedcovers. They'd been hanging in the back of the wardrobe for ages—a bygone remnant of what had once been their lives. Seeing him now, Remus didn’t have to ask to know what Sirius was thinking.

“Don’t worry,” he promised, stepping up to hold him from behind; “I’ll go with you. I’ll never leave your side.”

There was a shuddering breath, followed by a single forlorn sniffle, and then Sirius turned his head back to face him. His eyes were glassy, but his mind was made up.

“Well, Moony… once more unto the breach, shall we?”

It was a sordid morning. Regulus had been ready for hours by the time the two of them were both dressed and making their way downstairs. He was reading the newspaper, but rushed to hide it the moment they came into the room. Remus didn't have to ask what article, he'd read it himself that same morning.

MILLIONAIRE BUSINESS AND OIL MOGUL, ORION BLACK, DEAD AT FIFTY

BATH—Well-known investor Orion Black died in his family home last Wednesday, aged fifty years. While a cause of death was not immediately available, spokespersons for the family's estate were able to confirm that a heart attack and subsequent heart failure was to blame for the patriarch's premature passing.

Various prominent business leaders and politicians alike have expressed their condolences over Black Sr's death. The Somerset-born magnate had succeeded his family's business and all related assets in 1961 following the death of his father, Lord Arcturus Black III . Though the Blacks are notorious for being private when it comes to their affairs, it is open knowledge that the family garnered its immense monopolies via various industrial and scrap metal industries founded in 1892 by the then family head, Lord Phineas Nigellus Black.

Commissioned by Lord Black near Oxfordshire in 1902, the largest of the estate's metal-work factories saw a great boom throughout the First and Second World Wars, expanding into automotive and watercraft construction. In 1924 the family expanded into the oil business, thus further contributing to their already massive wealth. It is not known which direction the Blacks plan to take their endeavours in the coming future, but spokespersons for the estate have said that the family has no intent of slowing down. Orion Black is survived by his wife, Walburga, and son, Regulus. The private funeral has been scheduled for this coming Monday, March 12th. The family is requesting privacy during this period of mourning.

It was startling almost, how an entire life could be summarised in three short paragraphs. That's funny, Sirius had said when he read it, they didn't mention anything about his massive gambling habit, or the gout, or the many, many mistresses. I would've at least expected to see something about the sweatshops in India or the deforestation in Bolivia, but nah, these tossers didn't do their research at all.

Regulus didn't have much to say on the subject, and even if he did, he certainly wasn't about to share it with them. After accepting their offer of the couch he'd awoken with deep bags under his eyes that refused to go away no matter how much he rubbed at them. There were hardly any wrinkles in his dress shirt, though he still worried over them with frantic little motions. No one seemed all that interested in breakfast, and so Remus put a pot of coffee on, which they shared in rather unenthusiastic silence. Sirius refused to come out of the kitchen, meanwhile Regulus had taken up residence at the dining table, stirring his coffee several times clockwise, then an equal amount back again.

"I know what you're both thinking," Regulus said unexpectedly. "You think I shouldn't go. That going back there again would be a mistake. All the extended family will be there…"

Remus, who had been sitting on his own at the nook, glanced gingerly back at Sirius, who was leaning one hip against the kitchen counter and staring stubbornly down at his coffee, obviously listening anyway.

"I think you should do… whatever it is you came here to do, Regulus."

Regulus looked up at Remus, then over at his big brother.

"One more time then?"

Sirius tapped the side of his coffee mug thoughtfully. Then he set it aside and produced a small silver flask that he began filling with the first bottle of liquor he found amongst the cupboards. Afterwards, Sirius turned and raised the flask to them.

"One more," he said, before tipping it back against his lips.

* * *

You little shit, you're in it now,
I hope they throw away the key!
You should've talked to me more often than you did—
But no, you had to go your own way,
Have you broken any homes up lately?

- “The Trial” Pink Floyd, 1979

Remus could still remember how it’d felt to be barred from his mother's funeral. Back then he would’ve given anything for an older brother who could just tell him what it was he was supposed to do. What he was supposed to feel—what to do next. Watching those two brothers, he almost felt a sting of envy, as though the eleven year-old inside of him still hadn’t learned how to forgive. But after they’d gathered their boots and coats, Sirius took his hand and squeezed it tightly, and Remus knew then that whatever he’d missed when Hope had died, he would be that for Sirius now.

Bath was a good two hours away, and with no hope of springing the van from the tow-lot until Tuesday, they’d decided to rent a car out of Ealing. The surcharge to rent to anyone below the age of twenty-one had been horrible, but they’d managed it—a cheap Morris Marina that’d left another unfortunate dent in their now dwindling rainy-day fund. Sirius would’ve never complained about money, but was forced to dismiss Regulus’ worries over it when he began insisting on paying him back in the future. As it was, Regulus had brought very little cash with him and had spent most of it on his train ticket into London.

“You didn’t just try to train-hop?” Sirius had asked.

“I’m not a lunatic,” Regulus had replied.

So there were still a few differences between the two then.

The Black family manor was much too large to be located in and around the main city, and instead laid on the outskirts of Bathford, a civil parish some three miles from the Bath’s city centre. It was the ancestral home of the Blacks, and while not all of Sirius’ cousins lived nearby, they were expecting a decent turn-out.

“No doubt Bellatrix will be there. She'd have brought that shitty husband of hers, Rudingus or whatever.”

"It's Rudolphus," Regulus mumbled quietly.

"Still a cunt." Sirius chuckled to himself. “Suspect Uncle Cygnus and Aunt Druella'll be by too. And of course Narcissa… she'd be married now, yeah? Gross. Think Aunt Belvina will be bringing a new boy-toy, Reg? How old was the last one you wager—I'm thinking somewhere between eighteen, and eighteen and eleven months.”

There was no answer from the back seat, and so Remus took it upon himself to fill the air;

“I forgot how insane your relative’s names are.”

“Oh, you mean like Bellatrix? That’s nothing. Our mum’s father had a cousin named Eridanus. Though she never seems to find it funny whenever I ask for stories about our dear ‘Uncle Anus’.”

Remus swallowed his smirk, and suddenly Sirius was shooting upright in his seat, pointing out the window.

“There, just over that ridge is Brown’s Folly. It’s this useless old tower on the hill that was built by some lord for his squire or whatnot. Reg and I used to go there when we were kids. Snuck out all the time, didn’t we, Reg?”

Again, Regulus said nothing. Sirius didn’t seem to notice.

“Mum used to threaten to send dogs after us,” he went on, sniggering again. “We’d stay out in the woods for hours—Reg was always getting us lost.”

“You mean you were getting us lost.”

“Yeah, alright, but I always got us out again though, didn’t I?”

More silence.

“Remember how Kreacher was the only one who could ever find us? Hell, that dog was so old and decrepit it pissed dust. It’s a wonder something didn’t just come along and eat him first.” Sirius leaned his head back. “Bet you’re looking forward to seeing him again, hey?”

“Kreacher died. It was last Christmas.”

“… Oh.”

Sirius was decidedly less chatty after that.

Eventually they’d turned onto the private road that would take them to the manor. It was initially forested on either side, but eventually opened up to reveal sprawling green hills, somehow perfectly manicured despite its egregious size. There were animals lounging amongst the knolls that Remus initially took for cattle, but upon closer inspection, turned out to be a herd of small deer.

“They’re fallow deer,” Regulus explained. “They come around in the spring and early summer when the fawns are being born. During the winter months they migrate south toward Southampton. But they always come back.”

“At least someone still enjoys the idea of coming home,” Sirius mumbled.

There was no missing the manor when they saw it; a large baroque country house, made of a white limestone and built in one long row. There was very little landscaping save for a stone wall surrounding the property and a massive front drive, now decorated with every sort of lavish car one could imagine. The Morris Marina stuck out terribly with its chipped dandelion-yellow paint job, though there were very few left around to witness their arrival.

“It’s late in the day by rich sod's standards,” Sirius observed, peering up at the cloudy sky; “Reckon they’ve already retired to the drawing room to lament over our father’s greatness.”

Remus had pulled the car into park next to a very lavish black Cadillac, and not for the first time, began to feel massively out of his depth when it came to the Blacks. His grandfather had inherited land thanks to a series of good business dealings following the war, and Lyall had always had a stern grip on his own finances; Remus had come from easy pickings, he knew better than to deny it, but this—this was old money.

“That’s my old bedroom there,” Sirius told him, pointing to a top corner window along the houses’ eastern side. “Always wanted to bring a guy over. You know—a quick shag or two, just to scandalise Mum.”

“Sirius.”

“Yes, yes, Reggie, don’t get your knickers in a twist.” Smirking, Sirius adjusted the front of his suit. “I already promised—no squabbles, no causing a scene, no telling Bellatrix she looks fat in her new funeral dress. No giving Mum any reason to rip someone’s head off—namely ours. You know, truthfully, it’ll probably be the most boring funeral our family has ever had.”

With a look of plain distrust, Regulus stalked on ahead and Sirius took the opportunity to wink at Remus. He raised his hand, revealing a pair of crossed fingers.

“He knows it’s an impossible promise. On a good day, our family makes the Borgias look like saints.”

Somehow, Remus was not all that comforted.

They followed Regulus up the drive toward the manor’s looming front doors, but Sirius stopped them when they grew near the trimmed hedges.

“What are you doing?” Regulus demanded, as his brother took his arm and began dragging him away.

“You’re not just going to waltz into the front door, are you, Edge? You’re an honorary Marauder now—where’s your sense of adventure?”

Regulus didn’t seem too pleased at the idea of becoming any part of Sirius' grand schemes, but did not fight as he was led around the side of the vast house. Together they stopped below one of the manor's protruding ground floor windows and Sirius started by asking Remus for a boost. Balanced on the tip of Remus' knee, he pulled a single trusty hair pin from his pocket and began shimmying the long end in between the gaps in the window.

“We shouldn’t be out here,” Regulus hissed. “That’s father’s study, we aren’t allowed.”

“And who’s going to stop us? His ghost? ”

Regulus baulked slightly, but Sirius paid him no mind. With a giddy “A-ha!” he’d managed to wiggle the pin all the way inside and lift the old brass latch, allowing the window to swing open toward them.

“There,” he mused, tapping Remus’ shoulder to indicate what a good job he’d done; “I know I’m no burglar extraordinaire—like some people—but I don’t think I’m half bad at this.”

“Oh goody. Just what you needed, an even bigger head.”

Sirius grinned as Remus helped hoist him inside. After he’d given the okay, Regulus came next. Making sure to grab hold of as little of Remus as possible, he continued grumbling about the idiocy of having to break into his own home until had shimmied himself over the edge of the window and his skinny legs had passed out of sight. It took both Black brothers to haul Remus inside, and what they found was an interior just as grand as its out. Sitting pretty at nearly three times the size of their flat's living room, the study spread out before them in an opulent row, with oak panelled walls and shelves on every side. A desk sat at one end, paired with a luxurious leather armchair and one of those fancy standing globes gilded in real gold. Beyond the desk hung a portrait of a man with a thick moustache and a white rose in his lapel. Remus didn't have to ask if they were related; his black hair and stern expression gave it away.

"Ah, great-great-great grandfather Phineas!" Sirius exclaimed, throwing himself down into the leather armchair and spinning around to face the portrait; "How I missed your ugly mug staring me down from beyond the grave. Not so smug now, are you? Say, how's Dad? Has he invited Hitler to play a round of golf in all nine circles of Hell yet?"

"Sirius, we shouldn't be in here," Regulus said again. He'd crept over to the study door and was standing next to it, squeezing his palms together as he often did when he was anxious. Outside Remus could hear the telltale noises of others gathered; no laughter, but plenty of lull and chatter.

Ignoring his brother's plight, Sirius spun around in the desk chair and began stroking his chin in an exaggerated manner. After reaching forward, he knocked the lid off of an ornate cigar box and pinched one of them between his two fingers, taking a pretend draw off of one end.

"I've been thinking of growing a goatee myself, Moons, what do you think? Facial hair's been ruined on me, on account 'a the family resemblance, but if I'm going to Hell anyway then I figure a few whiskers wouldn't make that much of a difference."

Abandoning the door, Regulus stomped toward the desk. "Enough," he snapped. "No one's laughing, and I didn't bring you here so you could poke fun and get us thrown out first chance."

"If I remember correctly, it was us who brought you here. Right, Moony?"

Remus held up a hand, not interested in being fodder for Sirius' reckless spat, and finally Sirius tossed the cigar aside and stood up.

"You think everything I do is pointless, don't you, Reg?"

Regulus' nostrils flared, indignant. "I wouldn't, except you always have to take the piss about everything."

"True. Fine, then. Think what you want, but you should know that I do have a reason for coming here."

With a haughty look, Sirius began pushing his father's chair up against the back wall. Then he climbed onto it.

"Moony, help me with this, would you?"

Remus didn't fully understand until he was helping Sirius lift his great-great-great grandfather's portrait off of the wall. The portrait itself was immensely heavy, though nothing compared to what they found underneath. It was an elaborate steel safe, inset directly into the wall and complete with a spinning dial lock.

"Big enough, isn't it?" Sirius said proudly. "If there was anything Dad was good at it was playing the role of the overly pretentious, clichéd malefactor."

"What are you doing with Father's safe?" Regulus asked uneasily.

"What does it look like I'm doing? I'm getting you your inheritance. If you're gonna come all this way for his bloody funeral then you might as well get something out of it."

Taking hold of the dial, Sirius leaned his ear against the side of the safe to listen to the mechanisms click. "What do you think? Surely he wouldn't be stupid enough to use his own birthday." Sirius spun the dial, grinning, but when he reached for the handle, the safe did not budge. "Hm… Oh, I know! How about his and Mum's anniversary, hey?"

Regulus slapped both hands down on the desk. "Sirius, stop it."

"Tsk! No cigar. Should've known. But hey, how about the day he met Adeline? Everyone knows she was his favourite mistress."

Click, click, click—nothing.

"The year the war ended?"

No.

"The day his father died?"

No.

"The day we struck oil down in Venezuela!"

All of the codes were wrong. Huffing, Sirius stood back with his hands on his hips. He looked as though he were playing a part, while Regulus merely looked woebegone—like a kicked dog.

“No way he made it as simple as one-two-three-four.” Sirius stroked his chin again; “Oh! I know—how about your birthday then, Reg?”

Regulus scowled deeply as Sirius turned back to the safe. Remus had read once that avalanches sometimes made these great cracking noises, like the creak of old wood beneath a heavy boot, as its first sign of impending danger. Seeing Sirius now, he could almost hear the cracking begin in real time.

After entering the numbers correlating to Regulus’ birthday, Sirius leaned back to pull the safe handle sharply with both hands; no give.

“Darn. Really thought I’d had him with that one. Favourite son and all… Hm. Should we try mine then? Just for fun, of course.”

This time when Sirius spun the dial Remus was sure he could hear the cracks. He could see them too, displayed across Regulus’ face in a look of horror. Don’t, it seemed to say, but even just deep down, Regulus knew how alike they were too. The moment anyone told Sirius not to do something, he was only going to do the opposite.

“Moony, I might be in need of your expert lock-picking skills in a moment,” Sirius teased, taking hold of the handle; “ ‘Cause I can’t possibly figure what the code would be if not—”

Because he was sure he would fail, Sirius had yanked the safe door open with all of his strength, simultaneously losing his balance and sending himself sprawling backward when the door unexpectedly fell open.

Luckily for him, Remus’ reflexes weren’t all rubbish.

He caught Sirius before he could body-slam himself against the floor, but the force of the catch carried the both of them sideways and into the wall, where they collided with the portrait of Phineas Nigellus. The painting teetered for a moment, before falling forward and clipping the legs of the massive standing globe that’d been resting next to the desk. What followed was like a failed chain reaction, and Remus found himself recalling that night back at school, when they'd set off the smoke bombs in Salazar House only to fumble massively.

With the heavy portrait as its trigger, the antique globe fell to the ground, shattering its wooden stand and effectively releasing the globe's sphere like a pinball machine. It hit the bottom of the window with a hollow thunk and ricocheted into a nearby floor lamp. Regulus did rush to save it, but proved too slow, and the lamp teetered dangerously before finally over-turning and smashing into a million pieces against the wooden floor. The crash was legendary.

Afterwards you could've heard a pin drop. Sirius sat up, pushing Remus' arm off. He was gaping—not at the lamp or his brother, but at his father's safe. It was clear that whatever game Sirius had been playing, he had not expected it to open for him.

"After all this time...?"

His words were a whisper, one instantly swallowed by the rush of noise coming from outside the study. Already Remus could hear Regulus' distress.

“Sirius, you idiot! You promised—look what you've done!”

The study doors burst open, and in swept none other than Walburga Black. She was flanked by four others; two men, one of which was older and had the same unsmiling expression as the man in the portrait, as well as two women, one blonde, the other a curly-haired brunette.

“You!” The brunette woman screamed, pointing a vicious finger at Sirius. It made him turn over, his confidant façade still stifled by the shock of the safe.

“Bella," he bleated, “Cissy, Uncle Cygnus—you're all here.”

“Of course we're here,” Bellatrix hissed. “What are you doing here?”

“I…” Sirius faltered for just a moment, then; “Heard we were throwing a party at the main house. Figured the invitation must've just gotten lost in the post, but if you're here to give me the bollocking of my life, then go ahead—let's hear it.”

“You wretched, little brat. Why we should have you arrested—”

Walburga raised her hand, silencing Bellatrix instantly. “Rudolphus, the door if you wouldn't mind.”

Remus had a feeling he knew which one was Rudolphus. He was Bellatrix's husband and the only one among them that didn't have the Blacks' aquiline nose and glass-coloured eyes. He went to the door and shut it, cutting them off from any other guest bold enough to come spying. Afterwards Remus had expected Walburga Black to burst into flame on the spot—ready to damn them and send them straight to hell for even daring to set foot into her house. But she didn't. In fact, she didn't even look at them.

Hands clasped tightly ahead of her black dress, she moved across the room toward Regulus, who stood flinching by the remains of the shattered lamp.

“Regulus, darling, are you alright? We were so worried when you didn't arrive home on the train yesterday.”

She might as well have been speaking Chinese. Regulus floundered, as he always seemed to in front of his mother, and glanced very quickly at Sirius before looking away again.

"I'm sorry," he mumbled; “There... was a mix up at the station...”

Walburga stroked her son's head, caressing the curls that had grown just past his jaw. “Then why didn't you call us?” She asked, smiling as though she found it all very silly. “We would've arranged for you to be brought home.”

“I didn't want to bother you. Not with Father…” Regulus trailed off uneasily. “I didn't mean for things to happen this way.”

“He's lying,” Sirius whispered, quietly enough that only Remus could hear. In an attempt to keep him from saying it again, Remus took his hand; only he could tell by the sharp turn of her head that the blonde woman—Narcissa, Remus remembered—had caught the gesture.

Slowly his hold on Sirius' fingers weakened.

Across the room, Walburga pressed her smiling lips into a thin line. She was still petting Regulus' hair, only her fingers had tightened on the ends, turning almost white at the knuckle.

“I do wish you'd cut your hair like we discussed at Christmas, darling. It is so…” Then she, too, trailed off. “No matter. You're home now.”

With arms thin like a spider's, she smoothed a wrinkle from Regulus' suit and promptly embraced her son. Over her shoulder Remus saw Regulus' face turn ashen. He wondered if now Regulus regretted coming, but why should he? He was coveted, if not just merely cared for.

One by one the other Blacks came forward to hug their cousin and nephew. Regulus hugged back sparingly, but when Bellatrix swept in for a cuddle Remus spotted the blatant look of satisfaction she was giving Sirius. Afterwards Walburga gathered Regulus to her side. She stared for a long time at the broken lamp and at the state of the opened safe, but her expression was calm; collected.

“I suppose thanks are in order.”

“Thanks?” Bellatrix echoed. “Aunt Walburga, you should have them arrested for breaking and entering!”

“For attempted robbery,” agreed Rudolphus.

“Sister, I too, think it highly irregular to allow for such a…” Cygnus licked his lips, “transgression. And at your husband’s funeral, no less. The proper authorities should be contacted.”

“In that case I would call Officer Digby at the Charing Cross station,” Sirius said. “Just spoke with him myself yesterday and if we’re gonna go this route then I’d prefer to expedite the process, if you don’t mind.”

Regulus visibly grimaced, but Walburga’s poised expression never faltered. Even if she held no love for her eldest son, seventeen years of practice was helping keep her emotions in check.

“Thank you,” she enunciated clearly; “for bringing my son home. Now I must ask you to leave.”

The gratitude felt more like a slap in the face, which Sirius took stoically.

“Alright,” he nodded, tongue pressed between his bottom lip and teeth; “Reg is back where he should be, we were just leaving anyway.”

With his hands shoved into the pockets of his suit, Sirius sauntered forward.

“For what it’s worth, I really am sorry about Dad. Heard it was quick. Pity... Suppose you would've preferred a more drawn-out, agonising ordeal. Something to milk the papers."

It was Bellatrix who reacted; “Get out! Get out!” She screamed, but by then Sirius had already moved past his family and kicked the office door open. Skirting around the desk, Remus followed nervously while Rudolphus reached around and kept hold of his fitful wife. The self-effacing gesture must've brought something mean out of Sirius again, as he turned and hollered at the top of his lungs;

"Nice dress, by the way, Bella! I heard Rudolphus isn't even stealing your panties to wear into the office anymore. Oops—I hope that wasn't still a secret!"

The crowd that had gathered outside the office began parting around Sirius like the Red Sea, as though his disownment were an illness to be caught. Behind them Bellatrix continued to rage, cooed at gently by her sister and husband. Ignoring Bellatrix's fury, Sirius glanced openly to his left, where an old woman was glaring at him from beneath the rim of an enormous black silk hat.

"Aunt Belvina! Oh, I told Reg you'd be here." He swept in to give the woman a grand kiss on either cheek, to which she shrieked and began batting him with her oversized purse. Sirius bowed out graciously, before leaping toward another relative.

"Cousin Leo! Blimey, I thought you were dead. Did you not break your neck in an awful polo accident a few years back? No, just the tailbone? Lucky, that. Though I imagine the healing time sucked ass… And Aunt Margery, how lovely to see you again! Is it true you're still pumping the stem cells of poor, orphaned children into your face to avoid wrinkles? Well, it's not working very well, is it? And holy—you're shitting me—is that the old prime minister? Tell me, Mr. Wilson, when you were drafting that Lavender List of yours, did you consider putting that Oswald Mosley chap on the list? I have a feeling he'd have appreciated the title of Knight Commander of the British Empire."

It was like watching a spectator sport where the only goal was to insult as many people as possible in the least amount of time. Sirius went around to all of them, digging up dirt people didn't even know they had. Finally, Walburga had had enough. She marched out of the office, with Regulus tight on her heels and gestured to her brother;

"Cygnus, call the police."

Sirius' hands shot up in surrender. "Hey, I'm going, Mum—I'm going! You can't very well blame a guy for wanting to catch up with his family. After all, it's been sooo long. And to meet again under such terrible circumstances—tsk. Why, it just gets me so choked up."

As Sirius made a show of wiping away imaginary tears with his middle fingers, two more guests came up behind him and grabbed him by the arms. Remus was moving instantly, but as it was, Sirius did not need his help. He removed both sets of hands by completing a quick duck and slide manoeuvre, getting behind both men and pushing them forward into a stumble with a quick slap over the back.

"Nice try," he tsked, "but you really shouldn't be putting your hands on the Black heir in his own home."

It was the straw that broke Walburga Black's back. Instantly she was fuming, making everyone leap half a foot into the hair when she shouted;

"Regulus is the heir—you are disinherited!"

Sirius yawned, feigning disinterest. "Mm, right… forgot about that bit. Ah well, I can still try and show my appreciation for the old man after his death, can't I?"

There was no need to wonder what Sirius meant. He turned and flounced back through the crowd, into a grand atrium-like room with tall floor-to-ceiling windows overlooking the back courtyard. The crowd followed like a swarm of pigeons, too curious about the train wreck that was quickly unfolding in front of them. The entire room was outfitted in tables decorated with buckets of iced champagne and bouquets of red and white carnations. There was a large portrait of Orion Black arranged on a pedestal at the far end, and just before that, an impressively sleek grand piano.

Sirius stood before the beast, and then flapped the back of his suit jacket as he took a seat at its bench.

"No!" Walburga screamed, coming into the room behind Remus with the rest of her family. "I forbid you from touching grandfather's piano! I forbid it!"

"He may be your heir," Sirius shouted back, pointing directly at Regulus; "but no one can do what I can do. So just this once—all of you can shut up and listen."

They might as well have been back in the office, whispering about portraits and inheritance. The room fell deadly silent as Sirius lifted the piano's key lid, and Remus recalled that the last time many of these people had seen Sirius take to a piano, it was likely when he was pouring 100-proof vodka across it and lighting it on fire. What Remus wouldn't give to have seen it.

Sirius chose Beethoven. The piece was probably easily recognisable for anyone who enjoyed 'real music' as the snobs would have it, but Remus only recognised it thanks to a few weeks spent in twelfth-year music when Sheila had attempted to rally the class together for a formal symphony. It hadn't ended well—there was very little room in Beethoven's finest for a bass guitar and they'd only had a single competent violinist—but Remus remembered:

Symphony No. 5, written in C minor.

The piece was polyphonic, derived from a fancy Greek word meaning "many sounds". In a formal orchestra it could feel as though you were listening to two warring tides, pushing and pulling against one another in endless tandem. Messing up even a single harmony would ruin all of that, and that was what made the piece so difficult to play. But Sirius didn't need to worry about pushing or pulling; he was only one man and thus the only thing he needed to harmonise with was the war raging on inside his own head.

Watching Sirius, it was clear the song was weighing on him. He bent over the instrument's keys like some grotesque, twisted thing; nothing like the boy who'd sat needle-straight and kissed him over their school's piano all those months ago. He came at Beethoven with all the bloodlust of a ravenous hound—striking the theme's iconic first notes; dun, dun, dun, dunn! Dun, dun, dun, dunn! It was awe-inspiring, but Remus knew that what came after was Sirius' true bread and butter.

The soft transition started, and his cadence slowly increased like rolling thunder clouds spreading out over a sparkling green meadow. His fingers pounded against the keys, doing the job of an entire orchestra. Where Remus imagined his own fingers would have begun to ache, Sirius only grew faster; faster and faster until it just didn't seem human anymore. Around the room, his spectators were slack-jawed. Even Regulus appeared shocked, but Walburga Black was not impressed. She stood by the doorway with a severe purse in her lips. Hearing it—seeing her—Remus felt anger swell inside his chest.

"Do you finally hear him now?" He demanded, having to shout just to be heard over Sirius' climactic performance. A few in the room managed to tear their eyes away from the piano long enough to glare at him, but Walburga wouldn't dare. Regulus stared at the floor.

"You're monsters!" Remus wailed, driven by the staccato-like fury in Sirius' music. "You're all monsters, and I HOPE YOU ROT!"

A few women gasped into their champagne flutes; some of the men gave dirty looks that said they wanted to knock him on his ass. Remus would have welcomed the fight just about then. He could feel Sirius' coda like a rush in his blood, working and playing double-time at a speed that should not have been humanly possible. And when the coda came—well, that was that the most beautiful 'fuck you' Remus had ever heard.

With a final slam of his fingers, Sirius was finished. He sat huffing on the piano bench, sweat pouring off of his face and neck. Remus could feel his heart hammering from across the room, but it didn't stop Sirius from turning to address his audience.

"Sorry for rushing," he panted, "can't seem to break the habit."

No one said anything as Sirius stood up from the piano and went to one of the nearby tables, wrenching a fresh bottle of champagne from its silver ice bucket. Remus was already at his side, grasping Sirius' arm and feeling the way his hands shook.

"Are you alright?" He whispered.

"Peachy."

Back with the others, they watched as Regulus made to step forward. He might've said something to Sirius—for Sirius—but his mother never gave him the chance.

Swiftly abandoning the rest of her family, Walburga stormed straight toward them. She only came up to Remus' shoulder in the end, but he knew from experience that she did not need to be able to reach all of someone to cut them deeply.

"You are a disgrace."

"Oh," Sirius cooed, "I love it when you're so thoughtful, Mummy."

"You may have your hooks in Regulus now, but trust me, it will not last. One day you're going to lose it all, and when that day comes…"

She never finished; she didn't need to. It was enough for her that Sirius knew he wasn't invincible, and that he would never have her approval.

"You will leave this house now," she said, deadly low, "and never come back."

Sirius held up a pinky in promise, and then pried the cork out of the champagne bottle with his teeth and spat it across the room. There was a loud pop as he did so, and the chilled champagne sloshed across the marble floor at their feet. Walburga jumped backwards, lest he soil her dress.

"Now that you've all witnessed what will surely be the only moderately interesting thing that'll happen to any of you for the next twelve months, I think we will be bidding you adieu." Sirius went to turn away, but stopped at the last second; "J'espère que vous brûlerez tous en enfer."

Remus had no idea what he said, but judging from the vein bulging in his mother's forehead and the gasps of shock going up from the rest of the room, it wasn't exactly a fond farewell.

Champagne in one hand, Remus in the other, Sirius strode straight out of the atrium, making faces at his family and blowing kisses at the rest. They didn't stop for Regulus, nor did the brothers say anything as they passed each other; Sirius simply kept walking.

"Are you sure you want to just leave?" Remus asked, as he was pulled toward the front door and adjoining main staircase.

"You mean Regulus," Sirius said stiffly, then; "I think the clever git can last a few minutes on his own. After all, they like him. We should do our own thing for a little while—in secret."

Remus hadn't the chance to ask what the secret was before Sirius was tugging him away from the door and up the massive stairway. They emerged on the second floor, then the third, passing crystalline windows and marble statues and—was that a suit of armour?

"Sirius, where are we going?"

"Don't you remember?" Sirius giggled. "I said I've always wanted to shag in my own room."

To say that Remus was surprised would've been an understatement, but he didn't stop Sirius as he led him down the manor's labyrinthian hallways. No one was around to stop them, but the walls had eyes enough. Portraits of other Black family members followed them everywhere, as well as the occasional baroque painting of a flower scene or whatnot.

“My great-grandmother collected hundreds of paintings from the great Dutch masters,” Sirius explained. “ ‘Girl with a Pearl Earring’? That’s on loan to The Hague from the Black family’s personal collection.”

“Bloody hell.”

Sirius sniggered again, and suddenly they were standing outside a single door. It didn’t look any different from the rest, save for the name plate reading “Sirius” and the massive “ROCKS” carved haphazardly into the wood beneath it.

“Reg’s says ‘sucks’,” Sirius confessed, before grasping the door handle. “Shit. Mum must’ve locked it.”

“I didn’t bring anything with me,” Remus said, patting his pockets. “You still got that hair pin from earlier?”

“No need,” Sirius said proudly; “I know this door. You just jiggle the handle a little to the left and—got it.”

The door fell open with a faint creak, revealing a handsome bedroom with velvet curtains and a vast four-poster bed.

“You have a chandelier in your bedroom...?”

“You act like it was my idea.”

Sirius pulled him inside and shut the door. It was dark with the curtains drawn, but it wasn’t hard to make out the poor state of the walls. Bits of shredded wallpaper and what appeared to be posters of scantily-clad women went all over the room. Remus didn’t have to ask; Sirius had told him the story about the nudie magazine ages ago. He’d thought it proper funny then, but now—seeing it up close—Remus felt a chill.

“I’ll bet Mum wanted it locked up for good. Old cow... Did you notice how she didn't even say my name? It's like she couldn't. Or wouldn't... I suppose.”

Sirius turned and began running his finger over one of the bed posts. It was unusually cool inside, and there was a fine layer of dust on everything. Remus wouldn't have been surprised if some of the books on the bookshelf had begun to mould.

"It's cold in here."

Sirius took the observation as a challenge.

"Well then, allow me to warm you up."

Taking him by the shoulders, Sirius spun Remus around until his back was to the bed. He didn't push him down until they'd cleared away the grimy covers, but afterwards Sirius relieved him of his suit jacket and together they fell upon the bed.

"Are you sure?" Remus asked between kisses. "Mhm—your family is downstairs."

"Fuck 'em. I need to feel something."

Perhaps that should've been the first indicator that something was wrong. Sirius was the most feel sort of person Remus knew. He was always feeling things—good or bad. Sirius had enough feeling inside him to sink a warship, if only he knew how to direct it.

Remus wouldn't lie, getting busy below the waist in his boyfriend's childhood nightmare room felt rather unsettling. He couldn't imagine ever wanting to do the same in his bedroom back at the estate, but—as he stupidly remembered—they had. Over and over and over again. Back then it was about feeling like they were the only two people in the world, and now it felt like they were there just to get back at Sirius' parents, dead or alive. Despite that, Remus didn't complain. He knew what he was like at his lowest, and if this was Sirius' way of lashing out then so be it. After all, he and Sirius had never been cut from the same cloth; they simply matched each other, and that was enough.

They took things slow, coddling each other with feverish touches and tender kisses that made Remus feel like he was coming apart at the seams. Sirius stitched him back together again every time, kissing along his jaw while twisting two fingers into the chain at his throat. At some point Remus thought he could feel him trembling, but every time he went in search of the source, Sirius would capture his hands and pin them back against the covers.

Sirius' tongue was as deft as it usually was, dividing his lips like wildfire and making Remus want to beg for more in a language he couldn’t even put words to. Without his shirt, the planes of Sirius' torso were smooth and flushed with heat. Only his left side bore any real texture, the burn scars he’d carried since he was eleven—now fading—having left him more blighted on the inside than he was on the out. With gentle kisses, Remus made his way down Sirius’ torso, caressing every uneven ridge and divot with his tongue. He had always loved Sirius’ scars for what they were; a reminder that he had survived horrible things and made it out the other side better—not made it out for them or because of them, but because Sirius had decided that that is what he would do. Seeing him now—touching him—Remus was sure he’d never known a braver person.

Brave, even as he shook himself to pieces in his hands.

“Sirius?” Remus leaned away, attempting to pry Sirius off of his neck. “Sirius… Sirius, stop. You’re shaking.”

“I’m not,” came a mumble. Remus felt a tongue skim along the edge of his ear, but when he went to grab Sirius by the hips he felt him flinch.

“Sirius, what’s wrong?”

“Who says anything’s wrong?”

There came another nip at his ear, and this time it was Remus who flinched away. When he turned to look at Sirius, he found tears streaking down his cheeks. They caught the faint blue light peeking through the bedroom's heavy curtains, turning his face pale and white.

"Sirius—"

"I don't care," Sirius warbled, his voice becoming raspy and thin. "I don't... I don’t care if I’m bloody shaking, I don’t care if the whole damn world is shaking—I don’t want to do this anymore.”

Remus cupped his cheeks for him, wiping away tears with the pads of his thumbs.

"Then don't."

It was like a curtain had come down over Sirius' face. Relief, despair—Remus didn't know. But he recognised the far away look in his eye, and knew that everything from the summer before their final year to Regulus showing up alone and cold on their doorstep, had been building to this single moment.

"I hate him, Moony," Sirius said softly, shutting his eyes as if he could visualise it. "I fucking hate him... I hate the whole lot of them. Every day I wish that they'd burn, that they'd poison each other to death. They tell me to get over it but I can't, and even if I could, I wouldn't. So why...? Why now? Why make my wish come true now?!"

And then Sirius opened his eyes, red-rimmed and bluer than a winter's sea.

"Why'd he have to go and die now? Him—He was supposed to live! Live and be miserable. Live and see that I can do shit all on my own—that I don't need them or their arrogant, elitist fucking family! He was supposed to live so that he could see that I belong to me! That I'm untouchable. Because when I'm out there, where everyone can see me—they can't even get close! He was supposed to see that—He was supposed to live!"

Sirius was shouting now, but at least he was starting to make sense. In his fitting he'd pushed Remus' hands away, reaching up to knot his fingers in his hair himself and pull from the roots. Aching, Remus went to cup his face again—and then again when Sirius pushed him off the second time.

"Hey, hey! Sirius, it's alright… I'm here."

But Sirius was still shaking, and now he had angry tears in his eyes;

"Nah, now he's dead! And all those fucking people downstairs, I hope they die too. I hope they all get onto a boat and that that boat sinks and they all fucking drown! I wish that Regulus had never come to me—I wish he'd never bothered to ask for my help."

"You don't mean that," Remus urged, getting flashbacks of the two of them stuck in that jail cell. "Regulus came to you because he trusts you."

"Dunno why. All I do is fuck things up for him. Or—make him heir, I suppose. Shit... Such ironic bullshit!"

A second lapsed between them, in which Sirius turned and punched his old headboard. It must've hurt, as he groaned through his teeth, cradling his fist to his chest. Scooting closer, Remus took his hand and placed a gentle kiss along his knuckles.

"I used to wish for it too, you know," he confessed, slowly stroking the red flesh. "When I found out my mum was dying, a part of me wished she'd just hurry up and go. Like it'd make it easier or something... Then when she was gone, I wished it'd been my dad instead. I told him that... That it should've been him."

"Maybe it should've," Sirius said lowly. "He ruined your life... S'only fair."

Remus shrugged. "I know I blamed him for a long time, but really I think now that it was just a way to avoid blaming myself. It's like, if I could be so mad at him that I wanted him dead, then maybe there wouldn't be any space left to hate myself. It worked for a while... but hate rarely works forever. There's always a bottom, Sirius."

"Is that what this is? Bottom...?"

"It's you, torturing yourself for something you're not responsible for. You gotta stop."

"Responsible," Sirius echoed—sardonically like a bad joke. "Sorta like how you're not responsible for Lee turning out to be a complete waste of oxygen?"

It felt like left field, but then Remus followed Sirius' gaze down to the splotchy bruises that mottled his stomach. Seeing them, Remus began to smile sorely, sadly.

"... What a pair we make, huh?"

Sirius chuffed lightly, his running nose making spit strings between his perfect lips. He reached out to touch the bruises, and Remus held in a breath.

"This is supposed to be a dream come true," Sirius whimpered, wiping the snot from his upper lip. "Why don't I feel happier?"

"Because..." And Remus covered Sirius' hand where it lay against his own stomach, knotting their fingers together; "Because you're human. And you're in mourning."

Sirius shook his head. "No... No, we're not supposed to mourn those who've hurt us."

"Yes, well... Mourning's never been for the dead anyway."

Despair surged forth and suddenly Sirius was moaning;

"Oh... Oh god."

It took a long while for Sirius to calm down. In that time, Remus held him, stroking his long black hair and kissing his face until his shoulders had finally stopped trembling. They laid together on those cold bed covers, imagining all the ways fate had dealt them a poor hand.

"You know what's gonna suck the most?" Sirius whispered; "They're gonna think we had it easy."

"Who?"

"Them—everyone. The whole world is going to see us as proper little rich boys with nothing left to want. They're going to call us industry plants, and try to say that we don't belong. That we had everything."

Remus thought of his old friends; of Lee.

"We did."

"Yeah... and it's not fucking fair."

Life rarely was, it seemed.

“You were there earlier,” Sirius said eventually, breathing into the skin of Remus' collarbone; “Back at the piano. How did I sound?”

“Brilliant. If not a bit mental.”

He felt Sirius’ shoulders move with a chuckle. “You didn’t try to stop me.”

“Yeah, it felt like your moment. I couldn’t be the one to stop you.”

Sirius sighed, turning his face so that Remus got the feeling he was also staring up at the underside of the ornate four-poster.

“I hope we never have to come back here again.”

“Next time we’ll just torch it to the ground. We can start with that awful office and work our way out. Make it so every last piece is unsalvageable.”

He’d been expecting another witty retort, maybe an offer of agreement followed by some harebrained idea they’d never actually see through to fruition, but instead Sirius merely unattached himself from Remus’ embrace and sat up.

“I’ve just remembered something.”

He was off the bed in an instant, rushing to the far corner of the room where he collapsed to his knees next to the window. Remus sat up in alarm.

“Sirius?!”

“I know it’s here somewhere.” Sirius began pushing his hands against the floor until one of the boards eventually gave way. He stuck his arm in, but came up empty. “Ugh. Figured she would’ve cleared it out, but I bet she missed one thing…”

Lowering himself until he was almost completely flush to the floor, Sirius gave a little grunt and continued straining his shoulder until finally he was sitting back up on his heels, a single photograph clutched in his hand.

“Stuck it to the underside of one of the boards, just as a little precaution,” he explained. Dusting himself off, he brought the photo back to the bed for Remus to have a look. There Remus found himself staring down at an image of four happy boys, no older perhaps than thirteen or fourteen. Each of them were covered head-to-toe in mud, but they beamed back at the camera proudly anyway. There was Sirius, with his tongue out and two fingers dragging down his lower eyelids in a taunt; James with an arm around a fair-haired Peter, both yet to lose the baby-fat in their cheeks; and a fourth boy Remus recognised only by omission.

“Is that… Miles?”

His tone rose at the end, honestly surprised, and Sirius took it as permission to smile.

“Yeah! You see, we’d just gone on a hike for gym class, ‘cept it was March so it’d been raining the entire week and the whole path was soaked in mud. We—er… well, I can’t really remember who pushed who first, but we all ended up belly-sliding down the hill.”

“Bet it was you who pushed first.”

“Ha… probably. Hooch was furious when we got back to the school. Gave us a week's detention each.”

Remus clutched the photograph tightly. It was hard to tell because of all the mud, but he thought Miles’ hair might be brown. His cheeks were ruddy and he stood taller than Sirius but shorter than James. There was no way of knowing whether it still rung true; several years had passed since the photo had been taken, and in all his time at Hawkings, Remus had never once gone in search of evidence of Miles' existence. James had once told him there was a team photo hanging in the gym atrium from the single term Miles had tried out for the football team, but Remus had told himself that he needn't bother. Miles was gone, and no amount of 'oohing' and 'awing' over old pictures was going to magically bring him back.

And that was perhaps the only reason Remus didn't feel bad as he passed the photograph back to Sirius.

"I'm happy you found it," he told him; "It sounds like a good memory."

Sirius smiled—one of the handsome sort, concentrated out of the corner of his mouth. Then he leaned forward and kissed Remus softly.

"Don't ever go anywhere," Sirius whispered, when their lips parted.

"Never."

Their clothes were wrinkled and dusty by the time they'd retrieved them from the floor, and when it was time to leave, Sirius did not bother giving the room a second glance.

"Can't wait to be out of here," he said, rubbing his arms as if he felt a sudden chill up his spine; "This place has always given me the heebie-jeebies, 'specially when the portrait's eyes follow you. Truthfully, I think it's haunted. Gotta be, what with how many of my family members died within its walls."

"Let's just not think about it anymore," Remus said, purposely not making eye contact with a nearby painting. They were making their way back down the main staircase when they were finally caught, though thankfully this time it was only by one Black.

Standing firm at the base of the staircase, Narcissa crossed her arms and scowled prettily at them. Remus knew she and Sirius must be related, as only the Blacks could scowl prettily. Sirius had spotted her first and nearly yelped, before sagging into Remus out of relief.

"Cissy! Wow, am I glad to see you. It's been so long! Loving the new hair colour by the way—they say aviation blondes are all the rage in Europe these days."

“You were supposed to be leaving,” Narcissa said, her tone less shrill than her sister’s, but not any less foreboding.

“Yes, well, we were just picking up a few things,” replied Sirius. “Now we are, in fact, leaving, so if you could so kindly step out of the way…”

She did not move, but rather came towards them. Every stair she took made Sirius shrink slightly, until she was standing directly below them and yet still at eye-level.

“I want you to do something for me, Sirius. A favour, you might call it. And I forbid you from speaking a word about it to anyone.”

“At all?”

“At all.”

“So what’s this then, like—a secret favour?”

Narcissa scoffed like he was no more than an irritating child. “I need you to take these letters to Andromeda for me,” she said, producing a small bundle of letters from the clutch purse she carried. Sirius eyes the letters suspiciously at first.

“Why don’t you just take them?”

“I haven’t spoken with my sister in years. But you? You must see her all the time.”

“Not all the time,” Sirius admitted, rubbing the back of his neck. “More like… every other month or so?"

Narcissa's eyes narrowed.

"But yeah—totally! Ooofff couuuurse I can do that for you. But I am a bit curious as to what’s inside them...?”

“That’s none of your business, and if you don’t want me going to Aunt Walburga so that she can have you arrested for trespassing then I suggest you take the letters to my sister—unopened.”

“Right...”

Sighing regretfully, Sirius held out his hand and let Narcissa push the envelopes into his palm. Then she lingered a moment longer.

“Your shirts are misbuttoned.”

Remus and Sirius both looked down, alarmed to find that she was right. At least two of Remus’ buttons were misaligned, and Sirius had mistakenly clasped his suit jacket with the interior buttons facing out. As Sirius rushed to fix them, Remus glanced back at Narcissa, who was peering at them with the same scrutinising look as she had back in the office.

“Goodbye, Sirius," she said. "I doubt we’ll be seeing each other any time soon.”

Sirius nodded, jacket hanging open as he tucked the letters safely into his breast pocket. “Have a lovely rest of the funeral, Cissy." He winked. "You always were my favourite cousin.”

“And you always were a liar,” said Narcissa, as she turned and began marching primly down the stairs to rejoin the party.

“Not gonna lie,” Sirius laughed, as the pair of them burst out onto the manor’s front steps, “thought we were goners back there for a moment. But I should’a known—Cissy’s always been good in a pinch. So long as she wants something, a’course.”

“Speaking of wanting something, what do you think is in those letters?”

“Dunno. Maybe Uncle Cygnus and Aunt Druella are trying to disinherit Andy again. Can you disown someone twice?”

Remus shrugged, busy digging around in his pocket for the car keys.

“All I know—!” Sirius declared, raising his hands to the sky in an effort to soak up the sun that had just started to peek through the clouds; “is that this is the best I’ve felt while visiting home in a long time. Maybe we should do this more often—a biannual family get together where we’re not just celebrating some dead relative we all secretly hated.”

“And if that’s too hard you could always just start murdering your family members on the regular,” Remus suggested. “I’d start with that awful grey-haired bloke that was standing behind Bellatrix in the atrium. He smelt like if mothballs could rot.”

“You mean Uncle Cadmus? Nah, he's only related by marriage so he's got no real money. If you’re really gonna bump someone off then it should really be Aunt Bel—AH!”

They’d been rushing to get back to the car, a hurry they soon came to regret the moment they rounded the side of some fancy Italian coupe to find Regulus sitting on the hood of their rental car.

“Where are you going?”

“Home!” Sirius babbled; “Back to London where we belong, thought it'd be obvious. What about you—what are you doing out here?”

“I knew you couldn’t have left if the car was still here," Regulus mumbled. "I went looking but Narcissa said you’d gone out to the gardens.”

“Yeah? Well, Cissy’s a liar. We weren’t in the gardens we were—” Sirius faltered slightly and Regulus rolled his eyes.

“You were doing something you ought not to be doing—yeah, I figured.” Regulus pushed off the car lazily. He had something in his hands he was playing with, and Remus realised with no small amount of surprise that it was one of the cigars from his father’s office. “I also figured that if I asked to come, you’d take me with you.”

Sirius blinked in confusion. “You... You want to come with us?”

The question seemed to stump Regulus. A year ago, he might’ve refuted it outright, but they’d all done some growing up in that time. They were different people now.

“I don’t want to stay here," he said, twisting his hands over the cigar. "I told Mother I was leaving. With you."

"You—You did?"

"Yes. And I also told her that she was wrong about you. That you're a good brother."

"You're shitting me."

A trace of what might've been a smile grazed the corners of Regulus' mouth. "I'm not you, Sirius. Hoping that it'll all just work out no matter the consequences."

"But you'll try?" Sirius asked.

Regulus licked his lips. "I could maybe... be somewhat convinced to try, yes."

It was a Regulus sort of answer, but it was enough, and Remus knew without asking that Sirius was already sold on the idea.

But that didn't mean he wasn't going to tease...

"You sure?" He grinned, shoving his hands into his pockets and leaning over Regulus tauntingly. " 'Cause there's no backing out later. When you become a Marauder you're in it for life."

"I'm not joining your stupid band, if that's what you mean."

Sirius covered his heart. "Ouch. You know if you're going to be our roadie then you're going to have to show a bit more enthusiasm than that."

"Not a roadie," Regulus corrected, cheeks flushed. "This is temporary. Just until I go back to school."

"Okay, so you want to hang out with your big brother for a few weeks, I get it. But then what?"

"Then... I guess I just hope that it all works out."

There wasn't a hint of Sirius that could've refused him. Grinning ear to ear and entirely too pleased for words, he took his brother by the shoulders.

"You can stay for as long as you like."

Regulus nodded, his lower lip giving the barest of quivers, and then he passed Sirius the cigar. Beaming, Sirius set it between his teeth and turned back to Remus;

"Well, Moons? Ready to go home?"

"After meeting your family?" Remus replied. "Yeah, think I could use a stiff drink."

"Oh, then what the hell are we waiting for then?" Sirius exclaimed, wrenching open the Morris's passenger side door. He ripped off his tie with the same motion and tossed it across the windshield of the Italian coupe. "Come on, lads, let's go get disgustingly drunk!"

* * *

Feel the bile rising from your guilty past,
With your nerves in tatters,
When the conch shell shatters;
And the hammers batter down your door;
You'd better run!

- "Run Like Hell" Pink Floyd, 1979

It took Regulus almost the full two-hour drive back to London to realise that they had no plans to go home straight away.

"But what about our clothes?" He asked, as Remus pulled the Morris back into the rental yard.

"We'll get new clothes. Ones that aren't going to make you look fresh off the Prada runway."

It was an exaggeration, but as Regulus frowned, Sirius twisted around his seat looking nothing but eager.

"Come on, Reg! Haven't you ever wanted to see the city for yourself? I mean, really go where the culture is?"

"Culture and crowds are not synonymous."

"You see, Moons? Told you he was smart. He's onto us already."

Remus put the car into park. "Ah, well. To Portobello Road then?"

After getting rid of the car, they hopped the tube—actually hopped the turnstiles, Regulus was horrified—toward Notting Hill and Ladbroke Grove, where they had plans to take the London-newbie through the nearby market stands. They got a few looks for their formal dress, though most seemed to dismiss them as a few fresh-out-of-business school wash-ups merely late getting into the office.

It was a Monday, and already being late into the day, the market was slowing down. Early morning shoppers had come and gone, leaving behind picked-through vegetable stands and a cafe dinner rush that smelt of fresh bread and coffee. It wafted out onto the street to merge with the smell of tarmac and nearby perfume vendors, making Remus' stomach growl and his nose itch at the same time. Around them there were Sikh families running stalls stuffed full with glimmering silk and cotton caftans, next to awning-covered shop fronts selling t-shirts of American sports teams Remus had never heard of. They passed street musicians and weary men peddling tables ladened with tarnished silver, as well as brick walls covered with every sort of poster and flyer one could imagine.

Weaving through the cars and people, Remus almost felt nostalgic. His fondest memories of Portobello were that of the times Tomny had brought him. Back then it was like a game between all the lads—who could fill their pockets the quickest and with the best stuff without ever being caught. Remus partook occasionally, of course he did, but he was never as bold as the rest of his friends. He still had Giles' wrath to fear back then. Now he was grown, and had since made new memories there with Sirius. They'd filled their kitchen cupboards with old china bowls purchased off a kindly Korean woman that spoke almost no English; their bathroom rug had come from one of the charity shops and Remus had spent hours poking through the volunteer-run bookshop on the corner. It was a bit jarring to think of how differently his life might've turned out had Lyall not decided to send him north to Scotland as a last-ditch effort to clean up his son's act, but that was the funny thing about fate—sometimes things tended to work out where you'd least expected them.

"Mmm, take it all in, Edge!" Sirius said, taking a deep breath for emphasis. They'd passed beneath the A40 Westway into the north end of the market and a lorry rattled overhead like thunder, making Regulus jump.

"Take what in? The pollution?"

"Would it kill you to not be so literal for once?"

Ignoring their grumbling stomachs, the first task at hand was to find something decent for all of them to wear. Regulus had whinged over returning to the flat so he could retrieve his trunk, only Sirius had refused to let him wear anything that required a decent pressing beforehand. Instead they took to the busy streets, wandering through the stalls until they'd found themselves standing outside an old charity shop with its usual array of well-loved toys, picture books, and 'famine relief' adverts displayed in the front window. A bell chimed as they walked inside, and Remus caught the familiar whiff of dust and musky old clothing. A shop attendant was going through boxes of old hoover parts up by the front desk and there was a rack of over-stock sitting by the door, mostly made up of men's winter coats priced as low as two quid. Moving up the rack, Regulus paused before an old bomber jacket with orange and yellow stripes and began thumbing one of its sleeves. It only lasted a few seconds before he caught them staring.

“What?”

“Nothing,” Sirius said with a small smile. “See anything you like?”

Regulus rolled his eyes at them, then turned and stalked further into the shop. After he’d gone, Sirius went to the bomber he’d been eyeing and pulled it off the rack. “Just in case,” he told Remus, winking.

Because he had no real preference for style, it didn’t take long for Remus to find himself something to wear in the cluttered shop. Sirius repeatedly tried to pawn various items off on him, muttering things like ‘imagine how it’ll look on stage’ and ‘you and your half-a-mile long legs’, but Remus rejected most of them on the grounds that he didn't feel like dressing up as an Elton John impersonator for the rest of the night. Sirius was not impressed.

When he was finished, Remus had traded his suit for a pair of canvas trousers and a faded chore coat. Once paid for, he found Sirius browsing the shoe section, Regulus nowhere in sight.

“Please tell me you’re not thinking of buying this?” Remus held up a paisley-printed dress shirt he’d plucked from the pile Sirius had amassed next to him. Sirius scoffed and snatched the shirt back.

“Piss off, it’s camp. Not that I’d expect you to know what that means.”

“I know camp,” Remus maintained. “Like Bowie.”

Sirius shook his head, "Hopeless," then he looked him up and down. “Is that really all you found? You look like you’re on your way to the glue factory.”

“So like the average Londoner, then.”

“There is nothing admirable about being ‘average’.”

Deciding that this was not the hill to die on, Remus glanced around. “Where’s Regulus then?”

“I dunno, he was in outerwear.”

On cue, Regulus came tearing around the end of the aisle, nearly knocking over a stack of half-dressed mannequins as he raced back towards them.

“I think I saw a rat,” he gasped. “O-Over there! It was hiding inside those disgusting fur coats.”

“It’s quite possible,” Remus said; “Pretty sure they come inside when it rains.”

Regulus was clearly appalled.

“You said this was a charity shop, not a refuse.”

“Try dialling it back on the negativity just a titch, okay, Reggie?” Sirius sighed, moving away from the shoes to hold a shirt up against Regulus’ torso. “Sometimes you can find some really cool stuff in here.”

“Yeah, like syphilis.”

"Don't be a snob." Sirius switched the shirt for a pair of jeans. “Now these might not be too bad. Why don’t you try ‘em on?”

“These look like they haven’t been washed in years.” He checked the tag; “And they’re women’s.”

“Don’t knock ‘em ‘til you try ‘em.” Sirius grinned, then began piling several more pairs into his brother’s arms. “Here, take these. Dressing rooms are that’a way, there’s a good lad. And don’t you worry, I’ll keep looking. We’ll have you a whole new wardrobe before we’re finished.”

Regulus went—with no small amount of grumbling—and Sirius turned back to Remus, who’d been leaning over an empty rack with an unlit cigarette dangling from his lips.

“You did look good in those jeans."

“Knew you were looking at my arse," Sirius smirked. "Here, found something for you too, even.”

With a victorious smile, Sirius held up a pair of crimson-coloured Chuck Taylors, size eleven. One of the laces was broken but aside from that they fit perfectly. As Remus was testing them out, Regulus came back out of the dressing room, looking awkward in a pair of baggy jeans and his undervest.

“You’ll need a belt,” Sirius nodded, “but look here, I’ve found you the perfect shirt.”

He held it up and Regulus’ eyes widened.

“No. No way.”

“Aw, don’t be such a fuddy-duddy, Reg! This is just the thing for what we have planned next, trust me.”

When it came to clothing, Remus was pretty sure Regulus didn’t trust Sirius as far as he could throw him, but either to make his brother happy or because he couldn't stand spending another moment inside the manky shop, he took the shirt.

By the time they were finished, Sirius had outfitted his brother head-to-toe in second-hand chic and had even found a new stylish Harrington jacket for himself. When Remus began complaining of starvation, the three of them popped into a local cafe for a spot of supper. Mostly Regulus appeared weary of city's preference for fusion cuisine. Watching Sirius attempt to coax him into taking a bite out of one of his pakoras was like observing a mother as she tried to convince her picky eater of a child that eating solely chips for supper did not make for a well-rounded meal.

“Quick,” Sirius urged after, hurrying them toward the nearest entrance to the Underground; “I wanna get out there before the sun sets.”

"Out where?" Regulus demanded.

"You'll see."

It was another short ride, for which Sirius sat on one side of the train and insisted on playing a game of footsie with Remus across the aisle. Every now and then one of them would pause long enough to gauge Regulus’ reaction, but if he was bothered, he never let them know with more than a light scoff. Instead Regulus watched; not them, but others—people on their way home from work, teenagers on their way home from school. He stared at those folk who’d fallen asleep drunk on station benches and peered at the back of newspapers as others read the periodicals. Watching him watching other people, Remus would’ve given just about anything to see what was going on inside Regulus’ head.

“I don’t get it,” the younger Black brother said later, when they’d reached their next destination only for it to turn out to be little more than your average zebra crossing. “They just stood there for a photo, and now it’s like some sort of national monument? What a waste of time.”

“I swear, you’re so uncultured,” Sirius huffed, ushering Regulus into the middle of the crossing. “Stand there and act like you’re having fun.”

“Why do I have to be in the photo?”

“Because, Potter’s never gonna believe me without any proof. Now smile.”

“Don’t forget to show us your shirt,” Remus called, raising the instant camera he’d borrowed off a Japanese tourist. Regulus scowled at him, but there were other people waiting for their chance in the famous crossing and Remus refused to take the photo until he’d opened the bomber jacket Sirius had gotten for him and showed everyone what was underneath. When he finally did, several nearby tourists began to snigger, and a passing woman in a green peacoat gasped scandalously. Sirius only grinned.

Teens want Beatles, the shirt read, not Jesus!

“Right. Now say, ‘Helter Skelter’!”

In answer, Regulus raised his middle finger and Remus took the photo while laughing. It felt like a culmination of sorts, but there was so much to see, and they were only just getting started.

“Come on, Reg, run!”

They tore across the pavement outside of Regent’s Park, dodging pedestrians and cackling as the sun set over the tops of the buildings. Their bus was leaving without them and they were determined to catch it. Remus reached it first, hailing himself aboard the back platform of the double-decker. He was followed swiftly by Sirius, who’d taken a running leap and nearly landed straight on top of him. Still panting, they turned around to find Regulus running full-tilt behind the bus. They screamed at him, waving their arms;

“So close—”

“Just a bit more!”

Reaching his hand out, Regulus grasped the silver pole and—with one final oomph!—dragged his skinny arse onto the bus's rubber platform. He nearly wobbled when he went to stand, but Remus caught him by the shoulders—Sirius by the front of his jacket. Behind the bus, the bike-bound police officer that'd been pursuing them since Regent's Park blew his whistle indignantly. For a moment it looked like he might actually catch them, but he was foiled after being caught in a pedestrian crossing. Sirius was already celebrating.

"OH!" Regulus exploded; "You just HAD to spit in the fountain!"

"It's a cultural thing," he cackled. "Think of it like a rite of passage."

"Everyone does it," Remus said, as the bus dinged to its next stop.

They rode it back into the city, arriving not long after the sun began to set. What they were left with was the twinkling lights and buzzing neon that the more popular high streets were known for. Unused to such a busy place, Regulus eventually got better at dodging the crowds and taxis, remaining silently enamoured with it all. They made sure to tease him every time they happened across one of the less savoury sex shops, and for supper it was fry-ups, straight from the nearest greasy spoon's grill. Regulus seemed dubious over the fact that they were still serving breakfast foods so late, but he was hungry and tired enough not to complain.

"So what next?" Asked Sirius, sipping coffee as he spread a sightseer map he'd nicked from a local newsstand. "All the touristy places'll be closing soon I suspect, but there's always always the theatre."

"Hyde Park's just around the corner too," Remus mused, "we could see if the pigeons are up for a photo."

"No!" Regulus huffed, busy ham-fisting his fork. "No more bloody photographs… Christ, when you said we'd go around the city, I thought you meant we'd do something exciting."

"What—running from the cops not exciting enough for you?" Sirius said.

"Exciting and illegal are not mutually exclusive."

"Maybe not where you're from."

While Regulus began complaining that he and Sirius were, in fact, from the same place, Sirius leaned over to Remus and whispered in his ear. He was not expecting him to propose such a mad idea, but in hindsight, Remus knew that Sirius had been obsessed with the idea ever since he'd told him the story of how Tomny had talked him into it at just fifteen.

"You do realise it was one of the single stupidest things I've ever agreed to?" Remus said. "We were pissed to hell when we did it."

"He said exciting!" Sirius urged. "Can't think of anything more exciting than that."

Or prone to accident, Remus thought.

He glanced at Regulus, who was still shovelling spoonfuls of beans and fried tomato into his mouth. What Sirius was suggesting was idiotic and reckless, not to mention dangerous. If they got caught they'd certainly be arrested, but Regulus had said exciting, and well…

They had to make their way back toward Shepherd's Bush to get there. On the way they stopped back in at the flat to warm up and to share in a bit of liquid courage. Frustrated that neither would tell him what they were up to, Regulus initially turned his nose up at the hooch.

"Trust me," Sirius said, pushing the bottle into his hands, "you're gonna want this."

It was late by the time they'd reemerged, and knowing what they were about to do, Remus kept expecting to turn a corner and find an enraged Lily ready to tell them off for such an idea. She was so going to kill them when she got back...

Arriving at their destination, Sirius paid the cabbie and then began skipping along the pavement, pulling a full flask from his jacket pocket for yet another swig. Already shivering in his jacket, Regulus walked along beside him and groaned dramatically when he realised what it was they'd come all this way to see,

"You mean you spent ten pounds on a cab just so that we could come see some barmy old bridge?"

"Calm down, it was only like three quid," Sirius replied, passing the flask along to Remus, "And this isn't just any bridge. This is the Barnes Railway Bridge."

Regulus didn't look any more impressed at the declaration. He glanced over the entrance to the bridge's footpath, peering at a scratch of graffiti that read things like ‘BOB FENDER IS A CUNT’ in big, bold lettering. Smirking, Remus offered him the flask, which he rebuffed at first.

“We already had a full bottle back at the flat.”

“I know but I reckon you’re gonna need a bit more.”

Regulus sighed and took the booze, hands fidgeting at his sides. Further down the bridge, the sound of a zipper could be heard as Sirius undid his trousers and began pissing off the side of the footpath into the shallow water below.

Regulus choked around the flask, covering his mouth; “That’s fucking disgusting.”

“Wow. I never thought anyone could be a bigger prude than Moony,” Sirius sighed. Once he’d finished relieving himself he zipped up his trousers and wandered back over, slapping Regulus on the arm encouragingly. Regulus gagged in reply, and Sirius got a sharp punch in the arm for it.

It was pitch dark when they finally made their way out onto the bridge. Aside from the moon, the only light came from the windows lining the row-homes off the street running alongside its southern end. The air was chilly, but not unbearable when one was suitably drunk, which Remus supposed they would have to be to even consider the stunt they were about to pull. He hadn’t been to Barnes Bridge in years, not since Tomny had set down proper roots in the End. Back then he’d have run amuck with just about anyone, desperate for a thrill and a good time. The most famous of them was named Patrick, but everyone had called him Plucky after one of his favourite pastimes —playing chicken with the oncoming trains out in the Clapham rail depot. Remus had never gotten to witness it himself, but according to Tomny, Plucky could be seen taunting up to five trains a night. It was all a very neat party trick, but then one evening the lads went down to the rail yard after having a bit too much to drink and Plucky forgot to lace up his boots.

After hearing the story, Remus had never looked at a Battersea train the same way again.

“Ready to do this?” Sirius asked, practically jumping up and down in place. Remus laughed, too nervy to do anything else as he peered down the adjoining train tracks expectantly. Doing so, he was reminded of Plucky, but told himself this wasn’t nearly as dangerous because they wouldn't be running, only... "hanging". Meanwhile Regulus was watching the river, humming to himself and still sipping from the flask, apparently unbothered.

"What are we waiting for?" He asked. "Hope it's not for you the two of you to grow a brain. In that case we'll be out here all night."

"Oh, you'll see, brother dear," Sirius drawled, leaning against the wrought-iron railing that separated the tracks from the footpath. Remus figured they'd have no issue climbing over it; it was what came next that was the tricky part.

"Do you guys do this a lot?" Regulus prattled on. "Come to the middle of nowhere and wait for nothing?"

"As a matter of fact, I've never even been here before," Sirius told him. "But I've wanted to come ever since Lupin told me about it."

"Right—Lupin. You're just full of exciting stories, aren't you?"

"I've been known to dabble. Why? Are you curious?"

Regulus stuck his tongue out, and Remus chuffed. He watched as the younger boy turned back to the water, lazily reaching his arm out and tipping the smallest bit of booze out of the flask to watch it fall onto open air.

"Don't waste it," Sirius chided, taking the flask. "You wanna drop something, you use your spit—OH! That's it! We can teach you how to spit!"

Regulus made a face. "I know how to spit."

"No, you don't," Sirius laughed, already steering the both of them toward the railing. "Go on, Moons, show him how it's done."

Tipsy and entirely too eager to please, Remus took hold of the railing with both hands and hocked a large wad of phlegm straight out over the water. Sirius clapped for him, but Regulus looked about as offended as a sixteenth century woman asked to show off her petticoats.

"Your turn now, Edge. Give it a try," Sirius encouraged, welcoming the dirty look it earned him.

"I am not spitting in the river."

“You have to! You didn't do it back at the fountain and it’s a rite of passage. Lupin taught me my first ever time in London.”

“No, not happening.”

“C’mooooooon!” Sirius nudged Remus, and together they took up a chant; “SPIT! SPIT! SPIT! SPIT!”

“God—FINE! Just shut up already!” Elbowing Sirius out of the way, Regulus readied himself on the edge of the railing.

“Oh, and don’t feel too bad if you’re awful at it,” Remus added. “Sirius couldn’t get past the tips of his shoes the first hundred times.”

“Shuddup, Moony.”

Flashing them his favourite glare, Regulus relaxed his shoulders and leaned as Remus had. Then he coughed deep in his throat, and with a sharp thrust, spat an impressive loogie straight out over the canal. It flew several feet before disappearing down into the darkness, and by then Remus and Sirius were already cheering.

“I knew you could do it,” Sirius keened, shaking his brother by the shoulders. “My little hooligan!”

“Yeah, yeah, just pass me the booze.”

Together they shared another round, and when the flask was mostly depleted, Sirius tucked the little bottle away and clapped his hands together.

“Right. We’ve waited a decent while, figure it’s about time to get this show on the road. Moony, if you’ll please.”

Remus linked both hands together, creating a little platform for Sirius to fit the bottom of his boot into. Regulus eyed them, shuffling closer.

“What are you doing?”

“Going over the railing, what’s it look like?”

“You’re going to jump into the river?!”

“Not that railing, silly. This one!”

With a sharp ‘oomph’ Sirius had hauled himself over the wrought-iron and onto the edge of the train tracks. He wobbled a bit before finding the correct footing, and Remus reached through the bars to grab him.

“Careful. Mind the gaps.”

“I got it,” Sirius assured him. “You coming over?”

“Yep.”

As Remus carefully stretched his long legs up over the bars, Regulus grabbed hold of the railing and began to bark at them;

“What are you doing? Get back here!”

“C’mon, little bro,” Sirius grinned, reaching an arm out to steady himself on one of the vertical beams. “Where’s your sense of adventure?”

“You’re going to get hit by a train!”

“Do you hear a train?”

Regulus blanched, and Remus held out a hand to him.

“Here. I’ll help you.”

It wasn’t in his nature to accept help—from anyone—but either because it was late and they were drunk, or because he’d already thrown caution to the wind just by coming with them, Regulus accepted.

“There,” Sirius said, when all three of them were on the other side. “Isn’t this just exciting?”

“Thrilling. Now can we get off?!”

“In a bit.” Sirius began skipping up and down the track, open air hovering dangerously between every joint. Remus kept close, unsure if he would even be able to catch him were he to fall. They'd survive if that were the case; it was only about a fifteen foot drop to the water below, twenty at most now that it was winter, not that Regulus seemed comforted.

“You okay, Edge?” Sirius called, when Regulus refused to let go of the bridge’s main arch. “Don’t tell me you’re scared of heights now?”

“I’m not scared of heights!” Regulus snarled. “But I’d rather not drown in a filthy, sewer-ridden river!”

“You won’t drown, you’ll just get a little wet. Now come over here. Let go, you won’t believe how good it feels. It's a total rush.”

Regulus flipped him off, only to panic when he realised that he no longer had two hands on the metal beam. Watching him, Remus stepped onto the same joint as Sirius so they were shoulder to shoulder.

“Maybe we should stop here.”

“No way,” Sirius whispered. “He’s braver than he thinks he is.”

Remus didn’t have much to say to that. He hung back as Sirius trotted back toward the railing and stopped right beside his brother, leaning in so their foreheads nearly touched and their dark curls melted into one another under the light of the moon.

“Reggie, listen to me. Just take a deep breath. You’re alright—you can do this, you only need to let go.”

“No, I’ll—I’ll fall.”

“You won’t, promise. You won’t, cause I’ve got you.”

Sirius offered his hand, palm up, and Regulus eyed it with a reluctant expression. Several seconds passed, but when he finally reached out and took it, Remus exhaled.

“D-Don’t let go!” Regulus babbled.

“I won’t,” Sirius promised again, already carefully guiding him out onto the middle of the rails. “There—just there. Put your foot there… Good! You’re doing so well.”

Regulus winced, the wind lapping at his hair and gently pushing it across his pale forehead.

“Shit… Fuck, I-I’m doing it!”

“Well done!”

Regulus smiled, then caught the tip of his boot against the next joist. He flinched sharply, but Sirius was there to steady him, just as he said he would be.

“There," he said, as they both straightened up. "Not so bad, now is it?”

Slowly, Regulus released his brother's hands and was able to stand upright, breathing deeply. “Hell," he panted, "I can’t believe you idiots do this every night.”

“That’s a bit generous,” Sirius chuckled. “We try to save the really exciting stuff for special occasions. Like funerals and blood moons.”

Regulus laughed, giddy like a kid on his first rollercoaster. Up, up, up!

“So what now, we just stand here?”

“If you’d like. I expect the waiting’s the worst part, ain't it, Moony?”

“Waiting—what waiting? Waiting for what?”

“Shh!” Remus pressed a finger to his lips; “Do you hear that?”

An unsettling feeling overcame all of them, and Remus glanced down at the metal rails beneath his feet. They were quivering slightly; somewhere down the tracks, a faint rumbling had started that was getting more noticeable with every passing second. Then, the loud blaring of a horn burst through the night, and Regulus’ question was answered.

Honestly, he should've seen it coming. What went up always came... down, down, down.

“Fuck! We gotta go!” Regulus gasped, whipping his head around. “W–We gotta get off the tracks!”

“We will,” said Sirius, “just gotta hang tight first—heh.”

“ ‘Hang tight’?!”

“Moons, how d’ya do it?”

“This way.” Remus bent down, carefully shifting himself around so he was sitting on the metal joist, his legs dangling down over the river below. Sirius matched him, and they both turned to look at Regulus. The train horn blared again, louder this time. Closer.

“Well? Hurry up, Edge!”

“Sirius, a train is coming! We stay here and we’re gonna die!”

“We're not gonna die! Not if you do as you’re told, anyway. Now just sit down on the bar like we are. Don’t worry, Lupin’s done this before."

Once, about five years ago, Remus thought dismally. He watched as Regulus glanced between Sirius and the safety railing, as if measuring the likelihood of death as it hurtled down the tracks toward them. He must've decided it was too far a distance to risk on his own, and so he squatted down on the bar next to his brother and slowly got his feet beneath him.

"Sirius, if we die out here I'm gonna kill you!"

"Now that's just cliché."

"Just stay calm, Regulus," Remus told him. "You gotta stay calm."

"Oh, fuck you, Lupin!"

Another blaring horn, and Regulus looked about as far from calm as one could get. All around them the bridge shook while the now-visible headlamp of the train's engine reflected around their backs like a glowing full-body halo. They had a minute at most, and then the iron beast would be right on top of them.

"Both of you, listen to me!" Remus called over the noise. "Now you're going to see another rung just beneath the joist ahead of you! Lean forward and grab onto it, and then when you're ready, slide off and hold on tight!"

"Hold on?! LUPIN, ARE YOU CRAZY?!"

"Do what he says!" Sirius bellowed. "It's either that or jump!"

Another horn call, and this time Regulus screeched with it.

"AH! I–I CAN'T REACH IT! SIRIUS, I CAN'T REACH IT!"

"Just lean forward a bit more!"

"AH-UGHH! AH—I got it! I–I got it!"

"Good! Now let go!"

They fell like dominos, one after the other. First Remus, then Sirius, and finally Regulus, until they were all dangling over the canal by the skin of their fingers. For a moment it was easy, but then the adrenaline inevitably wore off and Remus remembered how it felt to wake up that morning, battered as though he'd been laid out by a road sweeper. This was twice as bad and every bruised muscle screamed out in protest, though none as loud as Regulus' bellowing.

"I HATE YOU!" He screeched. "YOU'RE AN IDIOT, SIRIUS—YOU'VE MADE ME INTO AN IDIOT!"

"YEAH, EDGE! WAAH-HOOO!"

The train was upon them before Sirius had even finished his victory cry. It rattled overhead like a jet on the runway, so loud that Remus could barely hear himself think. Sirius kept screaming, as did Regulus—though his sort was distinctly less enthusiastic. It occurred then to Remus that he had no idea how long these London freight trains could go on for. He'd once heard Lily say that the passenger trains like the ones they'd rode into school on could get up to a half a mile long. How long would half a mile take to cross over a single thirty-foot bridge? Longer than they could hold on for, surely.

"Sirius! … SIRIUS!"

"Yeah?"

"I may have forgotten one tiny little detail about the first time I did this!"

"And what was that?"

"That I walked home in wet clothes!"

He could only see the back of Sirius' head so he couldn't be sure, but if he wasn't crying, then the sound Sirius was making was certainly laughter.

"Right—well! That's brilliant! My advice is to try and avoid the warm spots, 'cause I might just piss myself!"

As the seconds ticked by, Remus began to feel his arms grow more and more tired. Ever since the charity shop he'd been more aware of his injuries, and hanging off the bottom of a bridge certainly wasn't doing anything but aggravating them. Aside from having to bear the strain of his entire body weight, the metal bars they were clinging to were freezing and every passing train car shook the bridge to an unvarying degree. They'd set themselves up for failure—glorious, glorious failure.

"I can't!" Regulus was moaning. "I can't do it anymore, Sirius!"

“Hold on, little bro! Just a bit longer!”

Emboldened by Sirius’ surety, Remus tried to calm himself by counting the cars, but his brain was muddled from the pain and it was all he had just to cling on. Then, when it seemed as though he couldn’t bear a second longer, the final railcar passed overhead and just like that, the noise fell away.

“We did it!” Sirius cried. “Ha! We did it! Reggie, you did it!”

“Okay, but now what?!”

“Moons?”

“Uhh…” Remus looked around—even stupidly checked his feet; nothing but dark water. “We just have to—er… pull ourselves up!”

“We can’t do that!” Regulus yelped. “My arms are gonna rip out of their sockets!”

“Well, gentlemen, looks like there’s only one thing to do.” Sirius let go of the bar with one shaky hand, raising it to his forehead in a salute. “It’s been a pleasure hanging with you.”

“Sirius, no—!”

And just like that, Sirius Black was flying—straight down into the drink.

There was a splash but Remus barely heard it. He too, had already let go. The soles of his shoes hit the Thames with a great slap and instantly he was seized all over. Water rushed him like a zap, invading his mouth and nose as his legs flailed desperately beneath him. When his head finally broke the surface it was met with all the aches and pains of his injuries as well as a chill wind that licked up off the water. He felt as though he'd gotten flatted by the road sweeper all over again, and yet the adrenaline made up for all of it.

“Sirius?" He called, splashing through the pitch-coloured water; "… SIRIUS!?”

“I’m here, Moons!”

A shape moved toward him in the darkness—Sirius, with his black hair plastered to his cheeks and forehead in inky rivulets. He paddled forward with a grin not even chattering teeth could tarnish, and together they reached for each other.

“Where’s Regulus?” Remus demanded. In answer, Sirius pointed up toward the bridge overhead, only to gape when he realised that Regulus was gone as well. Suddenly frantic, the two of them whipped their heads around, splashing through the surface of the water as though Regulus might appear out from under them.

“Reg?! Reg, where are you?”

“Regulus!”

Somewhere not far off, a voice had begun to wail. They paddled forward to find Regulus flailing near the banks, face screwed up and chin barely out of the water as he moaned.

“No more! No more!”

“Reg! Reg, ya big ninny, open your eyes!”

“I can’t!” He moaned; “I can’t!”

“Yes, you can! You’re an utter ledge! You did it, now open your bloody eyes or your big brother’s gonna have to—!”

A sharp splash caught Sirius in the face, leaving him sputtering.

“I don’t have a brother!" Regulus wailed. "I have an insurance liability!”

It was somehow colder on the shore, a revelation Remus had while he was dragging himself over the rocks and fighting against stiff clothing and stiffer limbs. The taste of dirty bilge water lingered in his mouth and his hair dripped down into his eyes with an icy sting. Fuck—His entire body hurt. Next to him, Sirius was still laughing, lying back on the shore with his feet barely out of the water. Was mania a side effect of hypothermia, Remus wondered? Regulus certainly wasn’t fairing much better, though he was on his feet at least. On his feet and panting like a dog.

“You…! You fucking… LUNATICS! You should be medicated—both of you! We could’ve—we could’ve fucking died! OOH—It’s a wonder that… eugh… That you’ve even lasted this long! How you haven't been arrested for endangering the public, I'll never know!”

“Arrested? HA—Where do you think we spent the night yesterday, Edge?”

There was a lapse in Regulus’ shouting as he took in the information, obviously trying to deduce whether Sirius was lying or not. Before he could come to his conclusion, Sirius had rolled over and staggered up the bank.

“Here, Edgie,” he said, pulling the flask from his pocket; “Take the ‘edge’ off a bit.”

Regulus did take the flask, but rather than open it, he wrenched his arm back and flung it into the canal. Remus watched it disappear with a splash, and frowned.

“Cool… Wasn’t like that was mine or anything…”

“Oh fuck off!” Regulus slumped back down on the rocks with his head in his hands. He looked so pathetic, all sopping wet; Remus almost felt bad. “I think I've become stupider,” he moaned. “I can actually feel myself losing brain cells by the minute. Christ, mother's gonna kill me. I have to go back there soon, and when she finds out I… crap, shit—fuck!”

“Sod this.” Sirius kneeled down on the shore, wobbling as his wet shoes slid along the rocks. “You don’t have to go anywhere you don't want to. Especially not back there.”

“Easy for you to say, it’s not expected of you. You—Sirius—live in this great fucking bubble, content as long as you can play your shitty music and see your shitty friends. What responsibilities could you possibly have?”

“I could be responsible for you. Come live with me, Reg.”

Sirius might as well have dunked him in the river again, for all the look Regulus was giving him.

“What?” He blanched. “No! No, don't be ridiculous, I can’t live with you!”

“Why not? It's not like we've never lived together before.”

“I have school to finish, for one.”

“Alright, I’ll pay for it," said Sirius firmly. "Then you come and live with me. I’ll let you do whatever you want—anything. You can go to university, you can work—I don't care! As long as it's what you want."

"And what if I don't want to live with you?"

"You don't?"

Regulus' snappy retort died on his tongue.

"I can't," he whimpered. "I can't live with you. You and me—we just don't… And there's still mother—"

"No," Sirius swore. He fell forward, clasping his brother by the shoulders. "This isn't about what she needs. It's about what you need—what I need. I need my brother, Reg."

"And what if I'm not your brother anymore?" Regulus demanded, throwing off his hands. "What if I never was? I'm not just some little kid anymore. I'm not just gonna follow you around forever—I mean, what if I'm not everything you want me to be?!"

"Then I won't ask you to be anything! Just be here. And if you can tell me honestly, that you'd rather be back there, with all those people who don't give two shits about the real you—then fine, I won't ever ask you again. But you have to say it here, right now—to my face!"

There was a sharp silence, in which Regulus dropped his head once more. When he looked up, his eyes found Remus as he stood silently just over Sirius' shoulder. Seeing him wet and pathetic, it was like he was fifteen again. Fifteen and stealing Sirius' Black Sabbath tapes in hopes that it would get his big brother to look his way for even a moment longer.

"You went into the water, Reg," Sirius pleaded. "Please don't come out the same."

Slowly, Regulus' eyes shifted back. Remus didn't know what it was he found there, in those grey eyes so alike to his own, but whatever it was, it must've been enough.

"I don't want to go."

A relief. An exhale. A sad smile—and Sirius was nodding.

"Okay."

"I don't want to go back."

“Okay.”

“You’ll be disappointed eventually," Regulus whispered. "You’ll be ashamed…”

At that, Sirius shook his head.

“That’s what they never told us, Reggie… No one’s ever died from a little bit of shame.”

With a miserable sob, Regulus buried his face in his knees. He shook for a little while longer, but once Sirius had moved up the bank to hold his shoulders, Regulus slowly lifted his head.

He wiped a hand beneath his nose.

"... I’d like to go home."

It was enough for Sirius, who took his brother’s arm and pulled it across his shoulders to help carry him across the stones. As the brothers started their wobbly ascent up the bank, Remus came in close and took up Regulus’ other arm. They were almost to the stairs that lead back up to the street when Regulus spoke again;

“Sirius?"

"Yeah, Reg?"

“Please, no more bridges…”

“You're really tying my hands there, Edge, but alright. No more bridges.”

* * *

All alone, or in twos,
The ones who really love you,
Walk up and down, outside the wall;

Some hand in hand,
And some gathered together in bands,
The bleeding hearts and the artists make their stand;

And when they’ve given you their all,
Some stagger and fall, after all it’s not easy,

Banging your heart against some mad bugger's wall…

* * *

"Lupin? Black? I'm home! … You're here, right? The two of you didn't murder each other, did you?"

Peter rounded the corner into the living room with his bags, and found Remus standing in just his pants and vest, an extra-large mug of coffee in one hand.

"Hey, Moony. How was the holiday—"

"Shh," Remus whispered, finger to his lips. "Still sleeping."

He pointed to the sofa, where a head of black hair could just be seen peeking out from beneath a blanket.

"Blimey, what's he doing? It's past noon."

Remus shrugged, and Peter began pushing up his sleeves.

"Oh! Step back then, Moony. I got this."

It was hard not to laugh while watching Peter creep steadily up to the top of the couch. He started by leaning over the sleeping bundle, fingers splayed and at the ready.

"C'mon, Black. Time to rise and sh—"

Regulus turned over with a haggard scowl, and the next thing Remus knew, Peter had fallen backward over the coffee table.

Chapter End Notes

'Rushing' in music is when you play the tempo of a piece faster than it is written.
The 'Lavender List' was a satirical name for Prime Minister Harold Wilson's controversial 1976 Resignation Honours; PM's could bestow titles and honours upon people of their choosing when leaving office, and this list caused controversy as many of Wilson's chosen recipients held political views that went against his own Labour Party (think right-leaners and capitalist bastards).
'Pakoras' are a deep-fried vegetable dish originating from India and often sold by street vendors and restaurants in the UK. Sooo delicious.

⏰⏰⏰ New Update Schedule: I will now be posting updates on MONDAYS with chapter 103 coming out next week on Jan 9th, we then SKIP a week (I'm moving continents, it's a long story), and then start up again with chapter 104 on Jan 23rd, 105 Jan 30th, 106 Feb 6th, and finally 107 on Feb 13th.

And o h m y g o d — I DO NOT ENDORSE JUMPING OFF THE BARNES BRIDGE 🧔

Chapter 103: Spectre Records

Chapter Summary

Remus has a few surprising run-ins.

Chapter Notes

The song I've written for this chapter was written to the melody/ beat of "The Stroke" by Billy Squire. If you're interested in "listening" while reading, wait until Sirius begins singing in the chapter's first scene and go ahead and follow that link. It makes for pretty good vibes, I promise. And as always, please excuse any facsimile between the two songs.

I don't think this chapter has any C/W. Let me know if you spot something that should be tagged, but for the most part it really is just a fun little [long] romp!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Are teenage dreams so hard to beat?
Every time she walks down the street;
Another girl in the neighbourhood,
Wish she was mine, she looks so good;
I wanna hold her, wanna hold her tight—
Get teenage kicks right through the night!

- "Teenage Kicks" The Undertones, 1978

End of March 1979

In a timeframe that would've made any sane bride dizzy, and with the fervent help of Mrs. Pettigrew and a slew of other hired hands, Lottie had gotten the grand wedding she'd wanted. They'd picked a Wednesday—the first Wednesday of April—and though it felt like an odd day for a wedding, all of the Pettigrews' closest friends and family would be in attendance. Remus was informed later that it was the only day they could book the venue on such short notice. Naturally, he felt that the entire thing felt more than a bit rushed, but since only Peter seemed to share the sentiment, he kept the thought to himself.

The girls were very busy those days; Lily appeared to have run herself entirely ragged between all the dress fittings, hen parties, studying, and classes. Sirius of course teased her over it, loudly anticipating the day it'd be her walking down the aisle in a lovely white gown of her own, but Lily was abstinent. She was far too busy to even consider such things. If she and James did get married, it would not be for a long, long time.

And so, as his friends went about settling back into their usual routines, Remus steeled himself to do the same, only now the Marauders had their eyes on a bigger prize.

It'd started with their triumphant return to the stage. Ray had called—the Shoestring needed its favourite act back, and they were hardly in a position to deny him. Coupling as a slightly-belated birthday celebration for James, the five of them plus Regulus all piled back into the Minnie van with their instruments and made the short trip across the city. Despite the excitement, the atmosphere inside the old Volkswagen had turned anxious before they'd even made it to the opposite bank of the Thames. After all, it'd taken less time for bigger bands to be forgotten by those who'd once cheered their name, and they were still newcomers on the scene.

"They probably won't even care," Peter anguished, making Remus recall their earliest days at the Shoe, where they'd played to audiences of as little as four people merely there to drown themselves in their pints. But then, if there was anything a small, local pub was known for, it was the loyalty of its patrons.

Upon their arrival, Ray met them at the back doors and they were welcomed back by the kitchen crew with open arms. Ray offered them drinks to celebrate—just the cheap stuff—and when they emerged into the rest of the bar with their gear, plenty of people craned their heads to get a look. Some friendly faces tapped their pint glasses approvingly, others cheered—finally a good show!

Just like that, Remus knew they were home.

"This is really where you play?" Regulus asked warily, peering around the spit-n-sawdust pub as though a disease might leap off of the nearest bar stool and bite him.

"Expecting a concert hall, were you?" Sirius leered, stopping to dramatically breathe in the smell of cigarette smoke and spilt hops. Regulus didn't reply; it was clear by his scrutinising expression that the Shoestring was not what he'd been expecting. After nearly a week in London, he'd given up on the stiff black slacks he'd brought from home and had instead taken to borrowing whatever pieces from Sirius' wardrobe that offended his eyes the least. Now, with a pair of plain jeans and his usually neat hair hung loose around his face and ears, he was starting to look like any other seventeen year-old kid.

They found their usual table near the stage empty and waiting for them, with their name and the word 'reserved' written clumsily across a paper napkin. One of the r's was backwards, turning it into 'RESEЯVED'. When Sirius saw it, he scooped up the napkin and offered it to Remus.

"Could make a half-decent song."

"For a great big industry plant like us?" Remus smirked. "Maybe."

By the time the Marlene, Dorcas, and Mary had shuffled in to join them, it was peak hour and the bar was slammed. Drinks had been pouring for hours, and would continue to pour until Ray gave last call, which usually waned later, considering it was a Saturday. After organising their gear and doing a quick sound check, Remus stepped off the stage with the others and found Mary practically throwing herself over Regulus out of excitement.

"Oh, I missed this handsome face!" She simpered, clamping both hands across Regulus' cheeks and mashing them together like playdough. "You came to see me, didn't you? Oh, just say it. I'll forgive you for forgetting to call—you cheeky thing!"

As Regulus almost toppled off of his chair, begging for sense and personal space to reassert itself, Sirius leaned over and shoved his hands between them.

"I'm sensing some blatant favouritism," he pouted—before Mary took a threatening swipe at his cheek that left Sirius to leap away or else risk ruining his pretty face.

"Oh, shut it you. I can look at your smug gob whenever, but this one —oh. You really know how to keep a girl wanting for more, don't you, Regulus?"

Remus had never seen someone go so red without passing out first, but luckily for Regulus, the girls' drinks had arrived and Mary was suitably distracted. As she offered him little sips from her cocktail, Dorcas shuffled over to Remus with a fresh pint.

“Right, so do you want the good news or the bad news?”

"There's bad news? Blimey, start with that then, I suppose,” Remus replied, already feeling dour over the unfortunate smirk she was giving him. He didn’t know what it was he should be expecting when she leaned in to whisper in his ear, but it certainly wasn’t—

“Sacked?” Remus gaped at her. “What do you mean I’ve been sacked?!”

“Sorry babs, but Phil asked me to pass word along. Apparently he didn’t take too kindly to us switching shifts. Call it a wounded ego if you must, but he’s already hired one of his mates to replace you. Some bell-end named Geordie.”

“That prick,” Remus growled. “He’s never cared when we’ve switched shifts before. Five quid says he was probably just looking for a reason to get rid of me… buggar… I knew he never liked me! Ain’t my fault he can barely string a guitar.”

Dorcas leaned in, pinching his mouth and jaw together with two fingers. “He never liked you because you’re tall and good looking. It was starting to piss him off—seeing as half the customers came in just to ogle you."

"They did not."

"Ha. Right. Well, if you ask me, there are worse things to lose a crappy job over.”

“You gon' tell me the good news now?”

She smiled, releasing his face and tapping him fondly on the cheek. “I’ll do you one better. Come by the shop on Monday during Phil's lunch break and I’ll show ya.”

Remus drank the pint she’d offered—bitterly—and by the time the glass was empty, couldn’t give half a shite anyway. Since the incident with Fletcher, he’d managed to squirrel a small bit of money away, though it was nothing to live off of. He’d meant to put it toward a second amp to boost their sound, or maybe a decent wah-pedal for James to use on stage so they could finally get their riffs to start sounding like the way they did in Remus’ head. For now it’d have to be collateral, but at least as long as he was unemployed he’d have more time to focus on the music. He could tell Sirius and the others later.

Just before they were scheduled to take the stage for their first set that night, Lottie arrived wearing a beautiful satin skirt and a blouse with a Chelsea collar. She appeared a bit overdressed when compared to the pub's other patrons, but didn't seem to notice as she weaved through the inebriated throng. With T-minus three days until the wedding, she'd nearly backed out of coming, but had made the effort to clear her schedule when Lily had informed her of Regulus' sudden arrival.

"No, you must come to the wedding," she gushed, going as far as to take both his hands in hers for dramatic effect. "It'll be such a party, I swear you'll have fun! You are Sirius' brother, after all, and that makes you family. Oh, please say you'll come!"

Regulus didn't stand a chance. He'd caved almost immediately, and even Remus had felt some semblance of pity for him. Lottie was hard to say no to on a good day, but ever since getting engaged she'd become even more sure of herself. More… nubile, almost. She often went out with Roger's mother—first as a guest, and then slowly as a member of all the high society circles she'd been dreaming of since she was a little girl. Combined with that and the new demure style of dress, it'd quickly become obvious; Lottie wasn't just preparing for a wedding, she was in training to become a wife.

"You sure you don't want Marauders to play on your big day, Lot?" Sirius asked, as he leapt up onto the edge of the stage in preparation for their incoming set.

"Yeah!" James called, already above them and swinging his amp cable around. "We could totally do it. I'd even acquiesce to some Elvis. Presley or Costello—take your pick."

"Sorry, boys," Lottie hummed; "Maybe if the four of you hadn't been so busy tearing pieces off of each other, Roger and I would've considered it, but I'm afraid the act's already been booked."

"It's not that Rod Stewart impersonator you were talking about, is it?" Peter grimaced, appearing behind her from the direction of the loo.

"He's not a—Petey, your fly is down—he's not a Rod Stewart impersonator! He just happens to look a bit like him."

"And sound like him," Peter scoffed. "If you ask me, I say that if it acts like a duck, dresses like a duck, and quacks like a bloody duck… Well, then it's probably a Rod Stewart impersonator."

“Good thing no one’s asking you!”

Peter shrugged indifferently, setting his drumsticks between his teeth long enough to do up his zipper and clamber up on stage. Finishing his second pint, Remus stood up to join them. Already the crowd was pushing in, growing louder; he could taste their excitement and he wanted more.

As he followed his friends up onto the stage, Remus overheard Regulus shouting to Mary over the crowd’s noise;

“Where’s that Evans’ friend of yours? Figured she would be here for Potter’s birthday.”

“Lily had a late meeting with one of her lecture groups today!” Mary hollered back. “They finish their term in April so she’s been really busy. She’ll be by later though… She said she’s bringing a surprise!”

Regulus nodded, then looked upwards at Remus. He hadn’t realised he’d stopped with one foot on the stage.

“What are you staring at, Lupin?”

"Nothing. Just didn't realise you'd missed Lily so much."

"What's this about Lily?" James asked, appearing between them.

"Regulus was just worried she was going to miss your birthday party, Prongs."

"Shut up, Lupin!" Regulus snapped. "When are you two going to start this ridiculous show of yours?"

Suddenly the pub's overhead lights began to dim.

"Right about now, I suppose," James grinned. "Try not to cheer too loudly for us, Regulus. Get's distracting."

It might've been the lighting, but Remus thought that Regulus' face had somehow turned even redder. Could Regulus have a thing for Lily, he wondered? No, certainly not. If he did then it couldn't have been anything more than a school yard crush. What was it they said—distance makes the heart grow fonder?

"Come sit over here, Regulus!" Mary called.

Watching him stalk away, Remus tried to recall an instance where he'd witnessed Regulus and Lily interacting with one another, but nothing came to mind. Surely he was just reading too much into things.

As the lights continued to dim, Remus looped his guitar strap over his head and felt the familiar weight of his bass settle over his right shoulder. The crowd whooped—anticipation for what was to come—and Sirius began looping the microphone cord around his wrist. What came next was James and Peter—launching themselves into a boisterous cover of a Thin Lizzy song just to get the audience hooked while Sirius played his role as frontman perfectly, rousing the audience from whatever daze had accompanied them along their everyday lives. He already looked the part, wearing a red military jacket he'd picked up at a costume store and a pair of white trousers that felt distinctly Freddie Mercury-esque. Sirius was looking more and more like a queen every day now; not that anyone would've gotten away with insulting him for it.

After they'd wrapped up the cover song, Sirius swung his mike around and caught it mid-air. He was panting, but Remus knew it was from excitement.

"Shoestring," he bellowed; "have you missed us?!"

Cheers went up, an answer;

Yes!

"Now I know you can do better than that—SOUTH BANK, HAVE YOU MISSED US?!"

YES! YES! YES!

"Now that's more like it! How's everyone doing out there? You alright? You staying cheeky, hm…?"

Some replied—YES!—and a few more made fun of the posh way he pronounced every syllable. It was a common enough reaction, one that Sirius accepted wholeheartedly. He played with them, loved on them, and they adored him right back.

"We missed you too," he told them.

"Took a little break, is all."

"But we're back."

“—Better than ever.”

“In fact we have a new song for you.”

“Would you like to hear it?”

Yes!

The room began to clamour.

“You would?”

Yes!

"I'm not so sure."

YES! YES!—More!

“Well then... Let’s have some fun, shall we!?”

It started with a clap. Then a stamp. Then a thundering that reached all the way inside of Remus’ rib cage.

They’d never played the song in front of the audience, it was too new. You wouldn’t have found it on those butchered tapes from Fletcher. Here, they were delving into new territory—if anything it was a chant. One to clap along to, one to stomp your feet.

One that could fill an entire stadium.

“ 'Now everybody,
Listen in close;
Did they make you play the part,
Of that old man’s ghost?”

Chills, from the very first word. Remus could still remember the day he’d scribbled the lyric down in his book. And now it was this.

“ 'Won’t pull no punches,
Better read ‘em and weep;
Gotta stay, be patient,
Keep your ass in that seat!”

Just like that, he'd hooked them. Such was the way of a master; Sirius swung his hips—WHOO!—and the music moved with him. He whined but they were the ones begging for it. More, more! their eyes wept, their hands reaching for him.

" 'Young boy grows up, puts his name in the race,
But it's hard to win, when you're running in place;
Breathing in pollution, choke on your own tongue,
They say keep your head up, have your fun and—

" 'Watch your temper!
You're the man of the moment till the shots ring out;
Watch your temper—
WATCH!"

The crowd didn't know it yet, but the next part was for them. Sirius thrust his fist into the air on the words— WATCH! WATCH! —and it only took them a single try to remember it. The room sweltered, but the chorus wasn't finished.

" 'Watch your temper,
'Doomed generation' is the cry they shout;
Watch your temper,
Save a couple million while the will of the children runs out…"

Up, down—Peter twirled his sticks, squinting like the lights were too bright. Ahead of him, James swayed before his backup mike—Watch! Watch!—smiling and pointing at the audience as if he could make them scream louder. Funnily enough, everywhere James pointed, cheers erupted like several dozen bombs going off at once.

" 'Night on the town, end at dirty brick lane,
Tear 'em down, till the red hand stains;
You say you want me, then you make me cry,
When I come up empty, ride on by and—

" 'Watch your temper!
Put down that rock, we'll tell you what it's all about!
Watch your temper—"

“WATCH! WATCH!”

“ 'Watch your temper,
You behave pretty well for a sinner, boy;
Watch your temper,
Save a couple million while the will of the children runs out!”

They were caught up. Their fists pounded the air above their heads like a glass ceiling waiting to shatter. Every note was a calling—culling—culmination of something else.

Fuck Fletcher.

Fuck Exeter.

Fuck anyone and everyone who’d ever said the words you can’t.

Because they would.

They will.

Just watch, fucker.

“ 'Watch your temper—”

“WATCH! WATCH!”

“ 'Watch your temper—”

“WATCH! WATCH!”

“ 'Save a couple million while the will of the children runs out!”

And that was the end. The entire pub cheered for Peter as he shattered his cymbals, and for James as he slid up and down his strings with a final flourish. A girl reached for Sirius and he bent down to kiss her hand. Her friend did the same, begging for another, then another. Remus had never enjoyed the feeling of sweat on his back so immensely.

After their first set, they stumbled off the stage feeling haggard and vibrant. They wanted to go again—they would go again—but first, alcohol.

Their drinks were paid for—by who, Remus didn't know. Marlene made him scarf down some food so he wouldn't throw up, but then one of the kitchen lads had some dexies. Remus took two, which was probably two too many, but he'd missed the feeling. It was like drinking thirty cups of coffee all at once. It made the sad things less sad, and the happy things euphoric. If anything the alcohol ruined it. Made him feel heavy. The pills would've been a perfect high had he not been so greedy, but the pint was right there in front of him!

Waste not, want not…

They were due for their second set to start any minute when Remus found himself drifting back across the pub. The booze had turned him sentimental, while the uppers made him dauntless. He could do it now —commit the call he'd hadn't been able to make since those failed attempts before Christmas. He could do it.

There was only one callbox at the Shoe, and he had to wait his turn before he could use it. By then he'd started chanting the number under his breath, half afraid he'd forget it when finally facing down that silver number pad. Stupid; there weren't enough drugs in the world to make him forget that number.

The line rang. Remus considered what to say. It was April, perhaps 'happy birth-day?' That would be funny. But was the baby due in early April or late? Shit…

I'm sorry—he could start with that. And also; I'm an idiot. I don't even know why I said it. You're totally right. I'm a stupid fucking prick. I miss you. Skylar didn't deserve it. Forgive me?

The telephone line fell silent, unanswered. Unreplied.

Tomny didn't have a messaging machine.

Remus was disappointed. He had so much to say! Tomny was a prick, never picking up like that… Fucking asshole. Hope you enjoy your new life! With your new fucking baby! Fucking pisshead… Fucking bastard!

"Moony! Get your fit arse over here!"

It was Sirius, calling out to him from across the bar. His voice should've been swallowed by all the noise, but Remus' ears were too keen. He'd hear Sirius over a hailstorm, probably.

Hanging up the phone, Remus shambled over to his table where Marlene ruffled and kissed his hair and Dorcas pressed yet another drink into his hand. As it turned out, Sirius had been trying to inform him that Lily had arrived. She came into the pub with her full bag of school things, though it was the girl trailing closely behind her that had them instantly all curious.

“Didn’t miss too much, I hope?” Lily said, brushing her wind-ragged hair from her face as James helped her out of her jacket. When she was suitably presentable, Lily stood back to introduce her new friend.

“Everyone, this is Sybill. She’s part of my surprise.”

Sybill was a flighty thing, that much Remus could tell. She had hair the colour of wheat that sprung up from behind a beaded headband like she’d stuck a fork in an electrical socket when she was very young, and she wore glasses so large that her eyes seemed to bulge out like a cartoon character. Standing next to Lily, she kept a colourful folder clutched tightly to her chest as though it might shield her from whatever fallout might come. Not that she needed it; the girl wore so many crystals and talismans around her neck, it was a wonder she hadn’t fallen over from the weight of them.

“Sybill and I met in our media law class,” Lily went on. “She’s studying journalism. And in her free time she—”

“I also make zines!” Sybill burst out, thrusting the paper folder toward Sirius while simultaneously falling into a near ninety-degree bow. Sirius glanced at the folder dubiously before taking it and flipping it open.

“What’s a ‘zine’?” Lottie queried, getting up on a chair so she might take a glimpse over Sirius’ shoulder herself.

“A zine is a small, curated publication of just about anything,” Sybill recited, still bent over at the waist. “But I—” She raised her head, only her head; “make zines to expose hypocrisy and supply my audience with all the tools required for revolution and anarchy.”

"And music, on occasion," Lily added cautiously.

Weirded out, and perhaps standing a bit too close to the strange girl for comfort, Remus wandered over Sirius and squeezed in with the rest of his friends. Inside the folder, Sybill had stuffed several tiny pamphlets ranging in size and severity. Most were printed in black and white, with their letters hand drawn or else cut from other magazines like some murderous ransom note. The titles were absurd—

Windsor Poo, Erectile Conjunction, Slasher Chick—but they were nothing compared to the content.

“People actually pay for these?” Regulus muttered, as Sirius flipped open to a page that seemed to feature John Lennon’s head pasted onto the body of the Virtruvian Man, the words ‘We Can Wank It Out’ scribbled across his chest.

“They only ever make enough to go toward the next issue,” Sybill tittered honestly, finally straightening up. “Most of those are collaborations with local artists, but with your permission, I’d like to feature your band in this month’s issue.”

“Us?” James echoed in disbelief.

“Yes. You see, I’ve actually seen you play before. I was going to do a feature on you anyway—purely for research purposes—but then Lily told me she knew you personally."

"It was quite serendipitous," Lily nodded.

"You’re not exactly the normal sort we’d feature," Sybill went on. "To be honest I'm not sure how well our audience will take to you, but I like keeping things fresh. And you four are particularly bombastic.”

She seemed to say this with pure wonder in her eyes, or maybe it was just the unintentional bug-eyed effect of her glasses. Either way, Sirius passed back her folder and Lily swooped in;

“We have one more surprise actually,” she said, shooting a keen glance in the eccentric girl’s direction. “Sybill, here, is actually the vice president of the events committee at UCL, and if you’re interested, she’s said that she can probably get you guys into the rotation. See about letting you play on campus.”

“You mean you want us to play a concert at the university?” Peter gaped.

“Lots of up ‘n coming bands do it,” Sybill said, blinking off in the direction over Peter’s head as though she’d suddenly found the wall more interesting. “We hosted the Human League last month. Before them it was the Spandau Ballet, then Dick Damage and the Dilemma… Next week Duran Duran is showing.”

Sirius made a face, before mumbling under his breath; “What the fuck kinda name is ‘Duran Duran’?”

"Sounds like an aftershave," James agreed.

“They say, having breezed right past ‘Dick Damage’,” scoffed Dorcas, making Marlene snigger into her palm.

“Well?” Lily urged. “I know it’s not the Marquee or anything, but it could be a stepping stone. Haven’t you guys been saying you wanted to play more shows anyway?”

Lily was right. Sybill might’ve been a bit odd, but she had connections, and aside from general know-how, connections were the only things the Marauders were in dire need of.

“Best birthday gift—EVER!” James announced, after he’d swooped in to lift Lily straight out of her shoes. “God, I love you.”

The comment made the hairs on the back of Remus’ neck stand on end, but when he turned toward Regulus, he found him hesitantly flipping through Sybill’s zines, while the bushy-haired girl sat next to him and pointed out the political context for every eerie collage and cartoon. He would’ve expected anyone who had a crush on Lily to be more perturbed seeing her so in love, but Regulus didn’t seem to care much at all.

Almost disappointed, Remus felt his shoulders deflate before one of them was being poked by Sirius.

“Hey, who was that you were talking to on the phone?”

Remus nearly started. The almost-phone call already felt like a lifetime ago.

“Uh… no one. Couldn’t get through.”

Sirius nodded, though it was obvious he didn’t believe him. “You ready to get back on stage then?”

“Yeah. Yeah, go on.”

The second set went might like the last, albeit slightly sloppier and more sloshed ‘round the edges. Not that their audience seemed to care; they too were pissed off their asses, all save for Lily who’d volunteered to drive the van back to Shepherd’s Bush.

“You know us, we know you,” Sirius had recanted into the microphone; “but for those who’ve just arrived, I’ll do one final introduction."

Pete began with a drumroll, to which everyone cheered. The crowd was familiar to them now, and no longer shy. They pleaded for noise and fever. No—they demanded it.

"On drums, we have the Marauders' effervescent everyman, Peter Pettigrew!"

Whoo, Peter! Yeah, Peter!

"On guitar, you'll find the illustrious James Potter, poster child for Huggies nappies and boy scouts everywhere."

Ow-ow! Hey, Potter! Nice arse, Potter!

"The unassuming brooding giant with the bass guitar is our dearly beloved Remus Lupin, lover of sappy songs, boring books, and married women everywhere. Better lock up your mums, everybody, this one's dangerous."

Remus! You can have me, Remus!

"And finally, your main course for the evening, my name is Sirius Black, and we are—Marauders."

The night finished without a hitch, their first in many months. The audience screamed and chanted and knew their names and for a while Remus couldn't decide whether it was real or just some lucid dream he was having. Such an obvious success with the promise of more had him finally reassured, but when the show was over and the lights had turned on, Remus finished his final pint and went home to his bed in busy little Shepherd's Bush. The next morning when he remembered the dexies and the zine and the almost-phone call, he was left feeling sick.

For once, he was glad Tomny had not picked up.

* * *

Monday 2nd April 1979

Remus wouldn't realise it until later, but being sacked from his job at the music shop along Tin Pan Alley would come to be one of the most insignificant moments in his entire musical career. When Dorcas told him of his sudden loss of employment Remus' first inclination had been anger. The drink he'd sunk at the Shoestring had led him next to acceptance, but as he rode the tube over to Tottenham Court Road, his acceptance quickly turned into trepidation. He didn't want to have to rely on Sirius or his friends for money, and with all the strikes still going on in everything from private unions to public sectors, job prospects within the city were bordering on slim to none. He'd be lucky if he could find work in some meat processing and packing plant. What a swell gig that ought to be, coming home smelling like the inside of a cow's intestines every day. God—Sirius would never kiss him again.

"Look, Remus, ya know I like you. But I can't just let employees do as they please all the time. I'm your boss! I need to be respected. And I needed you here last week to help with those new shipments, but where were you? Nowhere to be found apparently."

"Come on, Phil," Remus urged, following his old manager further into the shop. "I got Dorcas to cover all my shifts, and you and I both know that she's loads more useful than I am. If it's the repairs that's the problem, then Bo can easily handle—"

Phil swung around; "Bo called in three times last week on account 'a his back! As far as I'm concerned he's on bloody probation. I've got orders piled out the back door, and customers breathing down my neck twenty-four-seven! And don't even get me started on the bloody manufacturers… Those bastards are only late on shipments until we're behind! Now I'm sorry, Lupin, but I've made up my mind and them's the breaks. I mean, hell—I've already found your replacement."

Phil gestured languidly toward the store's guitar wall, where a peaky-looking guy in a Che Guevara t-shirt was sitting on a stool and polishing one of the sunburst Ibanezes. He waved when Remus turned around, and the guitar nearly took a header into the wood panel floor. Phil made a yelping sort of noise when it happened, but the guy only sat back on the door and gave each of them a half-witted smile.

Remus turned back around. "You've got to be joking."

"Er… Geordie's still in training."

"Oh come on, Phil! You're shitting me! That guy looks like he's got an order against him saying he can't be within a hundred feet of any school or public park. I mean does he even know anything about music? Does he know how to restring a bloody guitar?"

Phil did not look amused. He puckered sourly, then crossed both arms and Remus knew he was finished.

"You can pick up your final cheque from Grace Jones on your way out," he huffed, already turning away. "Oh, and tell your little friend there, our policy is you break it, you buy it."

A few feet away, Regulus turned away from the six-piece Ludwig drum kit he'd been admiring and flipped Phil the finger. Phil looked astonished, but when he turned on Remus expecting some reprimand, Remus only shrugged.

"Them's the breaks, Phil."

There was not much left to be said after that. Once Phil had returned to his office, old Bo came out from behind the repair counter to shake Remus' hand and offer his condolences.

"We're gonna miss you 'round here, kid."

"Me too." Remus glanced bitterly toward the office; "Most of it, anyway…"

"Want my advice? Forget Phil, he's a right little cunt. Always has had it in for the handsomer lads."

Remus smiled, bashfully; "Dorcas told you to say that," and Bo pulled him in for a friendly clap on the back.

"Make sure you come back and visit," he told him. "Maybe I'll do some custom work for you when you're big and famous. Blow those mass-market hacks outta the water."

"I'd like that, Bo."

When he meandered back to the front of the store, he found Dorcas waiting for him by the cash register.

"I see you brought the spare along," she mused, gesturing to Regulus, who was drifting back and forth between the stacks of amps.

"Yeah. Promised Sirius I would babysit seeing as I'm out of a job and all. But don't tell Regulus that."

Dorcas smirked and slid the drawer to the cash register shut. She had a lolly in one hand, which she fit back into her mouth as she turned to him.

“Right, so let me get this straight then. Your boy’s little brother shows up on your doorstep after the two of you had just gotten out of the clink, but he’s supposed to be six-hundred miles away, going to some whoop-dee-doo school in the middle of Scotland—‘cept their dad popped his clogs, so really he was on his way to the funeral and just couldn’t bring himself to go any further. Which wouldn’t be so worrying, save for the fact that he and Sirius get along about as well as two squirrely cats in a rubbish bin. So now he’s freeloading for who knows how long, ‘til he either decides whether he’s going back to the posh school where his she-devil of a mum can get her claws in him, or stays here and lives on your couch. That about right?”

“Don’t forget about Lottie’s wedding. She already made him promise to go. And to be a flower girl. Though, I might’ve dreamt that bit.”

“Oh, Lupin. Someone should write a book about you. They’d make a mint.”

"Nah, no way anyone would ever pay to hear about me."

Dorcas smiled, leaning her elbows on the counter. "How's the kid doing then? Looks miserable."

"Regulus? He's always miserable. But his school's gonna be going on Easter break soon. Reckon he'll decide what he's gonna do after that."

"Have you invited him to join the band yet?"

"Twice. But he doesn't seem to fancy Sirius' offer of letting him play the harmonica."

“Could you two idiots please stop talking about me as though I’m not standing right here?” Regulus snapped, glaring at them from behind an aisle of music books. “It’s bad enough Lupin’s been dragging me around town all day. When are we going home?”

“Oh, it’s ‘home’ now, is it?” Remus smirked, glancing back at him. The look Regulus gave him was venomous, but before he could lash out again, Remus began rifling around in his pocket for some loose change.

“Here, Edge, why don’t you pop over to the shop on the corner and buy yourself something sweet. I'll meet you there when I'm finished."

Regulus snatched the money, then flipped Remus off for good measure and promptly turned for the door. They waited for the tell-tale chime to come before laughing, and by then Dorcas was slipping her lolly back behind grinning teeth.

"Mouthy little thing, inn'he? Can't get over how much he and Black look alike though."

"I keep doing double-takes myself," Remus agreed, as Dorcas slid his final pay stub across the counter for him to sign.

"It's gonna be such shit without you," she said, grumbling around the sweet. "Pretty sure Geordie's got about as many brain cells as a ceramic garden gnome. Did you know that yesterday I asked him to receive one of the incoming shipments while I handled this customer? Well, when I came back he was organising the fuzz boxes by the number of knobs."

"At least you know he can count."

Dorcas sighed, haggardly, then pressed her tongue to the side of her cheek in a poor attempt to hide a smile. "Yes, well, considering I'm the only one around here who knows how to handle the bloody shipments, I don't feel so bad giving you this."

Remus cocked his head in question as Dorcas peeked back toward the office—assumedly to check if Phil was spying—and then disappeared below the shop counter. What she came back with was a large box, big enough to make a heavy thump when she set it down in front of him.

"What's this?"

"It's the good news from the other night," she smirked. "Consider it a belated birthday gift. For you and Potter."

Already intrigued, Remus began inspecting the box keenly. It was black, with what looked like a picture of a very large calculator on its front. Then he spotted the metres, along with the dials and multi-tracks.

"Is this… Is this what I think it is, Dee?"

"It's better," she told him, before swinging the box around so he could read the label. “What you’re looking at is the best in brand-new, top of the line technology. They call it the ‘Portastudio’. This American company just put them out on the market for professional use—you can’t even buy these in the shops yet! They let anyone record up to four different tracks right at home and cut and mix your own tapes directly onto any cassette. All you need is a pair of headphones! Look, I found it here.”

With an eager thrust, Dorcas handed him a copy of a print catalogue, already flipped open to an advert displaying the same machine. Introducing the first at home 15” by 18” recording studio, it read; The TASCAM Model 144 Portastudio is built for the musician on the go! Add special effects or fix a flat note from anywhere in the world, all with the ease of smooth, multi-track recording.

Remus was speechless.

“How did you get your hands on this?” He demanded, flipping the page to find layers and layers of different control specs.

“I do all the ordering, duh. All I had to do was put the shop’s name on some list and the company sent one right over. It’s supposed to be a display model—you know, so we can sell them—but Phil doesn’t even know it’s here so I figured he wouldn’t mind if I leant it out to you first.”

“This is amazing… Do you know how to work it?”

“Ha, no,” she snorted. “You’re on your own with that one, babs, but there’s a manual. I’m sure if you put those four public school brains together you’ll figure it out eventually. Five—if you count your new stray.”

Remus beamed down at the Portastudio. “This... Shit, this is amazing! Thanks, Cas. You don’t know what this means.”

He reached across the counter to hug her—something Remus Lupin would never have done in any regular circumstances—and Dorcas accepted, albeit awkwardly.

“Go on then,” Dorcas said after, ushering him out; “before Phil comes back from his third lunch break and we’re both out of a job.”

"I'll be seeing you at the wedding then?" Remus called.

"Wouldn't miss it."

It was raining when Remus walked out of the shop, arms clasped tightly around the Portastudio's awkwardly-large box. Having unfortunately adapted Sirius' poor habit of never bringing an umbrella with him anywhere, he cut quickly down the street and slipped into the nearby corner shop before the rain had had time to seep into his hair. The shop attendant gave him a funny look when he walked in with his armful, but said nothing as Remus shuffled toward the magazine racks, where he found Regulus passively flipping through a copy of the New Musical Express. Regulus didn't bother giving any indication whether he noticed him, rather he turned the page in his magazine;

"Evans' weirdo friend writes better music reviews than this shite. 'The revolution will be dyed in peroxide'? What a load of bollocks." Huffing, Regulus set the magazine back on the rack and then did a double-take at the Portastudio. "What's that?"

"Our golden ticket," Remus grinned.

Regulus rolled his eyes. "Whatever. Are you finally ready to leave? Traipsing across the city in the rain wasn't on my to-do list."

"Yeah, just gimme a sec. Wanted to pick up some more fags before we go. Sirius finished off my pack last night. You want any?"

Regulus just looked at him.

"Right."

Adjusting his grip on the Portastudio, Remus turned and approached the shop's front counter. "Packet of Embassy Number One's," he grunted, setting the large device down on the counter.

The guy fetched the cigarettes, punching in the numbers on his register. "Nice typewriter," he said, eyeing the large box as he doled out Remus' change. After pocketing the coins and fags, Remus took the heavy device in his arms again and spun around, only to narrowly avoid running into a man who'd come upon him from behind. He was dressed in an expensive-looking overcoat, with a thick moustache and goatee. He barely glanced Remus' way as he mumbled a quick pardon as slipped past. It might've been the end of the interaction, had Remus' jacket sleeve not caught on one of the pick 'n' mix displays, successfully knocking a large bucket of fruit jellies to the floor. The sweets promptly scattered in every direction, and he heard the attendant behind the counter give a moan.

“Sorry! Sorry, my bad…”

"You're gonna have to pay for that."

"Uh—right..." Remus looked for a place to set down the Portastudio.

“I’ll pay for the kid’s gaffe,” the other man said impatiently, before pulling a twenty-pound note from his wallet and slapping it down on the counter. “Just give me a double pack of JP Special, I’m in a rush.”

Torn between apologising and thanking the man profusely, Remus began backing up toward the door, his face red with embarrassment. He might’ve fled the shop entirely had Regulus not grabbed his arm and pulled him down the front aisle toward the magazines.

“What are you doing?” Remus hissed, stumbling after him and almost taking out a second display.

“Saving your stupid career, idiot!” Regulus shoved his earlier copy of NME in his face. "Look!"

Remus nudged the magazine aside with his chin, struggling to keep a hold of the Portastudio. “Jesus christ, Reg—What’re you on about?”

“You told me before that this used to be a famous street, right? So that stands to reason that famous people would sometimes come here, yes?”

"I... I guess!"

“And do you know who Gaz Spectre is?”

Remus scoffed; “ ‘Course I know who Gaz Spectre is. He was the guy who discovered Jeff Beck. That was until the Yardbirds came along and—”

Suddenly Regulus was smothering him with a hand. “That was a rhetorical question, you fucking dolt,” he hissed, flapping the magazine in his face once more. “Here. Shut up and read the first few lines.”

Remus obeyed—albeit reluctantly—and Regulus dropped the open magazine down over the top of the Portastudio’s box. It was just a small article really, tucked in between the likes of ‘The Secret Life of Captain Sensible’ and ‘The Sins of Siouxsie Sioux’.

But there it was;

Indomitable producer, Gaz Spectre of Spectre Records, retains his title as 'producer with the world-wide reach' after the company's latest signing of new Australian rock band Rosencraft. The band's first single, "Poor Excuses" has been steadily rising in chart popularity since its February release, while their debut album is set to hit shelves and stations in early September. This addition of the 'New Boys Down Under' comes as a follow up to the label's already impressive lineup, which includes various modern power-houses such as the Swedish punk group Ultraculture, as well as London-based groups The Weird Sisters and De Facto Regime. When asked for comment, Spectre only had this to say: "I don't sign bands, I sign phenomena."

"So he sounds like a nob," Remus drawled; "so what?"

"So what?" Regulus hissed. "That nob just paid for every little sweet you knocked on the floor, shithead!"

It took several seconds for the words to register, and by then Remus had already glanced back down at the magazine article. What he found was a photograph of Spectre, hands folded neatly as he glared at the camera lens from behind a huge studio desk. He wore aviator sunglasses like Elvis and there were at least half a dozen gold records hanging on the wall behind him. When he squinted, Remus could just make out a package of John Player Superking cigarettes lying open next to the ashtray.

Holy shit…

A sharp door chime drew Remus from his stupor. It was like getting hit over the head with one of those gold-plated records.

Gaz Spectre! Triple-gold standard record producer Gaz Spectre was strolling down the corner shop aisle!

Holy shit!

Unaware of the shock and turmoil that had overcome them, Spectre glanced at Remus and Regulus rather indifferently, popping a raspberry fruit jelly into his mouth as he passed. There was another chime, and the shop's door inevitably fell shut behind him. Gone.

"Hey…" Called the attendant. "You have to pay for that magazine, you know…"

Suddenly Remus couldn't breathe.

"What are you doing?" Regulus seethed, practically shoving him. "Aren't you gonna go after him?"

"A–And say what?"

"How about, 'hello, my name is Remus-shitface-Lupin and I have a shitty band you might want to sign to your shitty fucking music label that'll make both of us a bunch of shitty fucking money'?!"

"Is this really your idea of a pep-talk? Because you suck, mate!"

Groaning at Remus' obvious incompetence, Regulus turned and grappled onto the edge of the shop's window display. What came next was a Spectre play-by-play;

"He's lighting a cigarette… Now he's walking down the street… He's —He's getting into a car! Lupin, it's now or fucking never!"

Shit. Shit. Shit—fucking—shit!

The attendant had come around from the counter. "Hey, you have to pay for that—OI!"

But there was no stopping him. Before he could realise what it was he was doing, Remus had half-tossed the Portastudio at Regulus and swept out of the corner shop. It didn't occur to him that he was still holding the magazine until he was outside and being lashed about by the heavy rain. What started as that morning's simple April shower had quickly turned into a torrential rainfall, soaking Remus down to his skinnies. Up ahead, he could see Spectre stopped next to a lavish black sedan. He had a driver next to him who was holding up an umbrella as the producer lingered on, smoking his cigarette. Remus was still twenty paces away by the time he flicked the ash and butt into a nearby puddle. Then the driver reached for the door, and Remus felt his chance begin to slip away.

"Uhm, pardon me, sir? … M–Mr. Spectre, sir?"

The man in the black coat didn't turn around, and in his nervousness, Remus nearly gave up. What if Regulus was wrong and he was just chasing after some random guy?

No—he pushed the thought aside and called out a second time, and when that did nothing, Remus took another step forward and forced himself to swallow his fear. Better to be wrong than to miss out on the chance of a lifetime.

Marching up to the side of the sedan, he planted his two feet and raised the magazine up over his head to block the rain.

“Excuse me," he called in a wobbly voice; "but are you Gareth Spectre? As in ‘Gaz Spectre’ of–of Spectre Records?”

"Maybe. Who's asking?"

"You don't know me, but my name is Remus Lupin and I've been following your work for a while now. M-My friend saw you back in the shop? I knocked over the sweet display..."

A pathetic beat passed, then;

“Sorry, kid, but like I said earlier, I’m in a rush.”

It was a dismissal, and yet still a shred of hope had bloomed in the centre of Remus’ chest.

“But you are Gaz Spectre!” He gasped, as the chauffeur opened the door and the man readied himself to climb inside. “You’re the producer who signed—”

Suddenly the chauffeur rose up, looming toward Remus with shoulders like a bull’s. “Don’t touch the car!” He roared, nearly sending Remus spiralling as he pushed him back toward the pavement.

“John!” Spectre yelled; “What’d I tell you about shoving ‘em? Do I look like I need another lawsuit?”

“Sorry, boss…”

“I have a band!”

If it were any other moment Remus might’ve keeled over from the embarrassment of it, but as it was, he was desperate. His cry made both of the men give pause for only a second, but that second was all he needed.

“I have a band,” he repeated breathlessly, spitting rain from his mouth as it poured down the sides of his face in fat rivulets. “We’re really good! We—We write our own songs and everything—we started it in school. We can show you, all I need is a few minutes."

“And this band of yours,” Spectre mused, like a cat toying with a ball of yarn; “I suppose you think you’re the greatest thing since Christ came back to life to make a watered down chardonnay?”

“Well, I–I…”

“There’s a million bands out there,” the producer scoffed; “So many, there ain’t enough stages in the world to fit them all. Now the radio's full, kid—I don't need any more bands."

"That's shite."

The comment slipped out before he could stop it, and Remus clamped his mouth shut as Spectre whirled on him.

"What was that?"

Screwed and completed out of his depth, Remus glanced down at the soaked magazine. It wrinkled under his hand, and he imagined walking back to Regulus with nothing else to show for it. He could do that. He wouldn't.

Remus squinted down at the blurry words.

"Phenomena..."

Spectre took a step forward, shouting over the noise of the rain; "Speak up, man!"

“Phenomena!”

Spectre blinked, and with nothing else, Remus threw up the magazine.

"You want a phenomenon, don't you? Well, the Marauders are a phenomenon. Just listen to us play once and you’ll know! We’re a family—we need each other more than we need the air in our lungs, and we're good. Our lead singer, Sirius, you—you haven’t seen anything until you’ve seen him! And James, our guitarist, he sees colours—like actually sees them. We have a drummer too that'll knock you on your arse and me—I'm...” Remus sighed, furiously wiping the rain from his face. “Look Gaz—I–I mean, Mr. Spectre, sir… I swear—you take a chance on us…? We won’t make you regret it.”

He was panting by the time he'd finished, and the reaction he got was little more than dismissive. Remus watched as Spectre sighed and brushed away the drops of water that had slid down the umbrella and onto his shoulders.

“ ‘Marauders’, huh? … S'a shit name.”

“You once signed a band calling themselves ‘Body Pyle’,” he grumbled. “And if memory serves right, you only got the one single out of ‘em before the lead singer was arrested for dealing heroin outta his mum’s basement.”

“Do you deal heroin?”

“Nah… kicked the habit.”

It might’ve been a trick of the light, but Remus thought he saw Spectre smirk.

"What'd you say your name was, kid?"

"Remus. Remus Lupin."

“And what sorta music do you play, Remus Lupin?” He looked Remus up and down appraisingly. “Are you a punk?”

“Not really.”

“Yeah, didn’t have the look about you… New wave?”

“No.”

“What then?”

“We’re…” Remus glanced at his hands, hapless. “We’re rock.”

Spectre shook his head. “Nice try, tosspot. You see, that used to be worth something—used to. Now everyone’s gotta have a shtick.”

“We don’t have a shtick, we're just us,” Remus said, with as much conviction as he could muster whilst looking like a drowned alley cat. If he'd had to guess, he would’ve assumed he’d botched it already. He was good at getting second chances, but first ones? Now those were a bit harder to come by. He waited while Spectre smoked his second cigarette, knocking ash into the puddle between his feet once—twice—three times—

“That was a shit pitch,” Spectre said, then; “You got a tape for me?”

Remus felt the air leave his lungs all at once.

“N–Not on me, but—”

“Then how am I supposed to know if you’re so ‘good’?”

“Come to a show! We play at the Shoestring pub out in—”

This time it was the driver—or bodyguard, Remus couldn’t tell.

“You think Gaz has time to wander around some waster’s pub?” He demanded, then; “Go on, piss off, kid. You’re done here.”

He shoved Remus again, albeit more gently, but this time Remus wasn’t taking the abuse sitting down. He grappled for the driver’s arm, holding on as if it was a life raft, and rejection was the sea he would otherwise drown in.

“We can get you a tape!” He begged. “Just give us a week!”

Spectre shook his head, brushing rain from his suit jacket. “I fly to New York on Wednesday, s’gotta be sooner than that. Can you get it to the office by noon tomorrow?”

No, Remus thought.

“Yes,” he said.

“Fine. Johnny,” he jutted his head toward Remus; “give the idiot my card.”

Johnny didn’t look too happy to be doling out his boss’s card to a nobody kid on the streets, but he did it without complaint and afterwards Spectre flicked away his final cigarette and got into his car. He stopped his chauffeur just as he went to shut the door, and raised a single finger toward Remus in warning.

“Listen here, tosspot, you should know the only reason I stopped to hear you out is because you look so pathetic standing there in the rain, but I don’t tolerate anybody dicking me around. I ain’t no Danny-fucking-Fields, right? You drop that tape off and it turns out shit—I’m throwing it in the bin and billing you for my wasted time.”

Remus nodded, positively thrumming from head to toe, and watched as Spectre gave him a final side-eyed glance, as though he were still working out if he’d made the right decision. Either way, he gestured soundlessly to the chauffeur, who shut the door and left Remus to stare back at his own sopping reflection in the window's glass. By the time the car was pulling away from the curb, Regulus had come out of the shop to meet him, trainers splashing through puddles as he struggled to balance his umbrella and the Portastudio.

“Well? What’d he say?!”

Remus grinned down at the damp business card in his hand. “He told me to bring a demo to his office by noon tomorrow.”

“Do you even have a demo?"

Remus shook his head. “But we've got something better."

* * *

There was quite literally no time to waste. Before he’d even taken off his wet clothes, Remus was shooting toward the flat's phone and calling around to each of his friends’ places of work. He ordered them to get their sorry arses back to the flat as soon as possible, and when they asked why, Remus told them it was an emergency. To no surprise, it was James who arrived first, tired and out of breath after running the entire way from the tube station.

“ALRIGHT—” He wheezed; “WHO DIED?”

“I’ll tell you what died, Prongs! Your parents’ hopes and dreams of ever seeing their only son become a lawyer!”

“... Huh?”

Remus confessed to everything, and could tell by the look on his face that James didn’t entirely believe him. When they finally made it home, Sirius and Peter were also sceptical, but if Regulus’ corroboration wasn’t proof enough, Spectre’s business card certainly rid them of the rest of their doubts.

“A demo?” Sirius echoed, as the three of them fought over the card. “Where are we gonna get ourselves a whole fucking demo in less than twenty-four hours?!”

“From this!” And he planted the unboxed Portastudio down before their feet. Flummoxed, Sirius looked at James, who then looked to Peter, who asked;

“Why did he just hand us a plastic suitcase?”

It was not a suitcase, and from the moment Remus explained himself, nothing else mattered aside from the demo. Knowing that they were going to be up working until the sun rose again the next day, James and Peter both called into work feigning colds, whereas Sirius simply called Ray up at the Shoestring and shouted down the line; We’re making a demo, can’t make it into work tomorrow, don’t sack me!

It was a new step in the journey, that was for sure, and Lily appeared supportive—general concern notwithstanding.

“I just don’t want you to put all your eggs in one basket again,” she cautioned, as they ripped into the Portastudio later that night. “Remember what happened last time?”

“Don’t worry, Daisy,” James told her; “At least this way we’re making our own demo. If Gaz Spectre don’t want us then we’ll just go over his head. Who knows, maybe EMI will still want a taste.”

Despite what Dorcas’ catalogue had claimed, the Portastudio quickly proved to not be as user-friendly as they were expecting. There were four tracks, but Remus couldn’t for the life of him figure out how to switch between one without copying over the work he’d just finished on the other. As he attempted to scan through the horrendously complicated manual—metres, faders, and overdubs, oh my!—James and Sirius went blundering ahead on their own, as per usual, messing around with the microphone tracks and record button.

“Testing, testing,” Sirius drawled, nearly yawning into the microphone. He’d just discovered the master faders when his face lit up for a second time; “Oh shit, look! This button plays it backward.”

He stamped a finger down over the right button, and what followed sounded a lot like his voice set to helium, unintelligibly muttering the words;

'Gnit-set, gnit-set!'

“I wanna try!” James grabbed the microphone. “Prongs is the best Marauder.”

‘Re–nar-arm tss-eb eht-si sig-norp!’

“Wicked.” Sirius held the mike out to Peter. “Hey, Pete, think you can let one rip?”

It turns out that a fart played backward sounds a lot like a fart played forwards, but to four immature boys it was still worth a few cheap laughs. After that Lily ushered them out of her living room, claiming a need to study, and the boys excused themselves to the basement without argument. Setting the mini record studio aside for a while, they got to work on their songs, tweaking every strum and note until they had something polished enough to be proud of, but not too polished as to not belong on a rock and roll record.

Early on, Regulus had reluctantly joined them downstairs. He slumped back into their dingy band sofa with a book in his lap, pretending as though he weren't interested and occasionally called out helpful directions such as "You're dragging," and; "One of you's off tempo, five pounds if you can guess who it is." After about three hours of this, Sirius picked up the heavy Portastudio and dropped it at Regulus' feet.

"We get it, Edge, you're very funny, but we have less than twelve hours to get this thing done, and believe it or not, your little voice-over isn't helping! So here, why don't you actually make yourself useful and sort this headache out for us."

Regulus gave him an eye-roll, but eventually picked up the thick yellow manual. It took him less than an hour to know the machine inside and out, and after that they were forced to listen to him as he dictated orders like an unofficial sound tech.

"Have you even decided which songs you're going to put on this thing?" He asked, scribbling notes in the margins of the Portastudio's manual like he was studying for A-Levels.

"Reckon all of them," James called optimistically.

"All of them? You don't put all your songs onto a demo."

"He's right," Sirius said. "I don't know how he's right… but he is. Fucking Fletcher had us doing everything wrong. A demo's supposed to be a taste—a piece of what we can do, if you will. There'd be no point in paying us if we just handed them the entire cake for free."

"Then which songs?" Asked Peter.

At that, they all seemed to defer to Remus.

"Well… 'Downtown Girls' for sure. It was our first real song, and I stand by it."

“ ‘Hail Mary’ should be on it,” James added. “I never get tired of that one.”

“Put down ‘It’s Hard to Be a Teen’,” Sirius told Regulus. “And ‘Doomed Generation’. We’ve just finished it—make it a grand ol’ ‘fuck you’ to Fletcher.”

Regulus glanced up from his notes. “That’s four. Reckon more than five would be pushing it.”

“We still need a ballad,” Peter pointed out. “Should we do ‘How Nice It Could Be’?”

No one said anything, and again all eyes were on Remus. He knew exactly what they wanted.

“No.”

“But Moony—”

“It’s not a good song.”

Sirius bent down before him, grasping the neck of Remus’ bass. “It is a good song, Moons—I swear… It’s not just your feelings for her in there, it’s you. You think I could stand it if it weren’t? If you really hate it, then we’ll never bring it up again but…” Sirius sighed. “It’s a good song, and I think it deserves a spot on our first album.”

Remus hung his head. Dammit.

For so long, accepting that song had felt like accepting defeat. That she was really gone, and at the end of it all, she’d never really cared for him in the first place. It stung more after his falling out with Tomny—turned the defeat into mindless shame. But what came after shame?

Acceptance?

Compassion, a tiny voice said. It wasn't hurtful, or angry. It felt like her, and Remus ached. Maybe it was time then. Maybe with this, he could finally put Tonya's memory to bed.

“It can’t be called that,” he swore. “It needs another name.”

Sirius thoughts for a moment. “ ‘Midnight Dancer’.”

It felt right, and slowly Remus nodded his head in permission.

“Fine… but I’m gonna need a drink first.”

Staying long enough to kiss Remus over his hair, Sirius stood and gestured to Regulus and the Portastudio.

“Well? Blimey, what are we waiting for? Someone get this man a fucking drink so we can record these songs!”

* * *

Tuesday 3rd April 1979 — 11:14 AM

Someone was shaking him.

“Lupin! Wake up! Lupin! Augh… Sod it.”

SMACK!

Remus awoke with a start, shooting upright on the sofa so quickly, he nearly slammed his forehead into Regulus. Clamping a hand over his throbbing cheek, which now burned from the force of Regulus’ slap, he moaned;

“Blithering fuck—Regulus, did you just hit me?”

“Yes. And do you even know what time it is?” Regulus snarled.

“Time for you to work on your bloody bedside manner, I’d say.”

“It’s past eleven, you nob. Shouldn’t you four be on your way to deliver that tape? Or did you stay up all night working on it for nothing...”

Like shaking off the cobwebs, it took a moment for Remus to understand the gravity of what Regulus was telling him. He looked out over the basement, where his friends had all passed out, empty beer bottles and dinner plates strewn out between them. Horrified, Remus made a grab for Regulus’ wrist, turning it over so he could see his watch.

“Shit… OH SHIT!”

“That godmother of yours called again, by the way,” Regulus told him. “She left a message on the machine. I think she was looking for me.”

“Hope you said hi then,” Remus grunted, “save her the trouble of yelling at me.” He began scrambling for his socks and shoes, which had somehow ended up across the room. As he tugged them on he gave James a gentle tap on either cheek to get him going and eventually they were able to rouse both Sirius and Peter and get them on their feet as well.

“I don’t understand—how could we all have fallen asleep?!” Peter bleated as Remus rushed to free their homemade demo from the Portastudio’s tape deck.

“Who cares? We’ve got thirty fucking minutes to get this tape across the entire city!” Came Sirius, as he desperately attempted to tame the bed head he’d received from falling asleep with his head against the wall.

“I’ll get the van keys,” James said, only to come to a startling halt when Regulus raised the key ring on a single finger. “My hero!” He moaned, before snatching the keys and smacking a fat kiss on Regulus’ forehead. The move startled Regulus horrendously, but not before James had time to smile and disappear up the basement stairs, a quick ‘Thanks darling!’ following him out.

Unwashed, exhausted, and probably a little hungover, the other three Marauders hung close to James’ ankles, racing down to the corner where they could throw themselves into the old Volkswagen van. Poor Peter barely had the side door shut before James was ripping away from the curb.

“Where am I going?” He demanded. “I don’t bloody know where I’m going!”

“Moony—card!”

After struggling with his pocket, Remus reached forward and slapped Spectre’s rumpled business card into Sirius’ palm. “It says Barnsbury,” he told them. “Head toward Fitzrovia, Potter, it’ll be faster!”

James did so, and they whipped along London's Westway for a good while, but when the two lanes inevitably became a one-lane and they found themselves stuck behind a slow-moving milk float, Sirius nearly had a fit.

“For Christ’s sake, Prongs—GO AROUND HIM!”

“And where shall I go, Padfoot—up onto the pavement?! Shall I drive into the row of parked cars? Or I know—is there a magical flying van button on the console that'll I've somehow missed? 'Cause if you could kindly point it out I'd much appreciate it!"

"Shut up!" Remus bellowed. "There's no point in ripping each other's faces off, we'll get there when we—"

But Sirius wasn't listening. From the passenger's side, he'd waited until he saw a gap in the parked cars along the road, then he reached over and grabbed the steering wheel, yanking it to the left. Everyone screamed—including Sirius—and James swerved around the milk float, narrowly avoiding slamming into the back of a taxi parked at a forward taxi rank.

"YOU IDIOT!" James wailed, beating Sirius with one fist and clinging to the steering wheel with the other. "YOU COULD'VE KILLED US!"

"Glory at any cost, Potter!" Sirius cackled.

They made it to North Barnsbury with little more than three minutes to spare, and after the quickest parallel park of James' career, the four Marauders began scurrying down the street with only Spectre's business card to guide them.

"Forty-four," Sirius said, "we're looking for forty-four!"

James counted the addresses; "Twenty-eight, twenty-nine…!"

"Uh, not to be a downer, but we did actually manage to finish the tape, right?" Wheezed Peter. "I can't remember anything after Sirius' sixth 'Hail Mary' overdub."

"No point in worrying now, Pete," Remus told him, with a similar feeling of unease in his gut.

It was quite miraculous that they actually managed to make it on time. They found the studio office on a very fine street, in a building that was made up of several floors and a spectacular amount of windows all interspersed with carved stone columns. The door marked "Number 44" was painted green, with an expensive knob that fell open under their hands like butter. They looked ragged and out of place when compared to the lobby's plush velvet furniture, but the secretary was away from her desk and thankfully no one stopped to question them as they legged it toward the nearest lift.

"Guys, I think I'm gonna vomit," James moaned, bending over at the waist as the lift doors slid shut ahead of them.

Sirius groaned; “You always have to vomit."

“Try some deep breaths, James,” offered Peter.

"Ugh..."

Sirius sniffed the front of his t-shirt. “Moons, do I stink? I feel like I stink… Blimey, I can’t meet Gaz Spectre like this. I smell like a skip bin!”

“Everyone just shut up!” Remus snapped, hands in his hair and fisting it by the root. His stomach seemed to be dropping down a floor for every one the lift went up, and he had to pull the tape from his pocket just to keep his hands busy. On the front was the flat’s address and phone number, and on the backside was the band's track-listing:

MARAUDERS, APRIL 1979

03:14 Downtown Girls
04:37 Hail Mary
02:37 Midnight Dancer
03:22 It’s Hard to Be a Teen
04:03 Doomed Generation

It felt odd to see it spelt out so clearly. Three years of hopes, dreams, and work, all for one tiny tape. Madness, actually.

When the lift's bell dinged to signal their arrival, the doors slid open to reveal a long hallway interspersed with various offices bearing words like ‘management’ or ‘publishing’ or 'communications' on tiny metal plaques. Secretaries fluttered around like moths to a porch light, carrying stacks of paper and fresh pots of coffee and paying them little mind.

Unsure of where else to go, the four Marauders began moving warily down the hall. There they stopped before one of the first offices, where they could overhear someone shouting on the phone. There was a man inside pacing back and forth in front of the desk, practically strangling himself with the telephone cord.

“No—No! Now you listen to me, we paid for that airtime! Mr. Spectre signed a contract with the BBC at the beginning of the year that states —what? … No! Listen… either you put my boys on the air, or you'll be out of a fucking job, right! You wanna know how many names I got working over at your bloody BBC? Enough to—bloody hell… Just—Just hold on…"

They'd been spotted. The man marched over to the door and might've imparted upon them a few choice words not appropriate for one's typical office setting. Only, he had forgotten to set the receiver down, and instead yanked the entire phone right off the desk with a glorious clatter.

"FUCK!" He spun on them; "Would you please—piss off?!"

The door slammed in their faces, each of them leaping back to avoid getting smacked in the face.

"Gee, sounds like someone's having a bad day," mumbled Peter, making all of them crack up.

They found the main office of Spectre Records—unsurprisingly—waiting for them at the very end of the hall. The room smelt of wood and cigarette smoke—not that far off from the musty smell of the catalogue rooms back at the Hawkings library. There were several cubicle-like desks, each taken up by a different office worker and their type-writer. As the chorus of clicking keys filled the air, Remus found himself drawn to the vibrantly-coloured paintings of various rock idols that hung on the walls. They had Jimi Hendrix, and Jim Morrison, and every member of the Beatles.

Across the room, sat what appeared to be the main desk, where a young guy in a black turtleneck was going through a box of files, sorting them into different wire baskets. Behind him sat one final office, with a door bearing a single window made of translucent glass and the name 'Gaz Spectre' written across it in gold letters.

"At least we know we're in the right place," Remus murmured, as the four of them plucked up enough courage to go forward. They were spotted before they even made it to the desk, and the guy looked them up and down with a condescending brow before returning to his files.

"What do you want?" He muttered, clearly not that interested. None of them said anything until Sirius shoved Remus ahead of them like some half-assed sacrifice.

"Er, hi. My name's Remus Lupin, and uh… Mr. Spectre asked me—or–or us to drop off a tape for him. It–It's a demo… for our... band..."

He felt stupid—Why did he always choke at these things?—not that the guy seemed to notice.

“Right,” he said blandly; “Well, you can leave it there with the others.” He gestured languidly at a wire tray sitting atop the desk, already piled high with discarded tapes and envelopes that looked as though they hadn’t been touched in weeks. Seeing them, Remus baulked a bit and glanced dubiously at his friends.

“Sorry, but I think Mr. Spectre meant for me to give it to him directly.”

There was a short chuckle;

“The day Gaz Spectre wants some Woody Guthrie wannabe to hand him anything is the day he promotes me to company director—now if you don’t mind, we here at Spectre Records are very busy. Leave the tape if you want, but please go away.”

“Isn’t there any way we could meet him?” James urged, candidly. “Just for two minutes?”

“Even if I wanted you here for another two minutes, there’d be no point. Mr. Spectre flew out for New York this morning.”

The news was like a punch to the gut, and Remus instantly had his hackles up. It was one thing to stutter, it was another to take a shot lying down.

“He said he wasn't leaving until Wednesday,” he snarled. “We were up all night working on this damn thing. If you could just bloody give it to him then we—”

The guy had slapped the lid onto his filing box.

“Look, you can leave the tape there and go, or you can toss it in the bin for me and I’ll have security throw each of you out onto your rears. Now what’s it gonna be?”

Perhaps it was the lack of sleep, or the fact that he’d promised his friends salvation in the form of Gaz Spectre—whatever it was, Remus was about three seconds away from knocking that smug head off the top of his stupid fucking turtleneck. If not for the grace of Sirius, he might’ve. As it was, Sirius stepped forward and grabbed Remus by the shoulder. Eyes connecting, Sirius gave him a slow, knowing nod as he took the tape and dropped it unceremoniously into the wire basket.

“Thanks for the opportunity, mate,” he said, saluting the other guy before guiding Remus away from his own doom. Retreating back toward the lift, Remus could tell that whatever morale they’d walked in with was already fading. And it was all his fault.

“Now what are we gonna do?” Peter grumbled, as they rode the lift back down to the lobby.

“We’re gonna do exactly what we’ve been doing all along, I suppose,” sighed James. It made Remus want to punch him too.

“How is it you’re always so goddamn optimistic all the time?”

“Would you rather me be all dour and moody like you?” James asked, before reaching up and ruffling the hair at the back of Remus’ skull. “There’ll be other chances. That girl Sybill just got us on to play at the university last week, right?”

He was right, but because Remus wasn’t good like James, he turned around and nudged Sirius.

“You were unnaturally quiet in there.”

“I just figured letting you punch the guy and going to jail wouldn't be as conducive to meeting our goals.” Sirius smiled meekly, then stepped back to wrap his arms around Peter and James’ shoulders. “C’mon, lads, let’s not waste our time on sods like these anymore. We’ve got a wedding to get to.”

The lift bell dinged as they arrived at the ground floor, and all of them nodded respectively, though it was hard not to notice the air of disappointment that followed them out on their heels.

* * *

You’re gonna tell me sweet things,
You’re gonna make my heart sing;
And I’m gonna hear bells ring,
‘Cause I’m gonna love you too, oh!

- “I’m Gonna Love You Too” Blondie, 1978

Wednesday 4th April 1979 - Lottie's Wedding Day…

Sirius banged his fist against the bathroom door.

"Reg, come on, mate! I'm all for having a cheeky wank every now and then but do you think it can wait until after? We have somewhere to be, you know!"

"Fuck off! You did this on purpose!"

"And just how was I supposed to know the cleaners were gonna shrink your suit? Come on, mate… Pal…? Buddy…?!" Another bang. "Shit, Reg—quit being such a whinger! It's too late to go get another suit anyway, so put on those big boy trousers and come on out here like a man!"

"I said, piss—OFF!"

Sirius sighed, shaking his head haplessly, before glancing down at Regulus' ruined suit.

"Did the cleaners really shrink it?" Remus whispered, lifting one of the cuffs.

"Ha—no," Sirius snorted, before lowering his voice. "I paid the tailor to take it in a few inches in the chest and sleeves." He turned the jacket over, showing off the fresh seams. "Can't very well wear a suit that doesn't fit, now can he?"

Remus scoffed, dropping the cuff and mouthing; You're evil.

Sirius winked. Then he banged his fist against the bathroom door a few more times.

"C'mooooooan, Reg! Let's see the suit! You and I are blood—I know it looks good."

The door flew open, nearly taking off the tip of Sirius' nose. As he leapt out of the way, Regulus Black stormed out wearing none other than a powder blue suit, complete with a ruffled jabot collar and matching white loafers. Sirius had clearly outdone himself on the spectacular get up, but the look on his brother's face did not appear to be all that grateful.

"You know, I think I like it," said Remus. "You look like Bowie."

He and Sirius shared a cheeky glance, and then both burst out laughing as Regulus began to seethe.

“Oh, shut up,” he snarled, tugging viciously at the collar. “You two are really taking the piss if you think I’m wearing this out in public. I look like if Liberace and a tube of toothpaste had a baby.”

“Don’t be so dramatic,” Sirius scoffed. “It doesn’t even have rhinestones. If you really want to look like Liberace, you should try this.”

With a flourish, Sirius tossed him what appeared to be a plain black silk jacket. The suit might’ve been alright, if it weren’t for the embroidered inferno of bedazzled red flames and ostrich feathers zipping up its back.

“I cannot believe you wear this shit out in public," Regulus spat, throwing the suit aside with all the rest.

“Don’t be silly. Most of the time I just put it on and give Moony little fashion shows while he sits on the bed in the nude.”

"It's very breathy on the bits," Remus agreed, slouching back on their bed. Regulus scowled at him.

“I don’t even know why I have to go to this bloody wedding. It’s not like it’s my friend who’s decided to get married at eighteen.”

“You have to go because we’re going,” Sirius said, reaching forward to straighten out his brother's shoulder sleeves for him. “Can't very well sit around here by yourself all day, I won't allow it. Now Lottie’s been kind enough to invite you, so let's put on a brave face and go show everyone how spectacular you look in my clothes."

"One day, Sirius... One day I will strangle you."

Just then the bedroom door opened, and James strolled in wearing full black-tie. “Hey lads, just about ready to—CRICKEY! Wow, Regulus, you look great!”

For a moment Remus thought he could see steam coming out of Regulus’ ears. Shoving Sirius’ hands down, he bolted for the bathroom and slammed the door after himself. It made James baulk a bit, but by then Sirius was already hammering his fist on the door again.

“What the bloody hell are you doing now? It’s only Pot—”

“PISS OFF!”

It took some finessing, but eventually Sirius did manage to get Regulus out of the bathroom. He was not pleased to know that the rest of them would be wearing black, but didn’t have much other choice; Sirius was the only one closest to his size, and the only one with a spare suit at home.

By the time the car arrived, each of them was freshly showered and dressed, with their hair combed and faces neatly shaved—on Lily’s orders, of course. The ceremony was being held in a lovely church just outside St Albans, with the reception set to commence at a nearby country club straight after.

As they were arriving, Remus spotted Dorcas talking to one of James’ cousins in the church’s atrium. Rather than a dress, she had opted for a deep emerald pantsuit, with a fashionable neckline flared hem. She waved when she noticed them, and broke away from her previous conversation with ease.

“Nice suit, Meadowes,” said Sirius.

“You too.” Dorcas began fiddling with one of her earrings. “Blimey, has anyone got anything to drink? If I’m to spend the next six hours surrounded by this many rich old white people, I should think I’d need to be pissed first.”

They didn’t, it being a church, and Sirius smirked as he wrapped an arm around her.

“Hang in there, love. Plenty of time to get pissed later. And hey, I think the wine’s kosher too!”

Moving from the atrium and into the nave of the church, they passed several ushers handing out ceremony programs, as well as those waiting to escort the few older guests to their seats. Despite their close personal proximity to the bride, the only task the four Marauders had been given was to show up and make sure Peter made it through his reception speech, though that in itself was proving harder than anticipated.

“I dunno…” Peter stammered, as they filed further into the church with the other guests. He turned to look at Moira on his arm; “M–Maybe Simeon should do it, after all.”

"Don't say that, Petey."

“Yeah, isn’t Sim already doing the best man speech?” Sirius drawled. “You know, since Roger doesn’t have any friends of his own? You’d think that’d be ten times worse.”

Moira glared while Peter’s shoulders slumped, but it was James who leaned in with encouragement;

“Ignore him, Pete. Lottie asked you to give a speech because there’s no one else in the world she’d rather have speak at her wedding than her twin brother.”

“You don’t know that, maybe she asked me and I said no,” Sirius snarked, earning himself a sharp flick to the ear from Dorcas. He sighed then nodded at Peter; “Don’t know what you’re worrying for, Wormy, you’re gonna do great. Hell, you’ve been practising that speech of yours for days now.”

“Sirius is right,” said Remus. “Lottie’s going to love it.”

Peter nodded, albeit apprehensively, and just then Mrs. Potter came rushing up the aisle.

“Oh, boys, there you are!” She chirped, holding a hand to her chest and looking beautiful in a burgundy silk gown. “Petey, your mother’s still with the girls, but here’s your buttonhole. Take it and go to the back of the church with the other groomsmen, Simeon will help you pin it on.”

Nodding quickly, Peter took the little flower pin and shot back the way they’d come, leaving Mrs. Potter behind to catch her breath.

“Busy morning, Mum?” James asked.

“You have no idea.” She sighed and cupped her son’s cheek dotingly. “I do hope that you’ll give me more than just three months’ notice when you decide to get married.”

“Does this mean you’ve already popped the question, Potter?” Dorcas mused. “I should let Lily know.”

“Lay off, Meadowes,” James squeaked, obviously embarrassed.

“It's lucky for me, really,” chuckled Mrs. Potter. “Poor Jenny’s been barely sleeping, what with all the work it’s taken to get everything ready for today. She’s just lucky her daughter isn’t a pickier bride.”

“Well, I think it looks great,” Sirius said, turning his head to admire the church. “Whoever did the flowers bloody knew what they were doing. Moony, what do you think? Blue or yellow flowers for ours?”

“I think you’re lucky to have not burst into flames walking in here, Black.”

Smiling, Effie reached over and pinched Remus’ cheeks. “Oh, honestly! You boys get more handsom every time I see you. Remus, you’re as tall as a weed, and Sirius, your hair is truly a feat. And—And, who is this?”

They all came to attention at once, most of all Regulus, who Effie had stopped to stare at as though she were already dazzled. Adversely, Regulus looked as though he were ready to leap behind one of the pews, though that didn’t stop Sirius from reaching over and wrapping a proud arm around his shoulders.

“Mum, I'd like you to meet Regulus, my brother,” he announced. “Handsome tosser came as a spare. Bit last minute, but he cleans up well, right?”

“Regulus,” Effie echoed, breathlessly. “I’m so pleased you could come. And that we're finally meeting—oh!" She covered her face, and then her heart. "Monty and I have heard so much about you.”

Regulus dipped his eyes. “It's good to meet you as well, ma’am...”

“Are you here for long, dear?"

"He's not sure yet," Sirius answered, peering proudly at his brother. "He's on holiday from school. Couldn't resist coming to see his big brother in action."

Regulus glared at him, but Effie didn't seem to notice. Instead she clapped her hands together happily, making the bracelets on her wrists jingle.

"We should have you over to the house if there’s time, see about supper. Have you ever had kadhi? Do you like chutney? Sirius hates anything spicy, but I've hope yet. How about you?"

James slapped Regulus on the back fondly. “Hey, Mum’s a great cook!” He told him. “She can make anything—whatever you want! She’s brilliant with puddings too. She makes these magas for Diwali that just melt in your mouth.”

Regulus opened his mouth nervously, but before he could answer, Effie had grasped both him and Sirius by the cheek.

“My, the resemblance is uncanny, isn’t it?” She marvelled, turning their faces this way and that. “No mistaking you for brothers, that’s for sure.”

“He gets it all from me,” Sirius preened, turning to press a fat kiss on Regulus’ cheek.

Just then Mr. Potter arrived, along with a throng of other attendees. He informed them that the ceremony was set to start in a few minutes and that they should find their seats, which were toward the front of the church, on the bride’s side. As they were sitting, Mr. Potter turned to Regulus and smiled.

“I must say, that is a strapping suit, young man.”

For a wedding that’d been tossed together in only a few short months, the ceremony really was beautiful. Remus had never been to a wedding, and after Sirius’ multiple assurances that most of them were merely dull, tedious affairs, he hadn’t been expecting much. Lily and the girls looked spectacular when they walked down the aisle in their dusty pink bridesmaids’ dresses. Lily walked arm-in-arm with one of Roger’s younger cousins while Peter walked with Marlene, who was only slightly hindered by the extra three inches her high-heels had allotted her. After that came Simeon with Mary, who seemed pleased as punch with the man she’d found on her arm.

Finally it was the bride’s turn.

Not even the white veil could hide Lottie's smile as she began her descent down the aisle. The dress she'd chosen somewhat resembled a very puffy cake, but Mr. Pettigrew was too busy blubbering to notice how it snagged on the end of every other church pew as he gave her away. Roger had been rocking anxiously on the spot since the start of the ceremony, though luckily for him, it didn't appear as though his soon-to-be wife held any of the same reservations. Lottie strutted straight up onto the dais, and when the priest declared that it was time for the groom to kiss his bride, it was she who reached first, grabbing Roger by the front of his suit jacket and practically dipping him herself.

Lottie's bold declaration of love had set the tone for the rest of the evening. Just a short four minute drive from the church was the country club the Pettigrews’ had booked for the reception. Walking in,

Remus found a grand ballroom made up with several tables clothed in white linen. Stone columns held up the grand ceiling, each wrapped in swathes of white and blue flowers and crystal chandeliers hang overhead, reflecting off the lights like a million tiny disco balls. It was warm for April, and thankfully did not start to rain until most of the guests were inside. There they mingled, and soon Remus discovered that Dorcas was not the only of their friends to be invited.

Just ahead of supper, Remus had popped off to use the loo. On his way back he stopped by the cloakroom to fetch his lighter from his jacket pocket, only to run into Andy and Ted Tonks as they wandered in, looking the same as they had back on Christmas.

“I feel terrible for missing the ceremony,” Andy moaned, after rushing to embrace him. “It was so nice of Lottie to invite us, but Ted had work and of course Dora just had to throw a fit when we were about to leave. The invitation did say we could bring her, but…”

“But nothing,” said Ted. “Could you even imagine Dora at a wedding? She’d just as likely set something on fire. Now which way’s the open bar, Lupin? S’only reason I came.”

“That’s what I get for eloping,” Andy scoffed, shooting her husband a playful glare. “Do try and behave yourself, darling, at least until we congratulate Lottie and Roger. Have you seen them, Remus?"

"Head table."

They turned, and were almost through the door when Remus called out again;

“Uh, Andy—hold on a second! I think there’s someone you might want to see first…”

By now the ballroom was flush with guests of all sorts, all mingling and vying to give Lottie and Roger their congrats. A large table along the back wall had been dedicated to the collection of the couple’s opulent gifts, and waiters kept coming and going from the kitchen bearing trays of champagne and canapés. They found Regulus sitting at their table with Sirius behind him, an arm locked around his baby brother's neck. The pair seemed to be mid-argument, and though Sirius was laughing and Regulus appeared to be holding his own well-enough, Lily and Mary had still come down from their bridal table to fight in Regulus’ defence.

“Oh, Sirius, really!” Lily groaned. “Let him go!”

“Yeah, this is a wedding, not a boxing ring,” huffed Moira. “Why don’t you pick on someone your own size!”

“He is my own size!” Sirius grinned. “In fact, I’m pretty sure the cheeky blighter’s taller than me now! I’m—nghh—I’m just doing my due diligence as a big brother and—ngh! Hold still, Reg—reminding him where he sits on the food chain!”

Regulus clung to Sirius’ arm, attempting to throw him off. When that didn’t work, he scrambled for one of the table forks and raised it threateningly above him, mere inches from his brother’s eye. This got Sirius to back off. Releasing him, he creased up with laughter until James came up from behind and grabbed him round the neck as well.

“You gonna impede on Edge’s honour like that, Black?! Well, how ‘bout I give you a taste of your own medicine!?”

The girls laughed as Sirius received his just deserts, but Regulus only appeared red-faced and frazzled. He pulled at the edge of his ruffled collar, finally noticing Andy as she surged toward him from across the room. The hug she gave him when she landed was twice as fierce as Sirius' headlock, and nearly had Regulus toppling from his chair.

“Regulus! Oh, it's really you!”

“An–Andromeda!" Regulus spluttered, practically eating her hair. "What are you doing here?!”

“They—were—invited!” Sirius grunted, finally peeling himself free of James’ bicep. “Dammit, Potter, you trying to kill me?”

James shrugged. “What’s a wedding without a few near-misses?”

“I’ll remember that when it’s you who’s getting hitched!”

No one seemed to be paying attention to them anymore; with her arms still encircling her cousin, Andy whipped around and called out to Ted.

“Ted! Ted—ohmygod—Ted, it’s Regulus!”

“Is it?”

Ted went to join them, and the entire time Andy spent introducing them, Regulus just appeared dazed. Remus had never had any cousins, so he couldn’t really relate, but he thought that if someone as wonderful as Andromeda appeared out of thin air just to tell him how happy she was to see him again, he'd be a bit speechless too.

Glancing down at the drink in his hand, Remus just about missed it when Marlene hobbled up behind him, complaining of sore feet.

"Rough night, Cherry?"

"It's these bloody shoes," Marlene moaned, gesturing to the high-heels she'd been forced to wear throughout the ceremony. "It's like walking on an ice pick. I'm already a giant on my own, do I really need to be risking broken ankles too?"

"You could just take them off," he suggested. "It's a long dress, I'm sure no one would notice."

"Mary would notice. And she's even worse than Lottie—you should've seen her this morning, practically had to fight her off when she came at me with a pair of knickers the size of a baby's fist. Have you ever had to wear a girdle, Remus?"

"Surprisingly, no."

"Lucky bastards, all of you. Ugh—shit… Think I could get Sirius to trade shoes with me?"

"Maybe, but I reckon he'd have to be a lot drunker first." Smiling, Remus offered her his arm. "Shall I escort you to your table for supper, Miss McKinnon."

"Oh, yes please."

Remus had never heard a wedding toast done before, nor was he expecting so many tears. Mary was having to hand Lottie tissues by the handful, and after Mr. Pettigrew's speech there was hardly a dry eye in the room. This was promptly rectified by Simeon, who spun a story of a five year-old Lottie who'd come with a bullfrog she'd insisted was her Prince Charming that left everyone in stitches. Even Roger's parents made a speech, in which his mother projected his and Lottie's baby photos on the wall for everyone to 'ooh' and 'awe' at.

Finally it was Peter's turn. With everyone having already cried and laughed and awed, Remus could tell he was feeling the pressure. After wiping his palms on his trousers, Peter stepped up to the tiny microphone and cleared his throat.

“Hello, every—”

A sharp ring of feedback echoed through the hall, so loud it was almost comical. While all the guests winced and Moira covered her mouth, Remus and the others continued to watch anxiously from their table. Next to him, Sirius began muttering desperately under his breath;

“C’mon, Wormy. You can do it, mate, just a few words...”

When silence returned, the remaining three Marauders waited with bated breath for Peter to say something—anything.

“Right... So I’m Peter, b-brother to the bride and all that, but you probably knew that already…"

A few limp chuckles echoed from around the room, the loudest of which coming from James. It wasn't much, but after glancing toward his friends and receiving a thumbs up from almost all of them, Peter sighed, and finally crumpled his treasured speech paper in his hands.

"I’m not really one for speeches," he said into the microphone, more confidently than before; "In fact I'm not really one for public speaking at all. I nearly took Physics just to get out of it at school, but I figure I know at least one half of this lovely couple pretty well, so might as well give it a go.”

“Yeah, Pete!” Sirius whooped, prompting a few others to laugh and clap in support. At the head table, Lottie smiled and leaned into Roger’s shoulder. It took another second for Peter to gather his wits, but then he glanced at his sister and Lottie smiled, nodding him on.

Remus knew then that he’d be okay.

“You know, whenever anyone asks me when the best time of my life was, I always give 'em the same answer.” Peter paused to clear his throat; “September 21st, 1960, about four forty-five in the morning. Absolute shit time for my mum, but during those few minutes when Lottie was out and I had the whole womb to myself? Yeah… best fourteen minutes of my life.”

Everyone laughed—thank Christ—and Sirius gave another sharp wolf-whistle from their table.

“That was the last bit of peace and quiet I ever got. It's been nothing but talk-talk-talk ever since. But don't get me wrong, I love my sister!

Love her to death… Like literally, I could kill her sometimes. But she's always been there for me, like the time she let her gerbil get into the vents at our gran's house. I climbed in to get the bastard, only I got stuck and we had to wait for our dad to get back to help. Well, eventually Lottie got bored so she ended up going out for ice cream with a friend."

"That was me!" Mary exclaimed.

"—Yeah, thanks, Mary. They brought me back a Mr. Whippy with a flake though, so can't complain really... But then there was the time Lottie convinced me that boys got periods too, and that mine was late and I should be embarrassed! So get this, to fix it she told me to put ketchup on napkins and leave 'em in the bin as evidence of my 'manhood'. This went on for about six months—Yeah! Six whole months! Pretty sure the boys thought I was dying."

James leaned over and smacked Sirius. "You owe me five pounds."

More laughter from the tables closest to them, and then Mrs. Potter was shushing everyone.

"Lottie is important to me," Peter finished; "She's not just my sister, she's my twin—my literal other half, if you wanna get technical. I can't imagine a world without her where any of this shit works out for me. So to my sister, thanks for not eating me in the womb. To our Mum—thanks for making us both, and sorry for cursing. And to Lottie's new husband, Rog, please take care of her. Make her happy, in… Well, whatever she wants, really. 'Cause if you don't, I'm pretty sure she'll just make it happen without you. Like my dad used to say—it's Lottie's world, and we're just living in it."

The applause was grand, and when Lottie got up to hug her brother, she held on for a very long time. Afterwards, with the speeches done with and supper eaten, the happy couple cut their cake, and the rest of the night opened ahead of them like the final chapter of a good book. Lottie looked like a princess during her and Roger's first dance, and when the floor cleared to include everyone, the girls surged to join her. They'd hired a live band for the event, as well as a professional wedding singer who went by the name of Roy G. Lockman. The sod wasn't completely tone deaf, just a yuppy blonde who had more interest in flirting with the guests than doing his job. More than once Remus caught him staring down at his shoes mid-song, gyrating his hips as though he were trying to make love with the floor. It didn't occur to Remus until later that the dance floor was made up of mirrors, and Roy was essentially staring at his reflection the entire time.

“I think it’s sort of great we’re not playing,” Sirius said, as he and Remus watched Roy begin what was his third Rod Stewart song in a row. “ ‘Least this way we can get as drunk as we want. Don’t have to worry about sounding sloppy!”

“You’re always sloppy, Padfoot.”

Sirius rolled his tongue, then looked at him sideways. “Wanna dance, Moons?”

“Maybe later.”

“But you promised.”

“Did not. Go dance with Mary.”

"Can't. She's already got a partner."

It was true. Across the dance floor, Simeon had Mary by the hips, spinning her loosely in time with the music. The two of them made a rather handsome couple, though they were not the only ones. Smiling ear-to-ear, Mr. Potter had gathered his wife by the arm and led her out onto the dance floor the first chance he got; the pair of them laughing and kissing each other's cheeks as though they were teenagers.

"Come onnnn, Moony. I won't even make you waltz!"

"Sorry, Padfoot, but Remus Lupin does not dance. You'll just have to find someone else. Maybe Moira'll give it a go."

"Now that's just being cruel." Sirius sighed irritably. “Fine then. If you're not going to dance you can at least make yourself useful and get me another drink.”

For that, Remus had no argument. Over by the bar, he found Regulus waiting on a drink of his own, looking annoyed and regretfully out of place in his blue suit.

“What’d you order?” Remus asked, having to raise his voice to be heard over the music and Roy’s near-constant bleating.

“Tom Collins,” Regulus yelled back.

“Oh, very manly, that.”

“My dad used to order them all the time.”

The smile on Remus’ face wavered, and he called out to the barman; “Two more Tom Collins!”

“Shouldn’t you be out there?” Regulus asked, jutting his chin toward the mass of frolicking bodies. “Don’t tell me my brother is sitting out.”

“Nope.” Remus pointed to the middle of the crowd, where Sirius and Lily were now dancing with their arms around each other. It made Regulus raise a brow.

“You let him dance with other girls?”

“Why not? It's only Lily." Remus paused, gauging the reaction. "Should he not be dancing with Lily...?"

"I don't care who he dances with," Regulus answered blandly. Remus had no time to think up a reply; the drinks had arrived.

"Lily's got a boyfriend, you know," Remus hummed, picking up his.

"Yeah, Potter. And?"

"I was just making sure you knew... She and James have been together for—like, three years now."

"Does this conversation have a point, Lupin?"

Remus forced a smile; "Nope," and then reached over to clink his glass against Regulus'. The band was still playing Rod Stewart, and Remus glanced back in time to watch as Sirius twirled Lily around and dipped her.

‘Tonight’s the night!
It’s gonna be alright,
‘Cause I love you girl,
Ain't nobody gonna stop us now…’

“Ugh. Does that idiot know how to sing anything else?” Regulus snapped, clearly not impressed with the chosen repertoire.

“What, don’t tell me you don’t like a little Rod Stewart, Edge?”

He wasn't expecting a big rebuttal, but when Regulus didn't respond at all, Remus was disappointed.

"Regulus, what are you staring at?"

He got his answer when he spotted James sprinting toward them from the sea of tables, his eyes wild and giddy. He had a drink in his hand that he nearly split as he rushed them, but stopped a few feet short when he realised he'd found who he was looking for.

"Moony! Moony—Moony—Moony—you'll never believe what just happened!"

"What is it?"

James set a hand upon his shoulder. "Pete just went up against his dad. They were arguing over the band, and Pete told him he could take his opinion and shove it up his arse."

"Really? Peter said that?"

"Uh-huh! Says that it's his life, and he's gonna do what he wants with it. Even if it means following us into hell!"

James said this last bit very passionately, in a tone that could only make Remus smile.

"I should like to be in hell," he grinned; "At least that means we've gotten somewhere."

James laughed, then nodded in agreement. "Doubt this is the last we hear of it, but still, our boy Petey's done it!"

"So Pettigrew's got a spine after all," Regulus said, swishing his drink around in its glass. James tapped him jovially, which made Regulus flinch away.

"Peter's always had courage," James insisted, "when it counts." He leaned into the bartender to order, and after the man turned away, stole several garnish olives from the small glass on the counter. "Olive?"

"No, thanks," Regulus said, rebuffing the offer.

"Ooh. Picky."

"I'm not picky, I just happen to not like olives!"

James shrugged, popping the olive into his mouth. “Suit yourself,” he said, then; "Lily hates them too."

Regulus bristled quietly, only enough for Remus to notice. James, meanwhile, was already collecting his drink and patting Remus on the arm.

“Alright, Moony, where’s Sirius? Bet he'll love congratulating Pete for telling his dad to piss off.”

“Dance floor. With your girlfriend actually.”

Remus gestured toward the front of the hall, where Sirius and Lily were still swinging each other around by the hips. Another Rod Stewart song had started to play, this one faster than the last. The upbeat tempo succeeded in getting most people out of their seats—even the old guests looking to feel young again. Sex just had that power over people.

‘If you want my body and you think I’m sexy,
Come on, sugar, let me know!
If you really need me, just reach out and touch me,
Come on, honey, tell me so!’

This was something Sirius could dance to. He swung Lily around happily, the pair of them shaking their waists back and forth in double-time. Next to them, Dorcas and Marlene stood on the edge of the dance floor, hands clasped as they spun around each other. They weren’t dancing any more suggestively than the song demanded, but they held each other close and kept hands on each other’s face and body, same as any other couple.

Only, they were both women of course.

“Really, it’s just deplorable!”

The voice came as a shrill squeak, like air escaping from a balloon. James had spotted them first, as it was, and scowled at the two old women like he could send them into hospice with the mere force of his glare.

“It’s unnatural,” one was saying. “Don’t they have any shame?”

“It’s disgusting, is what it is,” the other squawked. “No decency at all.

If this were my daughter's wedding, I'd have them thrown out on their rears."

"Wicked old bats," Regulus muttered, glowering down at his drink. Across from him and Remus, James was still staring icily at the women, a single olive now crushed in his tight grip. Finally he spun back around to face them.

"Does anyone feel like a dance?"

Remus' mouth fell open, then he raised his and Sirius' drinks haplessly. It left Regulus, who Remus was pretty sure would have rather glued himself to a chair for the rest of the night. But this was James Potter they were talking to, and those were his friends out there.

"Just one dance!" He urged, abandoning his drink on the bar top and taking Regulus by the hand. He left no time for argument, though Regulus did spare Remus a horrified look as James began dragging him in the direction of the girls. Both Marlene and Dorcas threw their arms up when they joined them, eager to integrate the boys into their suggestive bump and grind. Unwilling to touch either of them, Regulus remained stiff, practically standing in place as the others swayed around him. This might've been an issue for any other partner, except James was fluid enough for the both of them. He slid an arm around Regulus' shoulders and made him shimmy, and even when Regulus was pushing him away, James was smiling.

'If you want my body and you think I'm sexy,
Come on, sugar, let me know!
If you really need me, just reach out and touch me,
Come on, honey, tell me so!'

Down the bar, the pair of women looked appalled.

Remus didn't give them a chance.

"I'd be careful if I were you," he called, setting aside his empty drink; "I hear jealousy gives you wrinkles, and well—don't suppose you ladies can afford any more of those."

He strode away, leaving them aghast, and found Sirius looking for him by their table. He'd just handed him his drink when Simeon appeared, planting a kiss on both their cheeks. After listening to the bitter women, it almost made Remus laugh.

“There you are—" and he dropped his voice; "If it ain't my favourite little queers!”

“Hey, Sim,” Sirius grinned, sipping his Tom Collins. “Loved your speech.”

“Thanks. But we both know Petey’s blew mine out of the water. He always was the more genuine one.” Simeon leaned back on the edge of the table, pulling out a cigarette which Remus leaned forward to light for him. “God, how is it you two have grown up even more since Christmas?"

"It's the beard," Sirius said, rubbing his decidedly hairless jaw.

Simeon smiled, pointing his cigarette at them. "So how's life been treating you, boys?"

"It'd be better if Moony let me hit it more than twice a week."

Remus smacked him. "Fuck off."

"What? You think Sim's interested in anything else?"

Remus pinched his nose bridge. "How's Oxford, Sim?"

Simeon exhaled, the smoke drifting up around his head. "Shit, I hate that question."

"Oh. Sorry..."

"Nah, nah, it's not you, Lupin. It's just what everyone asks. 'How's school', 'how're your classes', 'have you decided on law or business—business or law'... It's just a bit crap."

"Maybe you should drop out," Sirius said frankly. "Bet you'd be a great model in Japan or something."

Simeon smirked, pointing at Sirius again as though he were onto something. "You two," he chuckled; "You two were like my little passion project, y’know? Only for a few minutes granted, but alas—I still remember how lost Lupin looked when he came to me on New Year’s.”

“That was almost two years ago,” Remus scoffed.

“Even time cannot touch a memory like that, pet. As far as I’m concerned, you’re little more than babes in the basket.”

“Does that mean you’re done trying to get into Moony’s trousers?” Sirius snarked. Remus scoffed at him too, but Simeon only shrugged snidely.

“For now. But he’s got a whole life to live. I’ll be impressed if you two can hang on to each other forever.”

“Yeah, right. You’re just tired of being the one who has to stick it in.” He made a rude gesture, and Simeon threw his head back and laughed, smacking one hand along the table’s edge.

“Both funny,” he said after; “You suit each other. Almost makes me nostalgic.”

“Sim, are you drunk already?” Remus asked.

“It’s a wedding, and it ain’t mine—‘course I’m drunk!” Simeon knocked his cigarette ash onto an empty plate. “Though, I’ll likely be even drunker at my own, if it ever happens…” He sighed wistfully, then crushed the cigarette onto the plate entirely and jumped to his feet. “Listen to me mope—gonna miss the bouquet toss!”

Not long after, the crowd cleared as Lottie took her place at the front of the dance floor and all the girls rushed to line up behind her. Sirius played at joining in a few times before finally being pushed into the fray by Dorcas, but it was Lily who came up victorious. She spun around, bouquet in hand and red hair flying, and found James’ eyes from across the room. Everyone in the general vicinity began to give him a hard time for it, teasing over when they should be saving the date. He was a good sport though, and afterwards, strode straight up to Lily and gave her a kiss big enough to leave her blushing for the rest of the night.

Remus looked around, and found Regulus standing next to Andy and Ted as they clapped, his expression unreadable.

“You still owe me that dance! Scratch that—two dances!” Sirius demanded, a few hours and several drinks later. But before he could drag Remus out onto the dance floor, the bride herself appeared and took Remus by the arm.

“Sorry, borrowing this one for a bit!”

Lottie led him upstairs, onto one of the balconies that overlooked the ballroom. They could still clearly hear the music from up above, though it seemed as though Roy the wedding singer had finally run out of Rod Stewart songs to sing.

“Bollocks, I could’ve sworn there was a toilet up here,” Lottie grumbled. “Well, whatever. We can do it right here.”

“You’re not going to ask me to hold your hair or something while you vomit, are you? Because I tried that once for Mary and she never let me hear the end of it.”

“No, better! Now will you undo me?”

She spun around, offering him the back of her dress. Hesitating at first, Remus eventually leaned down and began fumbling with all of the tiny satin-covered buttons. He wondered why she didn’t just ask one of the girls for help—they were always going to the bathroom in packs back at school—and got his answer when Lottie turned back around, her hands pressed to the front of her dress.

“You’re not going to believe it,” she gushed, before promptly yanking the dress’s neckline down below her chest.

“WAH—Lottie!” Remus gasped, turning his face away. “I may be slightly drunk but I’m pretty sure it’s a faux pas to start cheating on your wedding night!”

“It’s not my entire tit, you ninny, now open your eyes!”

He did so—sceptical—and found himself staring down at the top part of Lottie’s breast. Then he saw it.

“Is that…?”

“A bap tattoo!” Lottie exclaimed, pushing her chest up further as though it might help him see. “Just like Janis Joplin, don’t you remember? We talked about it in year eleven. I know it was ages ago… but back then you said that we should do things for ourselves, and not just for others. Well, it took me a few years, but I did it!”

Remus was blown away. In all honesty, he’d forgotten the interaction, but seeing Lottie with the tiny little heart tattooed on the side of her breast brought it all back again.

“Lottie, it… It looks amazing.”

“You really think so?”

“Very you.” Remus nodded. “Have you shown Roger?”

“No, I’m not a slag!” She smiled, tugging her dress back up into place. “He’ll see it tonight though. And if he doesn’t like it, Daddy’s keeping a set of divorce papers in his desk back home.”

“No way he'd divorce you over a little tattoo."

"You never know. I remember how glad Sirius was to see yours."

Remus smiled bashfully, touching the spot on his chest where he knew Lily's initials were hidden just beneath his clothes. "He keeps talking about getting one of his own,” he confessed. “Some days I’m afraid he’ll just go out and do it.”

Lottie turned around and offered him the back of her dress, drawing her curls onto one shoulder for him. “What’s so wrong with that?”

“You know Sirius, he won’t stop until he’s covered head-to-toe.”

“You’re probably right on the money, there.”

As it turned out, the delicate little buttons were a lot harder to do-up than they were to do-down. Remus stood there cursing for many minutes, until his back was starting to twinge from leaning over far enough to reach them.

“How have you been, really?” Lottie asked eventually. “I feel like it’s been forever since I’ve seen you.”

“Good.” He was nearing the top now, only a few buttons left; “We recorded that demo—finally. And Lily got us a gig playing at her university next week.”

“I heard about that. Sorry I can’t come along. Rog and I are spending four weeks in Spain for our honeymoon.”

“So you’ll be putting all those Spanish lessons to good use then?”

“Si, claro,” she replied sarcastically. “I’ve forgotten everything. I’m forcing Roger to listen to my old books on tape with me. Ask Lily to take some photos of the show, will you?”

“Will do. Here’s hoping it’s not a pathetic turnout. I think Sirius’ll try pitching himself off the roof if we end up playing to only ourselves again."

Lottie giggled; "And will… Regulus be there?"

"Should be. He and Sirius haven't really talked about when he'll be going back. After Easter, I reckon."

"Right, right… He and Sirius certainly seem to be getting along. I'm glad he came tonight."

"Me too."

Lottie hummed quietly, carding her fingers through her hair. "It's a funny thing, having brothers," she said. "Some days—like today, for example—you just love them so much you could burst from it. And others… well, it's all you can do not to throttle 'em."

"Yup."

"So how's your brother, Remus?"

Admittedly, most days Remus forgot to give Lottie credit for her own cleverness. She had a subtle way of prying the truth from you that he'd never witnessed in anyone else. You never expected her to be listening, and yet she always was; it was exactly how she'd guessed the truth about him and Sirius in the first place. Now, over a year later, her question hit him like a train going a hundred kilometres per hour. It took all his concentration just to fasten the last button, and when he was finished she turned around again, staring at him with those big blue eyes.

"Remus, you know Petey and I fight all the time. Like, all of the time —sometimes I could bash his face into the pavement! … But he's my brother, and I love him. I know you and Tomny are still on the outs— Lily's been keeping me up to date, you see. But seeing Regulus here with Sirius tonight, it occurred to me what a miracle that was! Like, I never thought I'd see the day when those two could reconcile their differences."

"It didn't happen overnight," Remus griped. Lottie smiled at him for it, and it was sad.

"I know you and I haven't really spoken since Christmas," she said softly, "but I don't think you're giving yourself enough credit, love. And I just think that if Regulus could forgive his brother, and Sirius could forgive him back, then there's got to be hope for you and Tomny too."

His first instinct was to be angry with her. Angry at her bold assumptions, at the way she so easily pried her way into his life, despite the fact that they'd only ever been friends by association in the first place. I don't have a brother, he'd shout; You don't know what you're talking about! If he was really my brother he would've come for me by now! He would've picked up the phone!

But then he remembered what he'd done, and all Remus felt was shame.

"Don't be sad, darling," Lottie told him, reaching up to cup his cheeks. "Maybe it's the married woman in me, but it could just be time to forgive and forget."

He refused to let her see him cry, but he did let her hug him. All five feet of her—more if you counted the hair. By the time Sirius appeared, strolling down the hallway behind them with a glass of champagne in either hand, Remus was past the threat of tears.

"LLLLLLLottie! … You still trying to steal my man? Don't make me tell Roger…"

Remus straightened up, while Lottie placed one hand on her hip.

"Sirius Black, I do believe you're drunk."

"I'm not drunk, you're just sober," Sirius said, passing them both a champagne flute. "Why is that, by the way? It's your wedding night—shouldn't you be getting absolutely pissed?"

"I can't get pissed tonight," Lottie retorted. "It's mine and Roger's first night tonight together, I have to take care of myself if I don't want to look completely revolting."

Sirius' mouth dropped open. "No way. You mean you and Roger have really never…?"

"Not all of us have to rely on our bodies to attract potential mates, Black."

"Is that what you were doing then? Attracting my mate with your body?"

"Don't be jealous." Lottie crossed her arms, looking snidely up at Remus. “I was only showing Remus everything he’s missing.”

“Har-har,” Sirius drawled, sucking his teeth as he took back the champagne. “In that case you should know that dear Roger and all his groomsmen were talking about taking a dip in that pond out front—y’know, the one with the golf balls and all the duck shit? Yeah, suh’spect it was those six bottles of Jack that did ‘em in.”

With a huff and a curse, Lottie picked up the hem of her dress and began marching back down the hallway. Far below in the ballroom, the music had begun to slow, effectively clearing the dance floor of everyone save the more romantic couples. Remus recognised the song, probably thanks to Marlene; Bloody Bee Gees.

‘I know your eyes in the morning sun,
I feel you touch me in the pouring rain;
And the moment that you wander far from me,
I wanna feel you in my arms again…’

Sirius raised a hand, looking at him slyly. “Nice try. You still owe me that dance, Moons.”

Remus looked around. They were alone on the balcony, too high up for anyone below them to have any hope of spying.

"Might as well."

After tipping back the champagne and finishing it in a single go, Remus set the glass aside. Then he took Sirius’ hands, smiling quietly as the two of them began to sway in the middle of the hallway. He let Sirius lead, same as every other time, and the two of them stayed like that for a long while.

“Who would’a thought it, huh?” Sirius mumbled after a while. “Lottie, a born-again virgin. Not slut-shaming! I’ve always admired that tenacity of hers...”

“Love makes you do crazy things, I suppose.”

Sirius hummed, his arms tightening around Remus’ waist.

‘Cause we're living in a world of fools,
Breaking us down when they all should let us be;

We belong to you and me…'

"Have you ever thought about it… Getting married?"

Sirius' voice was small, almost a whisper. Remus leaned his chin against his hair.

"Not really… Have you?"

"Only when I'm feeling sorry for myself."

It surprised him for some reason. Perhaps because they'd never really talked about such a thing. They had their rings... each other. Why should some stingy official have to declare them wed for them to mean something? For Remus, it was enough to just get to stay by Sirius' side.

"Would you want to?" He asked, a part of him reluctant. "If we could…?"

Sirius didn't answer at first.

'And you may not think I care for you,
When you know down inside that I really do;
And it's me you need to show—
How deep is your love?'

"Maybe," he said again, "if I didn't have such a shit example of what marriage should look like."

"And if we weren't both men?"

"Ha. Yeah, that too..."

Remus squeezed him tighter, and they kept swaying like that for some time. Sirius smelt of alcohol, of James' Farrah Fawcett hairspray and his own musky aftershave. He imagined them living in some house in the country, married and growing old, arguing over the television channels and whether or not they should spend Christmas at home that year or travel somewhere warmer. The picture fell apart when he began to consider kids—they were two men, and neither of them had any confidence as a father. But that was what people got married for right? To settle down, have a family… Surely the tax incentives weren't that good.

"What're you thinking about, Moons?"

Remus responded to the mumble with a kiss on the hair.

"You, mostly. And… something Lottie said."

Sirius raised his head in question, and Remus knew there was no use in backpedalling.

"Do you think I should've tried harder to make up with Tomny?"

Clearly the question was not one Sirius had been expecting. He didn't let go of Remus, but he stopped swaying, straightening up a bit so they could look each other in the eye.

"Do you want make up with Tomny?"

That's the big question, innit?

"I don't want us to hate each other forever."

"Then I guess you have your answer."

Well, shit.

"Maybe it's a good thing," Sirius said after a moment. "He asked you to be godfather, and the kid's gonna be born this month, isn't it?"

"Surprised you remembered."

"Why? I have a good memory." He smirked. "I remember everything about you."

"Oh yeah? And what's my favourite colour?"

"Blue, of course. Give me some credit."

Remus smiled then, a quiet, knowing one, and then kissed Sirius deeply. By the time they'd parted, the two of them were swaying to the music again.

'How deep is your love, how deep is your love?
I really mean to learn…'

“I don’t think I’d make a good godfather,” Remus told him. “Or husband…”

Sirius shook his head; “Moony, you great fool…”

The music filtered off, but instead of getting upset, Sirius' eyes began to tighten at the corners, in that wry, wry way of his.

“Come on then. Don't forget, you still owe me another song.”

* * *

The Next Morning…

It was only half past eight by the time Remus was awoken by the sound of someone pounding on their front door. Turning over, he nudged Sirius, who only groaned and shoved him off.

"Sirius, the door."

"Ngh... tell'm to pishh off..."

The pounding continued, and finally Remus dragged himself out of bed. They were the only ones around after James and Lily had gone home with the Potters and Peter had hopped a very expensive taxi back to Moira’s place in Stratford.

Thud! Thud! Thud! Thud!

The pounding on the door had gotten worse in the time it'd taken for Remus to get down the rickety staircase that led up to their room. Rubbing his face grumpily, he took a moment to glance about the landing. He could distinctly remember leaving the wedding at around half-past two in the morning, but after that everything was a blur. Now the flat was a mess; Regulus’ powder blue suit jacket was still lying at the base of the stairs along with several pairs of shoes and bits of a ruined bouquet. When Remus stuck his head into the living room he found the privacy sheet they’d hung for Regulus in a pile on the floor. Regulus himself was passed out on the sofa, his limbs half-dangling off of the cushions.

“Couldn’t manage the door, Edge?”

There was a grumble that sounded a lot like ‘fuck you, Lupin’ and Regulus turned over and buried himself deeper into his blankets.

THUD! THUD! THUD!

“Fucking… Christ, hold your bloody horses… I’m coming.”

Almost tripping over a stray slipper, Remus stumbled toward the door. His hangover throbbed in the centre of his forehead, and the light temporarily blinded him as it came through the textured glass. The fist pounding on the front door had quickened even more, to the point that Remus had begun to wonder if it was the London Metropolitan Police he’d be facing down.

“Whatever it was, we didn’t steal it,” he muttered to himself, before yanking the door open.

It was not the police.

“WHERE IS HE?” Patricia MacDuff hollered as she barged past Remus, straight across the entryway. “That jobby-flavoured bawbag of a wankstain—WHERE IS HE!?”

Remus almost thought he was still dreaming, but then Trish turned around and sucker-punched him in the arm and he knew he must’ve been awake.

“Where—Where is who?!”

“REGULUS!” She roared, the picture of every Scot's fury. “REGULUS BLACK, YOU SON OF PISH-HEADED ARSEPIECE—GET OUT HERE RIGHT NOW!”

“She’s been like that since Glasgow.”

Remus whirled around to find none other than Barty Crouch standing in his doorway. He looked tired and unimpressed, and was still wearing his Hawkings-regulated school coat, but before Remus could begin to wonder what the fuck Barty Crouch was doing standing on his London doorstep, Trish had stormed into the living room. A second later, Remus heard it.

“YOU!”

Sliding around the corner behind her, Remus was rewarded with just enough time to watch as Regulus shot up on the sofa, a look of utter horror in his eyes.

“Oh shit.”

“You stay there!” Trish told him. “Stay right there so I can fucking feed ye yer own lying tongue!”

It was like watching a pair of alley cats go at one another. Trish charged in, but Regulus had already leapt up from the sofa and launched himself over its armrest. They used the coffee table to incite a great game of keep-away, which would’ve been amusing had Trish not been aiming for more than a cheeky ‘you’re it’.

“You fucking cunt!” She snarled. “You absolute waste of a man! Couldn’t say nothing, could ye? Nae a word—not even a note! Just pissing off in th’ middle of the night like a fart in th’ wind!”

“I told Barty where I was going!”

“You told me you were going to a funeral,” Barty cut-in, casually coming around Remus’ side with his hands in his pockets. “Not that you were running away to join the circus.”

“How’d you even know where we live?” Remus demanded.

“Sirius writes a lot of letters,” Barty shrugged. “Followed the return address. How else were we supposed to find him?”

Gaping at the obvious betrayal, Regulus straightened up like he was going to give Barty a piece of his own mind. Too bad for him, Trish got there first.

“You jackass!” She howled, shoving him back into the sofa and promptly smacking the living shite out of him. “Do ye even ken how worried we’ve been? I should drown you in that filthy river, ye fucking bampot! M’on then, tadger! I’ll pound yer stupid face in!”

Every insult came with a fresh slap, until Remus was almost impressed with her stamina. He’d never seen anyone talk to Regulus like that before, but if anyone was going to do it, it made sense that it would be Trish.

“Moony? What’s all that bloody shouting?”

Never one to miss a dramatic moment, Sirius had appeared at the base of the stairs, his hair tangled from sleep and wearing naught but his pants. He shivered in the draft let in by Trish and Barty's arrival and struggled for a moment while fitting one of Remus' buttoned shirts around his shoulders. His jaw dropped when he realised what was going on, but that didn't stop him from giving his twopence.

"Alright, what in the devil's sweet fuck is going on down here? Someone wanna tell me what Barty Crouch is doing standing in my entryway?"

"Believe me, Black, it ain't my choice. You think I wanted to spend my school holiday looking at your pale arse?"

"Still as unclever as ever, I see. Go on then, Crouch, maybe you'll feel better if you kiss it."

Sirius was puckering up when suddenly the phone began to ring, driving yet another ice-pick into Remus' temple and igniting the beginnings of what was absolutely going to be a prime hangover. As Trish continued to take swipes at Regulus from across the couch and Sirius and Barty took turns insulting each other in the doorway, Remus slipped over to the kitchen nook and picked up the receiver. He was hoping it'd be James or Lily with a possible solution, but it wasn't.

"Remus? Remus, is that you? It's Sheila."

Remus resisted the urge to groan. Just what he needed—Trish and Barty, and now his godmother come to nag. He was starting to think they'd planned this.

"Uh, hey, Sheila. Sorry, but now's really not the best time—"

There was a crash as Trish whipped one of the couch pillows at Regulus' head, missing by a quarter of an inch and taking out a stack of records that'd been sitting on top of the stereo.

"Those were first pressings!" Sirius wailed.

"Now what was that noise?" Asked Sheila. "Oh, never mind. Now Remus, you know I care about you, but you've been dragging this nonsense out for far too long and I really think that it's time to—"

"—YOU STUPID—LOLLY-HEADED—SON OF AN ARSE-LICKER—"

"Stop fucking throwing shit at me, you loon—and stop yelling!"

CRASH!

“I AM NOT YELLING!”

Now it was Remus’ turn to duck as several magazines came whipping over his head, narrowly avoiding a cup of day-old coffee someone had left on the kitchen nook counter. He heard Sheila in his ear—"Remus, is there something you’d like to tell me?”—and just like that the words slipped out before he could stop them;

“It’s just Trish and Regulus, they—”

“A-HA!”

Oh, the irony. Remus bit down on the phone cord in exasperation as Sheila began bleating in his ear about how she knew he’d been lying the entire time.

“Is he safe?” She shrieked. “Is he healthy?! Remus, put Regulus on the phone!”

“You’re not my bloody baby-sitter!” Regulus snapped, though he’d barely gotten his words out before Trish full-body tackled him into the sofa. Behind them, Barty was making a show of wiping his dirty shoes on the rug and Sirius was caught between telling him off and egging Trish on.

“Go on, MacDuff!—Oh, piss off, would'ya, Crouch!—Atta girl, right hook! Right hook!”

“I should’ve been born an only child!” Regulus hollered, words choking off as Trish wrapped her bicep around his throat.

Then the doorbell rang.

“Remus, do you hear me?! Put Regulus on the phone this instant—”

“SORRY SHEILA, GOTTA GO!”

He slammed the receiver down, feeling like he’d run a marathon. It was obvious Trish was merely playing with Regulus now—an angry cat and her mouthy ball of a yarn—but Barty and Sirius didn’t seem to be paying attention anymore.

“I wonder who’s at the door!” Barty cackled. Sirius went to chase him, but Barty merely picked up one of Trish’s stray pillows and threw it, catching Sirius upside the head in a daze. A second later and the two had passed out of sight, veering into the entryway.

“Come on, MacDuff,” Remus sighed, reaching a hand out in an attempt to peel Trish off of Regulus before she did any real damage.

“Get her off, get her off!” Regulus was shouting. Then a yelp; “OW! Did you just bite me?!”

“You deserved it, twat-face!”

Remus stopped, his head pounding. A part of him wondered if he were to just give up, maybe he’d wake up in his bed with the realisation that it was all just a bad dream. But then Sirius yelped from the entryway and he knew it wasn’t a dream at all.

“Moony, crazy bird number two incoming!”

On cue, she came peeling around the corner into the living room with a look of pure fury on her face. Remus couldn’t believe it.

“Oh, you’ve got to be fucking joking me…”

“Where is he?!”

It was Skylar. She stormed into the living room with her blonde hair frazzled, screaming her head off and looking about nine months pregnant. Startlingly, Remus realised that she was nine months pregnant. It was April, which meant the baby should’ve been due any day—so why was she at their flat?

“Where is he?” Skylar snarled again, tearing across the living room to throw a pile of blankets off the far couch, as if whoever she was looking for might be hiding underneath. “Where is that fucking asshole?”

Even Trish and Regulus had stopped fighting. They stared at her, crammed onto the same loveseat, and Skylar paid them no mind as she went instead to the kitchen pantry, throwing the door open.

“This happen to you guys a lot?” Barty mused. Sirius scowled at him for the sarcasm and began picking his way across the living room, holding a pillow over his crotch to hide the fact that he was still half naked.

“Moony,” he hissed, “is that really—”

“Skylar.”

Remus said her name like a call and she turned on them sharply, her eyes wet and an angry red. Sirius flinched in response, but if he was expecting her leap forward and tear their throats out like an angry lioness, he'd be disappointed.

"Where is he?" She asked, her voice much smaller now. "Where is Tomny?"

Remus shook his head; "I–I don't…"

There wasn't time to explain further. Before anyone else could say anything, Skylar burst into tears.

Chapter End Notes

The Portastudio was a real thing. Here's the advert.
A 'lift' is an elevator.
A 'gaffe' is a blunder; a stupid or innocent mistake.
Danny Fields was an influential American music producer/ journalist. He worked with the likes of the Doors, Stooges, and Ramones.
'Pudding' is just a broad term meaning any type of dessert.
A 'Mr. Whippy with a flake' is a brand of soft-serve ice cream with a chocolate bar shoved into it.

Lottie talks about getting a 'bap tattoo' back in Chapter 20. They were so baby back then cries literally fifteen!!

Songs featured in this chapter: "Doomed Generation" (written by me to the tune of "The Stroke" by Billy Squire - as mentioned in the chapter's opening notes), "Tonight's the Night" (1976) and "Do Ya Think I'm Sexy" (1978) both by Rod Stewart, and finally, "How Deep is Your Love" by the Bee Gees (1977).

Also that wedding singer and Australian rock band might be ones to watch side-eye emoji

⏰⏰⏰ Update Schedule: Again, I've switched my upload days to MONDAYS but next week I will NOT BE UPDATING. I'm moving to the UK for a semester which means my timezone will be changing. Expect chapter 104 sometime in the morning of Jan 23rd GMT time. In the meantime I'm still hanging around on tumblr @motswolo. I hope everyone has a wonderful next two weeks and I'll see you then <3

Chapter 104: Noise

Chapter Summary

> “You’re not worried about sounding awful?”
> “Oh, I’m worried, but there are worse things than sounding awful.”

Chapter Notes

> CW for this chapter: violence including threats and knives, but also a lot of general tomfoolery. The word "ponce" is repeatedly used. Remus is sorta sad, then really happy (!!!), then sorta sad again, lol.
>
> Also, for those of you more interested in the music aspect of this fic (that being following along with the "vibes" of certain musical scenes) you're probably going to want to play THIS when Rat Scabies starts asking for a 'sacrifice'. It's personally one of my fav live versions of the song xoxo

See the end of the chapter for more notes

We met when we were in school,
Never took no shit from no one, we weren’t fools;
The teacher says we’re dumb,
We’re only having fun;
You know, we piss on everyone,
In the classroom…

- “Stay Free” The Clash, 1978

Back when they were young and decidedly less queer, Remus had attended an Easter supper at Marlene’s house as her boyfriend. Marlene’s eldest brother John had been newly married and was just expecting his first child. Remus had only met the McKinnons the one time, but he remembered John’s small wife—her stomach ballooned to the point of obvious discomfort. She’d looked positively ill that day, like the smallest breeze might topple her. Marlene had talked his ear off beforehand about how pregnant women experienced a variety of horrific symptoms, including the type of hormones that tended to cause wild mood swings. At the risk of sounding like a misogynist, Remus had simply nodded along with little fuss, but now he wished he’d asked a few more questions. Namely, what to do when your ex-best friend's girlfriend shows up on your doorstep nine months pregnant and won't stop sniffling into her tea.

It took several minutes for him to become convinced that Skylar was not, in fact, at risk of having a "stress baby" on his living room floor. Sirius and the others had already cleared out, and the two of them were able to sit down on the ratty sofa seats to talk. Remus almost felt like pinching himself. After their first disastrous meeting in Whitechapel he'd been pretty sure that he would never be seeing Skylar again. But then again, fate had always been a bit ironic like that.

"It's been five days," Skylar said, her voice more than a little raspy from crying. "How could 'e not come home? My due date's in less than two weeks, and this arsehole 'finks it's alright for 'im to go on a bloody bender." She rubbed her face with one hand, moaning in frustration. Meanwhile Remus had never felt more awkward in his life. A part of him wished Sirius had stayed behind to play mediator, but between Trish and Regulus' spat and the hangovers they'd both woken up with, he and others had peeled out of the flat so quickly Remus wouldn't be surprised if they'd left skid marks on the front rug.

"So when you saw him last, Skylar—"

"Call me Sky, right," she whined, pathetically blowing her nose into a kitchen flannel.

"Right… Sky…" Remus took a deep breath. "When you last saw Tomny, was he using?"

She shook her head no, then her face twisted in pain again. She shrugged miserably. "Oh, I dunno! We fought so much about it I 'fink he just started to hide it. But he'd been clean for two months before all 'a this."

Remus scratched awkwardly at the side of his neck. Clean or not, Tomny's entire life had been uprooted. He'd given up his work, the money, friends… Everyone needed a vice, and Remus was hardly the one to judge.

"Did he say he was leaving? Going somewhere, maybe?"

"No, 'e just left. We had a fight, sumfink about work—and he stormed out."

“Well, Tomny’s got a lot of friends, you know. He could’ve easily gone to theirs to cool off. He used to do that a lot, back when we were younger, right? Sometimes he’d get drunk and just go home with other people. You know, crash at theirs.”

“For five days?”

“Well, if it was a girl—”

“Yer saying Tomny’s off in some uvv’er girl’s bed?”

Remus winced, pinching the bridge of his nose. “No… No, he’s not like that.”

“I just don’t get why this’s so hard for ‘im,” Skylar went on. “I had ter give up drinking—and smoking! My entire body’s been fucked over by this, and all he’s got to do is be there. Why's that so hard?”

Now Remus really wished the others hadn’t left. He let her go on for a bit longer, and when it was clear she’d run out of steam, he offered her a real tissue. Skylar mumbled her thanks.

“You look nice,” he said instead, trying not to stare too long at her stomach. “Is the... baby healthy then?”

“For the most part.” Skylar glanced down at her stomach, stroking it gently. “Had a few rough months wiv’ the morning sickness but Tomny took me in for all them scans, right, ‘n’ the doctor said everything looked awright. He missed the last appointment though. Now I’m just ready for all of it to be over.”

Remus nodded, then; “Skylar, how did you know where I lived?”

She sipped her tea, eyes dry for the time being. “Tomny thought it would be smart to keep a list of emergency numbers on the fridge. O’course, it’s only got yers, un'all. I know you two haven’t been talkin' but I figured that if he was going to hide out anywhere it’d be ‘ere.”

Her words were like a stone sinking in his gut. It made Remus look down at his hands, and as he did so Skylar clutched her baby belly tightly.

“You don’t ‘fink sumfink’s happened to him, do you?”

“What? No way.”

"—'Cause I’ve literally been going out ‘a me mind."

Remus shook his head, adamant. “Tomny’s resourceful. I’ll bet… Well, I’ll bet he’s just too ashamed to face you right now. He’s probably out there beating himself up over it.”

Skylar scowled like she’d like to have seen it for herself, but Remus' palms were already sweating. He thought that when he’d finally be doing this, that the one he’d be facing down would be Tomny, but as it was Tomny was nowhere to be found, and he owed Skylar an apology.

“Skylar.”

She raised her head.

“I just wanted to say that I’m sorry for… For what I said in the cafe. It was completely out of line. I–I don’t know why I acted like that, I just… Shit, I…”

“Tomny said that youse were different. Not like, different–weird, but that you didn’t judge, d’you know what I mean?” She pursed her mouth, looking toward Sirius’ stack of toppled records. “He wouldn’t talk to me about it afterwards, but I know he felt judged. I ‘fink you let ‘im down. Slated, innit.”

Remus nodded mutely, biting down on his bottom lip to keep it from shaking.

“I think something’s wrong with me,” he said eventually. “I think something was wrong with me that day, and I… Well, I took it out on you and Tomny.”

“Ain’t that the wey.”

Neither of them said anything more for a while, and Remus got the feeling that Skylar wasn’t all that interested in comforting him. Fair enough, he thought; he probably wouldn’t have felt like comforting him either. As he went on quietly moping, Skylar wrapped an arm around her stomach and winced.

"D'you mind?" She gestured to the room. "Walking's easier on my back. O'course if it ain't my back it's my feet..."

Remus beckoned her on, and she hauled her large stomach up from the chair and began wandering about the room. Perhaps this was just her way of snooping, Remus didn't care. He was busy racking his brain for anywhere Tomny may have gone. Doss was living in Cardiff now, and as far as Remus knew, Seesaw was still in the Midlands. If Lee was to be believed, then Tomny had quit the gang, which meant those bridges were all ash and dust now. Shit... Vint? Donna or Cheryl maybe? No—no way Tomny was prick enough to go back to an ex-girlfriend with Skylar in such a state. Maybe he'd gone to Burrin then. He was his full-time boss now, but Tomny had never even let Remus meet the guy, let alone tell him where he lived. Suddenly it was looking like finding Tomny was going to be about as easy as finding a chipped brick in a council flat.

Dammit, Tom...

“I know that one.”

It took Remus a few seconds to catch on. At that point Skylar was already setting her cup of tea aside and picking up one of the albums Sirius had left in a cluttered pile next to the radio. Harvest, by Neil Young.

“My dad used to play this for me when I was little. This one—" She pointed to the track list; "He'd sing it for me 'n me mum."

Remus got up from his chair. “It belongs to my friend James,” he explained. “His dad likes Neil Young too... Would—Would you like me to put it on?”

She considered, then nodded and passed it along to him. Slipping the record from its sleeve, Remus had just about set up the needle when Skylar gave a short groan and bent over at the middle. Instantly Remus was panicking.

“A-Are you okay? Should I call an ambulance?” He’d dropped the needle’s arm in his surprise, causing a harsh scratch and effectively starting the album mid-song.

“No, no, ya melt, m'fine,” Skylar grumbled. “Baby’s just kickin’… Ugh, I swear, the bleedin’ wee shits know exactly where your kidneys are. Bloody ‘ave to piss ev’ry five minutes. Ain’t it enough that I’m riskin’ being ripped ass to twat?”

Remus looked away, trying not to grimace. Several deep breaths later, Skylar had righted herself and was running her hands along her stomach soothingly.

“Tomny always jokes that the kid’s gonna be some pro-wrestler or sumfink. Should’a seen him the first time ‘e felt the babe kick.”

Just please don't ask me to feel your stomach, Remus thought drearily. Luckily Skylar didn't seem to have any interest. They stood next to each other for a while, listening to the song. It was a nice one. Eventually Skylar began to hum along.

'I've been to Hollywood,
I've been to Redwood;
I crossed the ocean,
For a heart of gold…'

"Say, Remus?"

"Yeah?"

"You should know that your 'ouse is a bit of a mess."

"Oh, well, we weren't exactly expecting guests." Remus glanced around at the cluttered living room, then down again, to where Skylar was still stroking her belly.

"More tea, Sky?"

"Ah nah, whisky on th' rocks for me, thanks."

She smiled, and Remus finally began to feel himself relax.

A short while later the record had run out and Tomny had still not shown up, and so Skylar took that as her cue to leave. Remus had managed to flag down a taxi for her and even held her hand as she hobbled down the front steps of their townhouse. After helping her into the back of the cab, Remus handed the driver a few quid for the ride and stepped back to her door, peering in on her anxiously.

"You'll call me if he turns up, right?"

She nodded. "Cross me heart."

He thought he should say something that might comfort her in return, and so while white-knuckling the edge of the open taxi window, Remus did his best to smile.

"I wouldn't worry much, Sky. Tom can't keep away from home long anyway. Likes his flat too much."

"The flat? No, didn't you know, we—" She caught herself. "Oh, that's right, you wouldn't have known."

His expression must've given away his unease, because Skylar rushed to console him.

"We moved, Remus. Back in January. We're up in Hackney Wick now… But it's a nice place. Tomny didn't want to go too far, and I couldn't very well force him to leave outright. He takes the car out to the track at Kempton Park for work. At least he was… Anyway, there's a lot of young families in our building."

"Have you been back to the flat then? Maybe he went there."

"O'course I went to the flat," she replied, sounding irritated now. "Tomny told me 'e passed the lease along to a friend after we moved out, but no one ever answered the door."

Remus swallowed. Tomny may have been a better guy than most but even he wasn't above lying. He could've easily passed the lease on to someone he knew like he'd told Skylar, or he could've been using the flat as a place to hide out. It worried him, but Skylar was nine months pregnant. She shouldn't have to be wandering around dodgy East London council estates looking for her missing boyfriend.

"I'll go. Maybe they just weren't home."

"You'd do that?"

"For Tomny? Anything."

She cupped his cheek. Her hand was warm.

"You know, I wasn't sure at first, but I think Tomny just might have been right for asking you to be godfa'vver."

His breath caught, but she'd already released him. Slowly Remus stepped back onto the curb. "Make sure she gets home alright," he told the driver, who honked his horn while pulling away. At the last second, Skylar stuck her head out the window.

"Remus, if you see Tomny, you send him home!"

"I will," he called. "Call if you need anything, Sky. I-I mean it!"

She smiled, blonde hair whipping around her face.

"By the way, it's a girl!"

She was still waving by the time the cab rounded the street corner and disappeared, leaving Remus stunned and speechless on the curb. It seemed Skylar was getting quite good at that.

A girl… It's a bloody girl!

His palms had begun to sweat again by the time a series of loud honks were echoing up the street. It was Sirius driving their beloved purple Minnie-van. He pulled the VW up to the curb and jammed the gear stick into park.

"So that was Skylar then?" He called, rolling down the passenger's side window so that Remus could hang his arms inside. "Seems like a nice girl. And you were so nasty to her. Tsk—tsk, Moony."

"Call me an arse," Remus sighed. " 'Least I got to apologise."

"Yeah? So you mean she didn't totally bite your head off?"

"More of a light nibble really. No less than I deserved…" Remus watched as Sirius scooped up a packet of cigarettes from the centre console. "Where'd you get off to?"

"Oh, only took these wankers for a little joyride. Managed to pick up a few things too."

Just then the van's side door opened and Trish stuck her head out, clutching a fat spliff between two fingers. "Look, Loonarny! Real London-grown weed!"

He heard Regulus groan—"Bloody hell, MacDuff!"—and Trish was unceremoniously dragged back into the van before anyone off the street could see or smell her.

"Say," Sirius smirked, lighting his infinitely more legal cigarette, "I was thinking—we could take these kiddos somewhere fun and normal like, oh, I dunno—back to Portobello Road and the like. Or… we could show 'em what the real London underbelly looks like."

"You don't know what the 'real London underbelly' looks like, you toff."

"I know enough, inn–it," Sirius said, teasing. Remus leaned his chin on the edge of the van's window.

"What'd you have in mind?"

“Saw in the paper that The Damned are doing a show over in Camden tonight. S’not too far outta the way. I already rang Prongs and Wormtail and they’re in, and MacDuff over there seems eager enough too, so whatcha you think? Crouch and shithead can wait outside if they’re not interested.”

A cry came from the back seat; “Fuck off, Black! We ain't waiting outside for your freak show to be over!”

"Zip it, Crouch, or I'll drive you over to Whitehall and dump your miserable arse. See if Crouch Sr. is looking for a visit."

At Sirius' threat, Barty flipped him the bird but did begrudgingly sit back in his seat, both arms crossed in defiance. Next to him, Regulus appeared unbothered, slowly flipping through one of Sirius' old NME magazines. Dave Vanian of The Damned was on the cover, rubbing a piece of raw meat into his eye.

"So, what d'ya think?" Sirius pulled a pair of sunglasses down from the van's visor. "I know them 'no wave' folk dress a bit like if your gran started snorting heroin through a chimney pipe but if we can handle the Sex Pistols then I reckon we can stand embracing some of their nihilism for a single evening. You?"

Remus shrugged meekly. “Yeah, Sirius sounds fun… but first, I— uhm…”

“Aw no,” Sirius sighed, tipping his head back against the seat. “I know that look. You’re about to do something stupid, aren’t you?”

“And just how is it you always know when I’m about to do something stupid?”

“I just do. You get this depressed little line in the middle of your forehead.”

“I do not.”

“Sure, you do. I can see it right now.”

Sirius flicked his cigarette carton at him, effectively knocking Remus upside the head with it. Remus chuckled, though it fell off toward the end, growing rather unenthused. Afterwards he picked up the cigarettes and began tapping one loose while Sirius smiled at him, knowingly.

“What’s going on, Moons?”

“If…" Remus gnawed on the end of the cigarette; "If I said you were right, and told you that I did want to do something completely stupid, what would you say?”

Sirius paused to consider. “Can we still go to the concert later?”

“If I survive, sure.”

“Right. In that case, I’m driving.”

"... Really?"

"Why not? It's like I already said—nihilists for an evening, yeah? And if life's already meaningless then I suppose there's no point in worrying how badly you're about to fuck ours up."

Remus reached for the van’s door handle. "Christ." Thank god for Sirius Bl—

“Black, can we hurry up with this stupid venture of yours?” Barty called from the back of the van. He’d pulled a stray beer can out from beneath his seat and was dangling it in front of his nose like a dead rat. “This car of yours—if you can even call it a car—is foul. I mean, where did you find it? A scrapheap?”

“Got it from your mum actually, Crouch,” Sirius drawled, adjusting the rear-view mirror. “Shall I tell you what I did to pay for it?”

Barty sneered, sticking his tongue out whilst tossing the can over his shoulder. “Still smells like ass back here.”

“That’s ‘cause you’re sitting in the same place Moony and I had sex last week.”

“Is that right?” Barty turned to Regulus, clearly delighted. “Shit, Regulus—you never told me your brother’s a poof!”

“You never asked.”

Whatever comeback Barty was expecting to give died before it even reached his lips. He glanced at Sirius—smug—then back at Regulus, who was still ignoring him in favour of his magazine. It took a cheeky brow-raise from Trish for realisation to begin dawning on Barty's face.

“You… You mean you and—you and… huh? ”

“Cat got yer tongue, bawbag?” Trish sniggered.

“You—and-and him—and—HUH?”

“Don’t tell me you’re prejudiced, Barty,” Sirius asked innocently. "Not after crushing on Lupin for all these years."

“Fuck off, I ain’t prejudiced, I just hate you! And you—” He pointed at Remus; "You—You fuck off too!"

Remus put his hands up. "What'd I say?"

"Is it true, bawbag?" Trish gaped at Barty.

"No! Now everyone just fuck off!"

"Tsk. He must be prejudiced."

"I ain't!" Huffing and red-faced, Barty gave Regulus a nervous glance. “I-I ain’t! Ugh… stupid—ngh... Fucking tosser...”

“Well." Sirius paused for a moment to yawn and stretch dramatically in the front seat; "Glad we’ve got that sorted. Now if you guys don’t mind, I prefer a bit of music while I drive.”

He began punching several dials on the radio, and suddenly Radio One’s top hits were pouring out of the speakers.

'You disturb my natural emotions,
You make me feel like dirt and I'm hurt...'

“That’s one way to tell someone you’re fucking your best friend,” Remus mumbled over the music, sliding into the passenger’s seat and shutting the door after himself.

“What can I say? I like being efficient.”

"I don't remember you being so 'efficient' when we were telling James."

"Hm, really? Don't recall. Must've been some other totally gorgeous knockout with black hair."

"Riiiiight."

'And if I start a commotion,
I'll only end up losing you and that's worse...'

Sirius dropped the pair of sunglasses down over his eyes before putting the van into gear. “Best put on those seat belts, kiddies," he said, "I’ve been known to be a bit of a wild card behind the wheel. Just ask, Moony.”

"Aye. Seems like there's a few things I'd like to ask him," observed Trish keenly.

Jamming on the horn a few times for good measure, Sirius grinned as he peeled back out into the motorway. In the backseat, Remus overhead Trish offer Barty a hit of her spliff, which he almost dropped into his lap upon realising;

“Wait… you... YOU MEAN YOU REALLY DID IT BACK HERE?!”

'Ever fallen in love with someone—
Ever fallen in love, in love with someone?
Ever fallen in love, in love with someone—
You shouldn't have fallen in love with?!'

As Sirius drove, Remus imagined all the ways what he was about to do could go terribly wrong. If, by some miracle, he did manage to find Tomny at the flat, what would he even say? I’m sorry, obviously, but then what? Go home? Cut the shit? Be the dad you promised you were gonna be? Remus wasn’t sure he had the right to say any of it. Where had he been these last months—not with Tomny. Tomny could sock him in the face and slam the door and Remus would still deserve it. But at least this way he could tell Skylar he'd tried. And fuck—that her boyfriend was bloody alive.

They were passing through Spitalfields, the radio’s usual midday disc jockey droning on, when Barty thrust his finger against the van window in awe.

“Oh man, look there! Manky old bloke's passed out on the pavement. Reckon he’s dead?”

“Have some respect, Crouch,” Trish snapped.

“Alright, if you’re so genuine why don’t you hop out and go help him? I’m sure he’d just love gutting a little girl.”

“I’ll gut ye, bawbag, if you don’t shut it!”

“Enough,” Remus called. “None of you are getting out. You’re staying right here.”

“What? You mean you drag us all the way to scrub-central and we’re not even allowed to leave the car?”

“That’s right, Crouch,” Sirius said, adjusting the radio’s volume. “Your boney arse isn’t leaving that seat, ‘least not until Lupin’s finished whatever business he's got with that big brother of his.” He glanced sideways to give Remus a wink, before turning the van onto Whitechapel’s Commercial Road. From there Remus had to give him directions. When Sirius finally pulled the purple VW van up to the curb, Remus felt his heart lodge itself in his throat. Of course nothing about the building had changed; still the same scuffed white brick, single-paned windows, rusted gate barely hanging onto its hinges.

“This is where your brother lives?”

“Bawbag, what’d I just say!”

There was a hiss as Barty took another one of Trish’s smacks to the shoulder, but by then Sirius was already undoing his seatbelt.

“Right. You twats stay here, Moony and I are gonna get this done and be right back. If you’re good, I might even say yes to a stop at Wimpy’s on the way home.”

Sirius blew the three seventeen year-olds a kiss as he opened his driver’s side door, but by then Remus was already gripping him by the elbow.

“What're you doing?”

“I'm coming with you, obviously," Sirius scoffed.

"No way."

"Yes way—you can't go alone. Don’t worry, I won’t crowd you while you’re talking to Tomny. I just wanna see inside.”

Quickly, Remus reached past Sirius to tug his door shut.

“Sirius, stay in the car.”

His tone ignited a fierce stare off, the kind that Sirius’ natural-born stubbornness usually won him, but Remus was unyielding. If coming there was only going to blow up in his face, then he didn't want Sirius to be anywhere near the blast radius.

“I won’t be gone long,” he told the others as he got out. “Just keep an eye out, and make sure you lock the doors and all that.”

“Don’t forget to watch the mirrors too,” Barty added snidely; “Don’t want anyone syphoning our petrol.”

The gate creaked as Remus pushed it open. There was a woman sitting on her ground floor balcony as he approached the intercom, smoking a cigarette and peering at him over the top of her newspaper. When Remus pressed the buzzer there was no sound.

“Squawk-box’s busted, lad,” said the old woman. “Door’s open, 'ead on in.”

“Thanks,” replied Remus, nodding his head at her kindness. He found the building’s door left ajar just as she’d said, propped open with a small brick. It let in a terrible draft, though upon reflecting the building had never been particularly well insulted in the first place.

Tomny’s place was on the second floor, flat 3. The door had once borne a brass plate indicating it as such, but now—like the VW’s missing hood ornament—all that was left was a faded outline of where the numbers used to be. The door was locked.

“Tom…?” Remus knocked lightly, his stomach in knots. “Tom, are you there? Is anyone…" Fucking hell. "It’s Remus. Tom, if you’re there, let me in.”

There was no answer, and after several long seconds of silence, Remus considered turning away.

Then he heard it; a soft creak of a floorboard.

Someone was inside.

“Tom!” He began battering the door with his fist. “Wake up! Tomny, I don’t care how pissed off you are at me—did you know I saw Skylar?

Yeah, she came to mind, you bloody oaf! Open the door and I'll explain everything. You—You know I can pop the lock... Oi, tosser! Don't make me force my way in!"

Again, no answer. He was starting to get frustrated. Surely if it was some stranger they'd have told him to piss off already.

With nothing else to do, Remus began rifling through his pockets for something to use on the lock. Before he'd even finished a thought occurred to him, and against all hope he reached his hands up to the top of the door frame. He didn't even know if they would still be there; it'd been Doss' idea to leave them behind. He'd placed them there for safe keeping. Remus had been too short to reach then.

He wasn't too short now.

Ting! T-Ting!

The paperclips hit the tips of his fingers and bounced off the frame's edge and onto the floor. Both were rather rusty, the steel corroded from years of disuse, but when Remus tested their strength against the pads of his thumbs, the metal held.

"I'm coming in, Tom!" He hollered, already pinching them into shape with his teeth. It was like muscle memory now—the first lock he'd ever popped. It took less than thirty seconds.

Remus pushed the door open.

"Tomny? I know you're here..."

He was still hopeful when he found the lights on, but walking inside—there was no one. All the usual stuff was there; the dingy couch, Tomny's recliner, even the telly. It was dirtier now than it had been when half a dozen guys had been living there, but at least Remus figured that the old furniture meant that at least someone familiar was still around.

He regretted being right the moment the door shut behind him.

"I told you that if you ever came back here I'd kill you."

The door bolt slid home with a deafening click. The feeling of hungry eyes on his back—yeah, Remus imagined this was what it felt like to be hunted. When he turned around he did so slowly, hands raised to show him that they were empty. Unfortunately for him, Lee's were not.

“I warned you,” Lee said, his voice reedy and thin. He had a small knife trained on the middle of Remus’ chest and was using his free hand to steady his dominant arm as it trembled in mid-air. The blade was shorter than his thumb, but long enough to do some damage, though the look on his face was twisted in pain.

"Lee—"

Lee thrust the blade forward threateningly.

“Have to hand it to ya, Lu, you always were a stubborn cunt.”

“I wouldn’t have come back if it weren’t important,” Remus said, slowly licking his lips. “I’m only looking for—”

“Tomny, I know,” spat Lee. “You think I didn’t hear you screaming yer head off in the hall? Fucking bastard… It’s always Tomny wiff you, innit. You’re like a bloody parrot the way you get on. S'always Tomny this, Tomny that—Tomny, Tomny, Tomny, Tomny!”

Lee moved sporadically, ambling forward several paces and slicing the knife through the air with short jerky motions as if he were punctuating every word. It didn't feel totally intentional, but Remus did have to jump backward to avoid letting the last one slicing through his chest. By then he’d been driven back far enough that his legs hit the coffee table, rattling a large crystal ashtray that looked as though it’d been lifted from one of those fancy cigar bars in Fitzrovia.

It was hard not to panic. Lee was blocking the door and the only other escape route was the balcony—and that was only if Lee didn’t catch him first. Even if he did manage to make it there; even if the door was unlocked, they were on the second floor! At best he’d scratch himself to ribbons on whatever dead bramble bushes grew beneath the balcony—at worst he’d break both ankles, possibly his neck. Though, Lee would’ve probably found that quite agreeable right about now.

“Are you even listening to me?” He wailed, swiping at the air with his knife, barely an arm’s length between them now. “God, you never fuckin’ listen!”

“Lee, put the knife down. You—You don't mean this."

"Shaddup! You ain't gonna tell me what it is I mean! You think just 'cause it's us two that I won't do it? Fucking toff—I warned you!"

"I know," Remus said, struggling to keep his breath even, "but I swear, Lee... If you let me go now, you'll never have to see me again. I'll never come back here, I'll disappear."

"As if I'd believe a liar! As if I'd believe someone who only ever lied to me!"

Desperate, Remus glanced around for another exit—another chance. All he found was a filthy living room and empty beer bottles. Lee had a cut on his cheek that had healed badly, no doubt the result of a fight. Seeing the cut and how its scabbed surface pulled at the skin, Remus was reminded of his own run-in with trouble, all those summers ago.

"Alright," he gulped, "so don't believe me now—I know you can't, that's fine. Don't believe the things I told you—believe the things you know!" Remus touched the side of his nose, where he knew his faded scar still split his face like a crack in the pavement. "You knew me when I got this. You knew me! I was fifteen and we were friends—you were my friend, Lee. I loved you, and I loved Tomny and he loved us both... And you—you and me? I would've followed you anywhere, mate!"

"You're not my mate!"

"No, but I'm still your Lu!"

For a split-second, Lee's knife dropped. Remus felt it in his bones.

"Please, Lee."

"I didn't ask you to beg."

"I'm doing it anyway."

The knife fell another several centimetres, and slowly Lee straightened up. He was glaring at something—his scar, Remus realised.

"You say you're my Lu? But who's that, huh? I dunno a Lu... All's I know s'a lying bastard named Remus Lupin."

"No—"

"You're a liar. There never was a Lu. Not really."

Remus shut his eyes. He felt like he'd been cleaved in two.

"I loved you, Lee."

"Liar."

"—I lied, but I still loved you. I swear, I did. I made you feel sorry for me so that you'd let me into the group, and I went on letting you believe it because… well, 'cause it was easier than admitting that I was any different."

"You're not 'different'," Lee hissed. "Different's growing up sleeping in front of the oven 'cause your piece of shit dad gambled away that month's electric money! Nah, yer a fucking prick—you only ever been mollycoddled! You don't know what it's like to be different!"

Remus grit his teeth. "You're right… but for what it's worth, I'm sorry anyway."

A hand shot forward, fisting the front of his jacket viciously.

"Don't you get it?!" Lee screamed. "I don't want your sorry! You can't just make up for your lies by being fucking sorry!"

Remus had nothing to say. Lee was right. He'd lied, and these were the consequences.

For a while Lee's expression was no more than fury. He was breathing hard enough that shoulders drooped by several inches each time he exhaled and spit covered his cracked lips from all the swearing. Remus wasn't fool enough to think he was safe, but when Lee finally released his shirt, he felt his chest give a lurch of relief.

"You say yer lookin' for Tom?" Lee asked, sucking his teeth. "Well, he ain't 'ere. Ran out on us jus' like you did, innit. Wanted a better life for him and that stupid girl of his."

"Skylar's pregnant. He only meant to—"

"Don't care. 'Cause you see, this—" and he raised his arms, indicating to the rest of the flat; "this s'as good as it gets fur' the rest 'a us. Every'fin rots in the End."

He wanted to deny it, but Lee had never been the kind to look outside of his own means. He felt safe in the familiar and had clearly made a name for himself the same way Tomny had. Reality was that he didn't want anything Remus could offer, he was just a sad boy mourning the things he'd lost. At least there, Remus could relate.

“I’m sorry, Lee,” Remus said stupidly, feeling a lump form in his throat. “I’m sorry everything’s gone.”

For a moment it almost appeared as though he’d gotten through to him. Lee stared back at him and for a moment his eyes were clear again; but quick as the change came, it was gone. Lee tipped his head forward, and this time when he raised the blade he pressed it to Remus’ throat.

“No.” Seething, he fisted the front of Remus’ jacket again. “No, you don’t get to decide when everything’s just gone.”

“Shit, Lee—”

“Nah, I think it’s time you got to actually begging, Lu!” He hollered. “Jus' ‘cause we got no audience doesn’t mean you can’t grovel! So go on, little ponce! You remember the words, right?”

It hit like a train—I’m a ponce—and like a vicious reminder, the knife stung his throat.

“Go on, Lu, say it!”

I’m a ponce.

“Would you rather me gut you? Is that it?”

"No."

"No? No what?!"

I’m not a—

"Come on, stupid ponce!"

I said, I'm not a—

"Say it!"

“No, Lee!"

Remus had felt the words leave his mouth. When they did, Lee's face turned to stone.

“No...?”

"... No.”

The knife bit deeper.

“No, you won’t say it, or no, you don’t want me to gut you?”

I'm—

"Answer, you ponce!"

I'm King of the Dock.

Remus wished there was another way. He wished he knew what he was going to tell Skylar, or Sirius. He wished he didn't have to let them down. He wished he'd had more time.

"I could do it, you know," Lee said, and suddenly he was a snivelling mess. "I've done it before... It'd be easy. I can do it. I will."

"No, Lee. You won't."

"You...? You think I... won't?" Lee's nostrils flared like an animal. "Fine, then maybe I'll show you—!"

“Moony!”

The cry came from outside, barely heard through the balcony’s glass door. Even half out of his mind, Lee still picked up on it, sharply wrenching his head toward the sound and then letting out a cackle loud enough to make Remus’ ears twinge.

“Them’s your mates, then? Wonder how they’ll react seeing you all torn up. I’m gonna give ya ‘nother scar to match th’ one over yer nose. See how tough you look then, Lu.”

Behind them the flat’s doorknob rattled.

“Lee? Boyo, let us in. Let us in, ya effing eejit.”

It was like Lee’s eyes had glazed over. Maybe it was relief.

“Ya hear that? Them’s my mates. They're 'ere, looking out. Whatchu think—I give you tah them? There won’t be enough left for yer boys to bury.”

“Moony!”

Remus felt something wet trickle down the side of his neck. The knife had cut him, leaving behind a burning sting, but he was still trapped against the table and Lee's grip on his jacket was solid enough to prevent him from pulling away. Behind him, the door handle continued to rattle.

"Well, Remus?" Lee keened. "Got nuffin' to say now? There's a surprise."

Remus shut his eyes. He was so close. If he just reached down a bit further—

Thump! Thump! "Lee, who ya talkin' to? You even in there, ya daft cunt?"

"Moony!"

Just a little more—

"Luuuuuu!"

"Lee, let us in!"

So close—

"Moony!"

"Open your eyes, Lu! Open your eyes or I'll blind you, ya fucking toff!"

Remus grabbed hold of the crystal ashtray, bringing it upwards in a sharp arc. It caught Lee upside the head, slamming into his temple with a heavy thud. Lee dropped like a bag of rocks as Remus spiralled backward, clutching his throat and breathing very hard. The sound must've echoed, as the shouting in the hallway outside grew louder.

"Lee! 'Oo's in there?!"

The guys outside were pounding on the door now. In a few seconds they'd be throwing their entire weight against it and it'd be game over for Remus. Nearby Lee was on his knees, clutching his head in both hands. He was bleeding.

"Fuck…! Lu… ngh… Lu, I'mma… gon' feckin'—kill y—ou…"

"No," Remus wheezed, staring at the blood on his fingers, "you're not."

The ashtray dropped from his other hand, landing in time with the heavy thuds happening out in the hall. He couldn't hear Sirius anymore, but the front door strained against its hinges with every hit.

Watching Lee writhe there on the floor, a part of Remus wanted to hit him again—hit him until he couldn't ever be a threat again. But more than anything Remus wished they could've just gone back to the way they were.

"I loved you, Lee," he swore. "You were my brother."

"Nnngh—no, I had a bruh—a brother." Lee looked up at him, without pity or remorse. "You… You ain't my fucking brother."

Remus sucked a wet breath back. He imagined what he would say next. The words never came. Instead the door burst open, and two guys dressed in jean jackets and heavy boots hurdled their way inside. Remus knew what was about to happen. Like a shark scenting blood, they look one look at Lee—crouched over and bleeding—and instantly Remus was a dead man.

"Yer a dead man!" The first of them barked, predictably.

Remus moved like the room was on fire. He launched himself over the coffee table, knocking over a single free-standing lamp as he went for the balcony door. Mercifully it was unlocked, and he'd only just managed to shut it behind himself when his attackers slammed into the other side of the glass. With nowhere else to go, Remus picked up one of the old plastic chairs they used to sit on to smoke their cigarettes. One of them was missing its back rest, leaving behind two rusted metal prongs that stuck straight up into the air. Using the busted chair, Remus jammed the metal bar into one end of the sliding door, blocking the skinheads from opening it.

Standing up, he felt the glass shake as they slammed it with their fists.

"I'll kill you!" They spat, wrenching on the door handle while their breath fogged up the glass. "Yer feckin' dead!"

"Moony, what the hell are you doing?!"

It was Sirius again. He stood in the middle of the front garden, waving his hands erratically.

"It was Lee!" Remus shouted back. "Tomny isn't here."

"I figured when I saw those skinheads go inside." Sirius shielded his eyes with one hand. "You should jump!" He shouted. "Go on, I'll catch you!"

There was no time to argue. As the balcony door strained, Remus went to the railing and leaned over. He was fifteen—maybe twenty feet off the ground. If he managed to get himself over the railing and dangle from the bottom then he might've been able to half that—except Lee's mates didn't seem all that interested in waiting. So, Remus did what any reasonable eighteen year-old facing certain death would do.

He jumped.

Someone must've been watering the bramble bushes; they weren't nearly as thorny as he was expecting when he landed. In fact, they were more like shrubs than anything, but that didn't stop Remus from flattening them as his entire body came crashing down from above. Sirius was on him in a second, peeling his battered body out of the foliage with a single sharp tug.

Remus hissed in pain. "Shit! What happened to fucking catching me?"

"I panicked!"

"Bloody f—uuuuuck!"

"Quick, before those new friends of yours start thinking they can survive a jump like that too."

With Sirius' help, Remus began hobbling his way across the lawn. The old woman from earlier was gone, but the front gate was open. As they neared it, the van's side door slid open and Trish and Barty leapt out, urging them onwards with frantic arms.

"Hurry! Hurry! The damn lunatic's right behind you!"

It was like Remus' stomach had shot back into his throat. Behind them, Lee had flown out the flat's front door like an animal. Practically foaming at the mouth, his shirt was stained with blood and a vein bulged intensely in his forehead.

"LUUUUPIN!" He howled, brandishing his knife; "I'M GONNA KILL YOU!"

"Fuck this!" Sirius yelped, practically dragging Remus toward the gate himself. "Reg, start the bloody car!"

There was no time to be astonished. Sirius' grip on his arm was like a vice, and Remus could feel Lee at their backs even as they ran. Ahead of them, Trish and Barty scrambled back inside the van, reaching for anything they might be able to use as a weapon. When they'd reappeared, Barty had an empty beer can in either hand while Trish weilded the end of a broken mike stand.

“RUN!” They shouted, clearly terrified. "RUN, LUPIN—RUN!"

Even injured, Remus was quick. He and Sirius made it to the gate before Lee had time to reach them and—bursting through it, had only a few more steps of precious pavement left between them and safety.

Then Remus felt a hand on the back of his jacket.

"I've got you!"

“Lupin!” Barty shouted; “DUCK!”

Thankfully, Sirius’ instincts hadn’t been dulled by a twenty-foot drop. He pushed Remus forward, nearly driving him face-first into the floor of the van, and Barty let the beer can he was holding fly. His aim was true, and they watched as the can smacked Lee dead in the face and—miraculously not empty at all—exploded with all the glorious force of a stale lager.

The show was over for Remus before Lee could hit the ground a second time. As the other skinheads appeared on the flat's porch, Sirius shoved the rest of Remus into the van and hauled the door shut behind them. He gave Trish a nod and she turned to Regulus, who'd already leapt into the front seat;

“Drive!”

With a nasty screech off the transmission, Regulus shoved the gear stick all the way into fifth gear and the van shot forward into the street. He did nearly drive them into a line of parked cars, but eventually they'd levelled out, with Regulus’ elbows locked straighter than an arrow as he struggled to keep the steering wheel from wobbling in his hands.

Lying next to Sirius on the floor of the van, it was all Remus could do to breathe. So far none of them had said anything, and instead the radio prattled on, serenading them with a Village People's song. A second later, and Trish peeked over the edge of her seat.

"You okay there, Loonarny...?"

Remus shrugged, the tiny movement alone drawing a deep groan from deep down inside of him. Hiding her mouth behind one hand, Trish slowly began to titter;

“W-Wow…hah-ha… Heh–he–ha! Boy, Loonarny—when you said to watch out for the locals, ye really meant it.”

Unable to help himself, Remus began to laugh as well. It hurt, but he finished with a groan anyway after Sirius had turned over and smacked him in the centre of his chest.

“You bloody idiot—do you ALWAYS have to throw yourself into every near-death experience?!”

“Ngh… Huh-ha! Shit, Padfoot… How else do you get any character development around here?”

“Character—?!” Sirius finished with another slap, but the sounds of Remus’ pain were drowned out by Barty as he leapt up on his seat.

“Did you see that? Did you see when I threw that can of beer at his face?! HA—it fucking exploded!”

“ ‘Twas a good shot,” Trish agreed. “He’s gonnae be nursing that lump for a while. Here’s hoping he forgets ye exist, huh, Loonarny?”

Unsure whether he wanted to laugh or cry, Remus waved her off, lips pressed tightly together as he cradled an arm across his stomach. When he opened his eyes again, Sirius was still peering down over him.

“I’m guessing you didn’t find who you were looking for,” he said quietly.

The fact alone hurt more than his injuries. Sirius must’ve read the answer in his eyes; he reached out and carded his fingers through Remus’ fringe, his mouth forming a sympathetic smile.

“Don’t worry, I’m sure he’s alright.”

I hope so, Remus thought.

Up ahead in the driver’s seat, Regulus was still white knuckling the steering wheel. “Great!" He shouted. "Now that we’ve established that everyone’s all well and alive, I feel this is a great time to remind you that—I don’t know how to drive!”

* * *

The captain of this lugger,
He was a dirty bugger;
He wasn't fit to shovel shit,
From one place to another;

Friggin' in the riggin'
Friggin' in the riggin'
Friggin' in the riggin'
There was fuck all else to do!

- "Friggin' in the Riggin'" The Sex Pistols, 1979

Later that night...

"Ah! … Augh… AGH, F—SHIT, EVANS!"

"Oh, stop whinging!" Lily hissed, busy capping the jar of ointment she'd been applying to each of Remus' many cuts. She hadn't been happy to come home from class to find Sirius and Trish bent over him on the sofa with a rag in either hand, but of course that hadn't stopped her from barging in and taking over. Remus' back hadn't been faring well ever since taking on the bramble bushes; he felt like he'd been used as a scratching post for several angry cats. After the ointment was applied Lily placed a large stick-on bandage over top, making him wince all over again.

"Honestly, Remus, if you didn't insist on getting yourself caught up in such asinine situations then I wouldn't be here right now torturing you."

"That's what I told him," Sirius sighed. Meanwhile he was across the room, tucked up on one of the sofas and already three drinks in. Remus noted with slight amusement that the beer he was drinking was the same brand Barty had cracked over Lee's nose earlier, but it didn't stop him from shooting Sirius the bird.

"You shouldn't have gone there at all," Lily scolded. "And don't you dare try and tell me you didn't talk him into it, Sirius Black."

"I didn't talk him into it! I just... didn't talk him out."

Lily's green eyes narrowed. "Honestly, I never thought I'd get stuck living with such fools!"

"You sure about that?" Regulus said out of the corner of his mouth. Inexplicably, it made Lily smile, and he quickly glanced away—a gesture that did not go unseen by Remus.

"Well," Lily huffed, “at least I have some good news.” Finished with his bandages, she tapped Remus on the shoulder while shutting the first-aid kid and Remus was able to spin round and face her at the kitchen table while lowering his t-shirt. “Sybill’s given the go-ahead on your guys’ show at UCL," she said happily. "That's right—come next Friday, you four are going to have your first ever live, head-lining concert.”

“No way!” Sirius shot upright on the couch, nearly upsetting Trish’s beer as she went in for a sip. “She really made it happen?”

“You mean real people are going to pay real money just to listen to you bang and whinge for a whole hour?” Barty demanded.

“Even better, Crouch” Sirius told him, “they’re gonna pay to listen to us bang and whinge for two whole hours!”

“Wow. Sucks for them."

Shoving his tongue between his teeth and bottom lip, Sirius tipped his beer toward Barty, who only crowded more closely into Regulus.

“Aw, what’s wrong Crouch? No ‘break a leg’?”

“I hope you break a leg, Black—in fact, I hope you break both of them!”

Not long after, the front door opened and Peter and James strolled in, their hands black with car oil and big smiles plastered across their faces.

“Good news,” James announced, “turns out Little Edge didn’t actually manage to ruin the van’s transmission, so it looks like we’re good to head out to Camden tonight!”

“Are you sure?” Lily asked, peering dubiously at Remus. “I think some of us have had enough excitement for one day...”

“I’m fine,” Remus replied stubbornly. He reached for his coat as he stood up, purposely resisting the twinge in his back.

“Just you wait, Edge,” Sirius said to Regulus as they all congregated by the front door to gather their coats and boots; “The Damned are sure to put on a good show. I know this guy from work, who swears their lead singer's like a fucking vampire or something. Said he even drank real blood on stage once."

"Don't be ridiculous. Vampires aren't real."

"Don't tell this guy that. It'd ruin the whole show."

Regulus rolled his eyes, and Sirius grabbed him by both shoulders, guiding him out the front door. "Ah, don't worry, Edgie. You haven’t seen anything ‘til you see your big brother up on stage anyway!”

With the brothers already out, James sidled up to Peter and playfully shoved a pair of his drumsticks into his hands. “Here, Pete,” he sniggered, “for when Rat Scabies dares one of the audience to take over for him on drums again.”

“As if,” scoffed Peter, tossing the sticks away. “He won't, and besides, I don’t fancy getting my head kicked in by a couple of punks when I don’t know all the notes.”

"I'd fancy it," Barty said snidely, before Trish had him by the ear.

They had to cram together in the back of the van just to get all eight of them to fit, and since Sirius insisted on sitting up front with James, Lily ended up riding the entire way to Camden in Remus’ lap.

“This's so exciting,” Trish exclaimed, her tiny shoulders crammed in between the two Salazar boys. Despite the fact that she’d travelled all the way from the Scottish Midlands to rip Regulus a new one, she’d packed rather poorly when it came to the general wardrobe department. Lily had offered to lend her a blouse for the concert, but in the end she’d gone with one of Sirius’—a cyanotype t-shirt they’d picked up along Portobello Market ages ago. It had Iggy Pop’s face on the front, layered with what appeared to be an x-ray of a very large ribcage. Overtop she was wearing Barty's jacket, of which she'd rolled up the sleeves just to make fit.

“Don’t tell me you’re nae completely buzzing,” she said to Regulus, who up until that moment had been staring out the window, watching as the bright lights of Camden High Street whipped on by.

“It should certainly be an experience.”

“Ugh, you’re like the grim reaper o’ fun.”

Regulus leaned his mouth into his hand, pretending not to notice, but Remus thought he’d managed to catch a hint of a smile in the light of a passing headlamp.

The Damned—or The Doomed, they were billing themselves now; it changed by the week—were playing at Camden’s Electric Ballroom. A bar and roller-disco most nights, the venue was occasionally transformed into a stage house meant to showcase the best and worst London’s rock scene had to offer. Remus had never been, but Dorcas called it a right of passage. You hadn’t lived until you’d seen the club’s bartender smash a bottle over a heckler’s head like it was a Greek wedding.

They parked the van a few streets over, making triple-sure to steer clear of any taxi ranks, before making their way over to Kentish Town Road where they found the club’s entrance already teeming with young fans. The concert being his idea initially, Sirius had generously offered to cover the door fee for each of them on the condition that should the lead singer turn into a vampire bat on stage, they’d all bow down and name him their new prophet. Remus didn’t know how likely that was, but when Dave Vanian took to the stage decked out in white face makeup and a billowing poet’s blouse, he began to think that Sirius’ odds of winning might not actually be that bad.

“He looks insane,” Barty said, before practically yelping as his shoulder came into contact with one of the “no wave” fans. This one was wearing a jacket with enough studded metal it could’ve been considered a lethal weapon. “Do they actually expect people to be able to dance to this noise?”

“Sure, you can dance, Crouch,” Sirius laughed, “just don’t expect to be given much room for pirouetting.”

The crowd was getting on great. Three fights had broken out before the end of the second song, but as none went so far as to draw any blood so most people remained unbothered. Instead they threw themselves skyward, bouncing up and down in place like highly-excitable and highly-inebriated children. An elbow caught Remus in the chin at some point, but when he looked to see who’d hit him, he couldn’t tell his neighbour’s arm from his own. They were packed in like sardines, spilling beer onto each other and practically tramping across their own shoes.

'Go where you want to go,' the song said, 'don't stay locked at home!
Don't be a fool—
Don't cry wolf!'

As far as Remus could tell, this was a people who'd come together purely to lose themselves in the noise. Unlike the Sex Pistols, there was no expectation to be the foulest couture-wearing dickhead in the room, and no one was foaming at the mouth for the chance of getting at some greasy blighter in a leather jacket that happened to share their own political epiphanies as they had while watching the Clash.

They were simply…

'So come and have some fun, yeah!
And help us smash it up—'

There to enjoy.

'Don't be a fool—
Don't cry wolf!'

"Not really your typical anarchists, are they?" Sirius called, shoving his way past a pair of head-banging girls in matching dog collars.

"They're not anarchists at all!" Remus shouted back. "They're just loud!" And better musicians than the Clash and Sex Pistols combined, certainly.

Smirking, Sirius then shrugged in indifference as he pushed a can of Skol lager into Remus' hand. On his other side, James and Peter were taking turns shielding Lily from the more rambunctious members of the audience. When lead singer Dave Vanian began waving his tongue suggestively at them, Lily laughed and slapped James on the arm, probably suggesting that he start doing the same.

Of all of them, Regulus and Barty were predictably having the worst time. Remus had suggested earlier that the two of them hunker down by the bar and get drunk enough to take the edge off, but they'd declined then, and it only became obvious as to why when about halfway through the show, a beefy guy with hair stained vermillion and no shirt on indicated that he wanted to lift Trish up onto his shoulders. She almost accepted too, before Barty did the unthinkable and raised Trish onto his own shoulders himself. From there she had a prime view of the entire room, which she made the most of by shrieking every time the beret-clad guitar player came to the front of the stage to hammer out a solo.

'Problem child, problem child,
We think you live much too wild!
Problem child, problem child,
When you get home—
Your daddy's gonna tan your hide!'

It went on forever. At least, that's how it felt. Back at the Shoestring they had to break in the middle of their sets—let sense reassert itself so that more booze may flow—but at a real concert, nothing else mattered aside from the music. Remus could see the sweat on the band's face and chest and he knew—he knew—what it was to be there. To feel so out of breath you might pass out any moment, to be so in need of a drink of water you think that's it, this is the end!

And yet the rush makes it all worth it.

'Problem child, problem child,
We think you live much too wild!'

Things began to get real rowdy near the end of the show. An amplifier had been blown halfway through, creating a wonderful show of bang and sparks and the guitarist kept knocking over his microphone stand, usually battering some poor member of the front row in the process. If the crowd had been close to the stage before then they were practically breathing on the band now. Though she remained a good sport, James had eventually taken Lily to the back to get some air and Peter seemed to have made good friends with a punk couple who looked to be about in their mid-forties. Sirius was still going strong of course; he and Remus were on what had to be their third or fourth beer, though how Sirius found it so easy to slip in and out of the crowd at will, Remus still couldn't understand.

Trish had since traded Barty's shoulders for Regulus' and—urging him forward with her heels as though he were a saddle horse and not a boy—had managed to gain Vanian's favour, screaming loud enough that the lead singer eventually pulled what appeared to be a kerchief from one of his billowing sleeves and tossed it into the audience for her to catch. A pair of girls just in front had turned around to stare with envy, and Trish smirked as she kissed the silky scarf and tucked it in the collar of her t-shirt.

Somewhere between the raucous "Stretcher Case" and blustering "Neat Neat Neat" drummer Rat Scabies had lost his shirt, playing in only his trousers and a pair of sunglasses missing one lens. He seemed to favour the 'dead behind the eyes' sort of drumming face, but before Remus could finish the thought (or his beer), the song ended and half of the band threw down their instruments and stalked off stage. After that the bassist downed a beer and tossed the can in the audience only to meander off in sure search for more, and all they were left with was Scabies himself. He gave an impressive drum fill—characterised by enough bass drum to burst an ear-drum—and then Scabies stood up from his stool and pointed both sticks at the audience.

"Oi, which one of your sodding cunts has the bollocks to get up here and play? HUH?!"

The room cheered manically, but none were quick to volunteer. Scabies was known for the stunt, often luring an unsuspecting fan on stage only to let the crowd rip them to pieces the moment they were proven as anything less than astonishing.

As the drummer went on harassing them for tribute, Sirius slipped over to Peter and shoved him in delight.

"Go on, Wormtail! The bloke's name is 'Rat', you're practically cousins!"

"Piss off! That joke ain't even funny anymore!" Peter replied, looking a lot like he might throw up.

"Ain't any 'a ya got the balls?!"

"Come on, Wormy!"

"You do it then if you're so brave!" Peter yelled, shoving Sirius toward the stage.

"Me? I can't play the drums!"

“Lupin, then!”

“Sod off.”

Scabies roared into the microphone;

“No one!?”

It seemed like the angry drummer was not about to get his wish. A few guys near the left corner of the stage were playing at it, but every time one attempted to get on stage they’d wobble drunkenly and fall back down to be consumed by the mob. At one point Scabies began shoving them off stage himself, disappointed in their sorry state and obviously low-calibre. Some shouted for him to get back behind the drums and light them on fire—a favourite party trick of his Remus had always wanted to see up close. But Scabies would not have it. While his band mates were off, probably downing several shots and the odd cheeky bump or two, he stalked up and down the stage like a prison warden, shaking his sticks in the air and punting empty cans back into the crowd.

“Pete, you gotta,” James said, having appeared with Lily from the back of the venue. “It’ll be legendary!”

“Oh, go on, Peter! We know you’d be brilliant,” Lily encouraged, but Peter only shook his head again. Outwardly—and perhaps drunkenly—Remus was disappointed, but he couldn’t blame Peter for refusing. Getting up on stage with your own band was one thing—accepting the challenge of real label-signed punk rocker was another. If someone like Sid Vicious had even looked at him, he would’ve folded on the spot.

When several long, drawn-out minutes had passed and no one had risen to the bait, Scabies stormed back over to his kit and unceremoniously hurled his floor tom across the stage. The crowd ate it up, but it was clear not everyone was happy. Trish booed, still clinging to the tops of Regulus’ shoulders, and shockingly, Barty joined her. It wasn’t until the rest of the band reemerged on stage and Scabies took to one of the microphones that the mood finally shifted.

“Bloody pathetic! Since when did Camden Town become land of the fucking pillocks?!”

Initially Remus thought nothing of it. Scabies could only bleat for so long; eventually the band would pick up their instruments and finish out the show, and they’d all go home with their ears and brains rattled to mush. But then something happened that no one could've seen coming.

Again, Scabies hollered—"No one? Is there feckin' no one!?" —and quietly, almost like a sigh, Remus heard a mumbled, "fuck it" coming from his left side.

A small yelp—and Trish had been dropped to the ground as Regulus started pushing past others like Barty, heading for the front of the stage. Like a sailor returning to land, Trish stumbled, and Remus scrambled to catch her as they were both jarred by the eager crowd. Together they watched as Regulus sifted through the sweaty bodies, his face tilted down but hand thrust high in the air so he could be spotted amongst the masses. Me, it seemed to say, I volunteer.

"No way," blurted James, having somehow witnessed the whole thing over Remus' shoulder; "He's not doing what I think he's doing, is he?"

Remus was without words. He could only gape as the crowd eventually began to catch on, parting obediently for Regulus the moment Rat Scabies noticed and pointed a single stick straight at him.

"A-ha! A sacrifice!"

The drummer crowed enthusiastically as he reached a hand down to help Regulus up onto stage. The minute Regulus' feet touched that cheap vinyl platform, the audience went wild. A second later, Remus felt a hand grab his shoulder. Sirius.

"Am I seeing things, or did my baby brother just get on that fucking stage?"

"I think he's doing more than just getting on stage," Remus bleated back. They watched as Scabies righted the floor tom and directed Regulus behind the drum kit to his very own stool. The seventeen year-old kid moved robotically, like he couldn't remember how he'd come to be on stage in the first place, and when Scabies handed him the drumsticks, Regulus stared at them like he'd just been given a live bomb to hold.

"What's he gonna do up there?" Demanded Peter. "He doesn't even know how to play!"

"What, ye think he just sits around in that bloody music room twiddling his bonny little thumbs?"

It was Trish. She and Barty had turned on the rest of them, a single smug look split between them.

“Uh—I don’t know about you, but I don’t think Scabies is gonna let him get away with playing Beethoven’s ‘Moonlight Sonata’ at a rock concert,” said Sirius.

“You mean he never told you?” Barty laughed. "Figures."

“Told him what?” Wailed James.

But Barty refused to say anymore. Sirius demanded it, even threatened to kick him out on the streets if he didn’t fess up, but Barty’s lips were sealed.

“Trish, is this for real?” Remus asked.

“You ain't dreaming, if that’s what you’re asking, Loonary.”

Remus looked at Sirius, who looked at James, who looked at Peter—and instantly they knew what was going on. It was unbelievable—the Marauders were had! Even Lily looked on in shock. Regulus—on the drums? Why? How?!

Sheila.

The thought must’ve occurred to Sirius the same moment it had Remus, for they looked at each other with equal parts shock and realisation. She'd never told them what instrument Regulus had picked up back in September, and now they were finally sorting it out for themselves—at a live concert, no less. Up on stage, Regulus was currently being zeroed in on by all four members of The Damned. The band’s guitar player, Captain Sensible, shoved a microphone beneath his nose so he could introduce himself, but when Regulus said nothing—merely staring out over the room as though his brain had short circuited—Remus had to swallow a laugh of disbelief.

“What’s yer name?” Scabies was shouting, to no avail. The sight of the large crowd had clearly dampened whatever reserve of mad courage it’d taken for Regulus to ignite the little stunt, but when Scabies simply answered with a swift, “Aw, who gives a fuck what yer name is! Let’s just feckin’ play!” and knocked the mike away, Regulus had no choice to comply. A perfectionist to his core, he straightened up behind the kit, readjusting the pair of sticks and began twirling them like a nervous gesture. Scabies leaned down to whisper something in his ear, but when Regulus shook his head, the drummer simply shrugged and stepped away, accepting a beer as it was handed to him by one of the stage hands.

“Right, let’s hear it for the nameless wonder!” Scabies hollered, no mike needed. The crowd roared for him—for Regulus—and eventually the noise died down, replaced by craven need. The rest of the band had their instruments, but it was clear they, like the crowd, only intended to sit back and watch as Scabies tortured his next victim. Already the room was growing restless again. Remus could feel it like the heartbeat in his ears.

Play. Play. Play.

“Well?” Scabies asked him. “You gonna play or not, kid?”

There was no answer; Regulus was frozen, staring down at the drums like they might swallow him whole. Remus heard the heckling start from the back, growing more and more bold;

“Bloody play something!”

“Kick him off!”

“What is he—thick?!”

But it was a different voice that cut through all of it;

“Go on, Edge!” Sirius barked, cupping his hands around his mouth; “Go on—don’t listen to these tossers, show ‘em! You can do it!”

“Yeah, Edge, you can do it!” James added.

“You can do it, Regulus!”

“Play, Regulus!”

“Hurry up, Reginald!”

“Fucking, show ‘em, Reg!”

“Go on! Take the plunge!”

“You’re fearless, Edge! You’re a beast!”

“Play—play!”

“Hell yeah!”

They'd all started. From Barty to Lily, they went down the line shouting their encouragement like a war chant.

Play! Play! Play!

"We're here for you!" Sirius told him. "You're my brother—you can do it!"

"Anything you want, Regulus," Remus shouted, "you make the rules!"

"You're gonna kill it!" James insisted.

It was probably very embarrassing, but knowing Regulus, that was perhaps the only way to get him to do anything. He may have cringed behind the drum kit, but at least it snapped his mind out of its vegetative state. It took the band's eyes off him, and it gave the audience something to listen to—and that, in itself, was enough.

The first hit of the bass drum was like an electric shock to the entire room. It was amplified immediately by a rolling clash of cymbals and a cascade of dropped jaws, though no one could've been more shocked than Sirius.

"Holy shit," he muttered—and holy shit was right. Aside from the drums, the entire room had gone deadly quiet; like a jazz drummer, Regulus' playing had started out as a series of beats meant to rock the tempo back and forth like a boat. He played with his left just as equally as his right, commanding every note with immense precision and growing faster and faster with every hit on the snare. Even just watching, Remus' heart felt like it was in his throat. It felt like watching Sirius play the piano at his father's funeral—the tip of the waterfall, in which the subsequent plunge came faster and faster with every passing second.

Caught in a wave of awe no different than that of their audience, members of The Damned stood around like slack-jawed spectators; their instruments might as well have been lead in their hands. Rat Scabies himself had been finally outdone, it seemed. He gaped at Regulus openly, the beer in his hand all but forgotten, and when Regulus' drum fill came to a shuddering close, he threw his arms up in a clap.

Only Regulus was not finished.

With a booming smash, he launched himself into a blinding fit—smashing his bass and cymbals simultaneously. It took a few seconds, but eventually Remus began to recognise the beat, and it was not jazz.

“Is that Black Sabbath?” Peter bleated.

“It’s ‘Paranoid’,” Remus answered in awe. Next to him, Sirius had his hands in his hair;

“HOLY SHIT!”

All Barty and Trish could do was cheer.

By now some of the other band members had started to catch on. It was only natural; Black Sabbath had set the bar for countless punk groups, and hearing them now, members like Captain Sensible were clearly invigorated.

Taking up his guitar, Sensible took a few seconds to tweak his tuning before joining Regulus in the opening riff. With the guitar it was everything. It broke the audience from their surprised daze and suddenly people were cheering again. They wanted more!

Dave Vanian picked up his microphone;

‘Finished with my woman—‘cause she couldn’t help me with my mind! People think I’m insane—because I am frowning all the time!’

“FUCK YEAH—GO, REGGIE!”

Sirius bellowed louder than the rest, using James’ shoulders to leap high enough so that Regulus might be able to see him if he only looked up. But Regulus wasn’t paying attention to them. The band’s bass player had moved over to the drums, matching his tempo to Regulus’ in a great show of improvisation. It wasn’t a perfect cover—not by miles—but Regulus’ playing had already wowed everyone. He’d peeled himself out of his jacket, and now perspiration was shimmering off his face and bare arms under the hot lights. Across the stage, Rat Scabies may as well have been creaming his pants. He leapt up and down, nearly driving his knees into his own throat while the band’s guitarist, Captain Sensible, threw himself down on his back, playing upside down and looking like the possessed girl from the Exorcist.

‘All day long I think of things—but nothing seems to satisfy!’

The crowd roared.

'Think I'll lose my mind—if I don't find something to pacify!'

There was a crash as someone smashed a bottle over one of the stage monitors.

'Can you help me?'

Rat Scabies picked up the broken bottle—

'Occupy my brain!'

And drank from its shattered rim.

'OHHH YEAH!'

It was like lighting a match and waiting for it to burn down the wick. Captain Sensible was a shit guitarist when compared to the likes of the real Black Sabbath, but no one cared. This wasn't about paying tribute—this was as close to any of them got to God. The amplifiers seemed to get louder, the bass harder, and no one knew what to do. The crowd thrashed as one, fists pumping through the air and shoving coming from all sides. Here was this regular kid, plucked from the masses—a fan, just like them! They wanted a piece, and thankfully Scabies gave it to them the moment he tossed the shattered bottle aside and threw himself over the crowd. They caught him, after perhaps a few concussions, and he crowd-surfed across the entire room while Regulus—a skinny little punk—played his own drums for him.

If Regulus noticed what was going on within the crowd, he did not give any indication of it. Instead he kept his head bent down low, dark hair falling into his eyes like a shield. Maybe, thought Remus, if he couldn't see them, it meant it didn't matter what happened. If Remus could've told him anything just then it would've been that his mother would be very disappointed in how fucking cool he'd turned out to be.

When the song was over, Regulus finished them off with a fill that made you feel as though you were tumbling down a set of stairs. Where he'd learned how to do such a thing—and in only a year—Remus couldn't fathom, but he'd done it. And he'd fooled them all.

Dave Vanian, the perfect punk-rock gentleman he was, congratulated Regulus with a kind handshake. He'd only just pushed his hair out of his eyes, and seemed to be looking around for somewhere respectable to leave the sticks, only Rat Scabies ha made his way back onto stage. As Regulus came out from behind his drums looking like a kid caught with his hand in the biscuit tin, Scabies slammed him on the back for his good work and finished by wrenching Regulus' arm up into the air like he'd just won the Grand Prix. The following cheers were loud enough to shake the entire room, and they muffled Scabies' words when he leaned in to ask Regulus something. Whatever it was, Regulus still did not seem interested; he shook his head for the second time, still breathing hard, and Scabies shrugged before giving him the sticks to keep as reward for his hard work.

Afterwards, when Regulus was free to rejoin the crowd, he was met with even more fans eager to share their congratulations. He had to fight just to make it back to his friends, who were all standing in the middle of the pit with stupid looks on their faces. Regulus' nose was bleeding lightly, but Sirius merely took his jacket sleeve and began wiping it away for him before shaking him by either shoulder.

"You crazy bastard—you never told me you could do that!"

"You were so great!" Lily said.

"More than great! That was goddamn amazing!" James agreed. "Scabies looked likely to pass out when you started playing."

"Thought I was going to pass out," Regulus panted. Everyone laughed, even those nearby they did not know, and as Barty pointed and went on telling everyone that that was his best friend, Trish leaned in to give Regulus a kiss on the cheek.

"Aye, you were brilliant."

"Must've felt amazing," Remus said, giving him a light tap on the shoulder. "What was it you were thinking up there?"

Regulus glanced down again. His hands were trembling, but he just squeezed Scabies' worn out drumsticks and slowly the shaking ebbed.

"I just… wanted it to be loud," he said eventually. "When it's loud, it's like nothing else matters."

"You weren't worried you were going to sound awful?" Peter asked tentatively. At the question, Regulus finally raised his head. Then he looked straight at Remus.

"There are worse things than sounding awful."

Remus smiled, but it was Sirius who hugged his brother. "I have never been so proud and so fucking pissed off at the same time. You... You little shit—You better not be keeping any more secrets from me!"

Regulus shrugged, and afterwards James reached over and raised his hand into the air the same way Scabies had. "Come on, I think this deserves a drink!"

Everyone cheered in agreement, and as The Damned began gearing up for a final encore, Remus and his friends turned for the bar. The music was instantly blaring again, and James looked at Peter;

"Isn't it cool, Pete? Now you got another drummer to jam with!"

"Yeah… S'cool."

Behind them the band's speakers roared;

'Well, you used to hang around on the rails, yeah!
You know they was your patch,
But there's a brand new kid in town;
Never gonna let you live it down, he's gonna—

Stab yor back!
Stab yor back!
Stab yor back!
Stab yor back!'

"Oh, that reminds me!" Sirius called, after they'd reached the bar and ordered a double round of fresh beers; "What'd Scabies say to you up on stage just then?"

Regulus sipped from his can, grimacing; “He asked if I wanted to do ‘Speed,’ but I told him I didn’t know the song.”

Sirius glanced at Remus, and then began breaking down. By the time he'd caught his breath, his laughter had turned to real tears on his face.

“Oh, baby brother—you have so much to learn!”

* * *

A Few Days Later…

"Show me again?"

"No."

"C'mon, pleeeeease? Just one more time."

Regulus scoffed, but set his sticks back against the drums—one-two, one-two—showing off the basic intro to "Paranoid". James followed it with his eyes, enamoured, and when Regulus was finished he leapt up from his nearby stool.

"Oh, I get it. So it's like—" Instead of going for the sticks, he leaned over top of Regulus' shoulders and took both of his hands in his own. Regulus might've rebuffed him for it, had James not been doing the same thing all afternoon. Now he just looked mildly perturbed, hunched over Peter's drum kit with that dark fringe falling into his eyes. When they'd finished, James rattled the cymbal several times.

"Let's go again!"

"I already said no—"

"Just one more!"

"Ugh..."

One-two, one-two!

Finished with my woman—‘cause she couldn’t help me with my mind!
People think I’m insane—because I am frowning all the time!

"Amazing! You know, you could probably start a band of your own if you really wanted."

"Don't be stupid, Potter. Not everyone wants to be you, you know."

" 'Course not. Some people want to be Elvis. Do you want to be Elvis, Edge?"

"Idiot."

"I hear U2's looking for a new drummer."

"Shut up."

A small smile tugged at the corners of Remus' mouth while he watched them. One-two, one-two—"One more?"—One-two, one-two—"God, you're so annoying."—One-two, one-two—"Yeah, reckon you like it though."—One-two, one-two—"Shut up!"—One-two, one-two—

"Oi, Loonarny—is that really how you really roll a spliff or dae ye just proper hate me?"

Not realising that he'd been staring, Remus snapped from his daze and glanced down into his lap to find the joint he'd been rolling had come apart in his hands. He was sitting across from Trish and Barty in the basement of their flat's pseudo-practice room, helping them make use of the last of Trish's London weed stash. Barty's rolls were twice as bad as Remus', with loose leaf spilling out either end—not that Trish seemed to notice. She did slap his fingers when he began tearing the extra rolling papers into little bits though. Barty only sneered at her.

"Sorry," Remus said, licking the side of the ruined joint in an attempt to save it.

"You were zoning out," Trish replied, sounding amused. "Feel like sharing with the class?"

"I just keep wondering whether I should tell James about it."

"Tell Potter about what?"

"Oh, you know. Just Regulus' crush on—"

He didn't even get to finish; instantly both kids' eyes shot up. Barty had even stopped ripping Trish's rolling papers into tiny pieces, and fisted both hands in his lap.

"How do you know about that?" He demanded.

"You mean it's really true?" Remus was shocked. "I only guessed."

"You want my advice?" Trish said, fitting a finished spliff into the corner of her mouth and lighting it up. "Dinnae say anything. Reginald's like a spooked deer—bring it up and he'll ne'er come within fifty feet o' ye again."

"And I'll have to kill you," Barty added keenly.

Remus rolled his eyes. "I wasn't gonna say anything," he said, setting aside the mangled spliff and reaching for another. " 'Sides, there's no hope for it. Everyone knows that Lily's totally gone for James."

"Which is why I'll kill you if you say anything," Barty insisted. Behind them, James and Regulus were still thankfully banging away and unaware, but Trish must've been worried, as she grasped Barty by the chin and held her lit spliff up to his lips.

"Here, bawbag, use this 'n' relax."

Barty did, but only while shooting a deep glare at Remus. It was unsettling, even for Barty Crouch. James was a good guy; if it did somehow come out that Regulus had a thing for Lily, he wouldn't do anything more than tease. Though for Regulus, teasing was certainly enough to push him over the edge.

The mood changed again when the door to the basement opened and Peter sauntered down the stairs. He'd already changed out of his work clothes and appeared rather worn out, but recovered the moment he spotted Regulus sitting behind his set of drums.

"Sirius said you guys would be down here already."

"Yeah, just messing around," James said kindly. "Good day at work, Pete?"

Peter shrugged, then licked his lips dubiously as he gestured to the dum kit. "Thanks for saving my seat, mate."

Regulus was up in a second, awkwardly palming the pair of sticks Scabies had given him. "Thanks for letting me use it while you're gone," he mumbled back.

"Any time."

Remus stood up from the floor, taking a moment to stretch as he called out to Peter; "Did ya see Sirius then, Pete?"

"Yeah, he's upstairs. You know the bloody girl in him takes forever to get ready."

"It's just band practice."

"Hey, he's your boyfriend." Peter tested the pedal of his hi-hat, before snapping his fingers in recollection; "That's right. Phone call for ya, Moony."

Remus shot a look at Trish and the others. "Let me guess, Sheila again?"

"No, it's that Skylar girl."

Shit. "Was she crying?"

"Didn't sound like it. Lily picked up. Told her I'd fetch you."

James gave Remus a hopeful smile. "That's good news then, right, Moons?"

Remus wasn't so sure. Setting aside his bass guitar immediately, he passed Regulus, who'd gone to sit with Barty and Trish and had his head bowed as all three of them shared in whispered conversation. Their eyes met for a second, but Regulus' expression gave away nothing.

Upstairs, Lily was watering her plants, gently pruning the Marlene fern she'd moved into the living room window for more light. Her nose wrinkled when he walked in, and she stifled the overpowering smell with the collar of her shirt.

"Ugh, Remus, you need to stop smoking. I can smell you from here."

"It's all part of the process, Lils. Helps us get loose—'broadens the mind'."

"How you four get anything done, I'll never understand." She hummed. "Phones for you."

Nervously wringing out his hands, Remus fetched the phone. He braced himself for tears—was James right? Was it good news, or was Skylar just putting on a brave face?—and took the plunge.

After a while, he was underwater. He could hear her, but she was far away, like an echo.

Sky?

Hey, Sky…

It's Remus.

You're good? That's good.

Say, I just wanted to let you know that I went back to the flat the other day and—what?

You found him?!

No, yeah—shit, that's great news! Do—Do you think I could…?

He's sleeping.

No—No, I understand! As long as he's alright…

Will you at least tell him I called?

… Mhm.

No, I get it.

Thanks, Sky.

Yup. Totally.

And hey, about the baby—

Yeah!

No…

Alright, I'll call back later.

Take care of yourself, okay?

—Bye.

The phone felt heavy in his hand. He still hadn't hung up, and he could hear the dial tone the same way he could hear Lily, calling his name in concern.

“Remus? Remus?”

There was a short thundering as someone—Sirius—came down the stairs in heavy boots. The front door opened at the same time, and again Remus was underwater. He heard their voices drifting around him;

"Hey there, Mr. Ringo Starr! … Oh don't make that face, you know you love it..."

“Where have you been? Potter’s waiting for you.”

“Right, I’m coming… Hold on, Edge, have you been smoking?”

“Piss off.”

“Hmph.”

Sirius must’ve poked his head into the living room, imitating a Scouser’s accent;

“Heeey-up, Evans. You seen my jacket anywhere?”

“In the cupboard… Jesus Chr—Sirius Black, how many times do I need to tell you to stop wearing your boots inside!”

“Bloody fuck, you and Reg really teamed up today, didn’t you? ‘Shit on Sirius’ day… Yeah, I’m going—I’m going. Make sure you come down and listen some later, kay? … You coming, Moons?"

With their voices far away, Remus began to make a list.

1. Tomny was back.
2. Tomny was fine.
3. Tomny did not want to speak to him.

“Moonyyyyyyyyy—! Come on, Moony, we got a concert to prepare for! Shit, that's mental to say, isn't it? ... Eh, Moony?”

Tomny's fine.

A hand touched his arm.

"Moony?"

He's fine.

Slowly, Remus set the phone down.

Chapter End Notes

A 'flannel' is like a kitchen/dish cloth.
If someone has been 'slated' they've been publicly shamed/ criticized.
'No wave' was a cultural movement that came as a response to “new wave”.
'Wimpy's' was/is a fast-food chain.
'Skol' was/is a brand of canned beer.

Technicaaaaallly, 1979 is not the ideal timeline for a Damned show, but it was important to me that I featured the Damned as long as I was going to feature the Sex Pistols and the Clash. So to any super punk fans out there, please allow me this one deus ex machina.

I based the Damned show loosely on THIS performance. Also Here’s the Sex Pistols version of "Friggin' in the Riggin'". As far as I know you can't find it on streaming services. (I used the Anthrax version on the Spotify playlist .)

Songs in this chapter: “Have You Ever Fallen in Love” by the Buzzcocks (1978), "Heart of Gold" by Neil Young (1972), “Don’t Cry Wolf” and “Problem Child” and “Stab Yor Back”, all by The Damned (1977). Also “Paranoid” by Black Sabbath (1970).

A high five to anyone who can tell me where Regulus got his 'sounding awful' last line from 😎

See you next Monday for chapter 105!

Chapter 105: Figuring It Out

Chapter Summary

It's the Marauders' first concert outside of the Shoestring pub. An old tape turns up, along with a few more surprises.

Chapter Notes

Oooh, getting closer to the end guys.

CW: Suicide by gunshot mentioned in passing. Sexual content (semi-public sex - nothing wild for Cadence standards - some dirty talk??) so pay attention to the '> > >' and '< < <' to skip over.

The song I've written for this chapter, "Hard to Be a Teen", was written to the melody of "Basket Case" by Green Day. Feel free to listen while you read xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You learn to sing!
You learn to play!
Why don't the businessmen,
Ever learn to pay?!

That's show business—
Show business!
Show business—
That's the way it goes!

- "Show Business" AC/DC, 1975

Saturday 21st April 1979

Sheila was still burning a hole in their phone bill, still intent on sorting out just when her precious students would be returning to school, but no one could be bothered to stop the fun long enough to explain. Regulus and the others would be taking the train back to Scotland in a few days anyway, and in the meantime Sybill had made good on her promise to host their next gig. The turnout was good, better than expected even. For whatever outlandish peculiarity she'd projected onto them during their first meeting, Sybill's handle on the UCL student body was impressive. She ran the event seamlessly, directing her volunteers on how to best wrangle the waiting crowd, and she knew where all the plugs would be when it came time to set up.

"You have your own monitoring system?" She'd asked, when they came rolling up to the hall's backdoors with their amps.

"No," replied Sirius, "but I'll wager that if we sounded like utter shit, one of you would've told us."

She hummed at him, then; "You can borrow ours, I suppose."

It was quite the set-up, much more professional than anything they've ever had a handle on anyway. When Remus had first heard about the shows being put on by Sybill's events committee he'd assumed they'd be small, empty ballroom-type things where a few students drifted in between astrobiology and liberal arts classes. As it turned out, these were major college events. Various clubs ran pub crawls for most of the day leading up to every show; even the most donnish student would skip out on an evening of studying to throw themselves around the basement of the university's shabby venue for a few drunken hours.

"Now who're those guys?" James asked, after they'd hauled their equipment inside only to find another group of boys standing at the top of the hall with instruments in hand.

"Student band," answered Sybill. "They're your opening act."

It was startling. Perhaps even more startling than the eager crowd of kids waiting beyond the doors.

"Opening act?" Echoed Peter.

"Mhm. Calling themselves 'The Disciples of Wonder'. They're okay. Bit more 'progressive' than you four, but I figured it would be a better suit than anything with a bongo in the lineup. They'll open, warm up the crowd a bit, and afterwards it'll be all you. I'd say be ready by quarter to nine."

Patiently, she stared at them—still bug-eyed behind her glasses—and the four Marauders shared a wary glance.

"What's the matter?"

“It’s just… We’ve never even opened for anyone before,” James explained. “Seems a bit mental that all of a sudden we have an opener ourselves.”

“Now you’re complaining about not being the opening act? And here I thought I’d seen it all.”

She meandered off, her harem skirt swishing as she walked, and the Marauders had no choice but to be grateful. Admittedly, it wasn't hard.

They were serving drinks in the corner (mostly lukewarm cans of lager), and Sybill had taken the liberty to have one of Peter’s poster designs printed and made into a banner they could hang above the windows behind their stage set up. Opposite to the banner, leaflets advertising for all kinds of clubs and classes papered the walls and among them were the various show bills and fliers of all the different bands that’d come before. Remus recognised a few as one-hit wonders that'd only just managed to get on the radio—Moby Grape, The Knack, and the like—but most were unknowns. Scrubs and punks just looking to make it like everybody else. Eventually James pointed to one. Dick Very and the Headways.

“Holy shit! Now there’s a blast from the past… What was that, tenth year?”

“Eleventh,” Remus corrected. “I wasn’t with you guys in tenth.”

“Right, right. I haven’t heard about those guys in ages. Wonder whatever happened to that Dick Very.”

“I 'eard he shot himself in the face while staying in some boarding 'ouse in Dublin,” called one of the opening act guys.

"You're shitting me."

"No, he's right," said another. "His girl left him for George Harrison’s tour manager or something.”

James looked at Remus, appalled. “Now that’s fucking depressing.”

“A moment of silence for Dick Very,” Sirius said, appearing between them with a round of beers, to which he raised boldly in the air and announced; “To Dick!”

“To Dick!” James agreed, swigging the beer.

Later when the opening act was set to start, Sybill rushed the four of them into one of the tiny classrooms just off of the hall. According to her, they were only ever used for private study around exam time and she apologised for the lack of a proper dressing room, but they weren't bothered. It was simply another luxury they'd never gotten the chance to miss. In fact, Remus would've needed five extra hands to count all the times he'd spent crowded around the Shoestring's bar, watching Sirius check his reflection in a jug of Heineken.

"What d'ya think, Moons?" Sirius called now, raising two coloured eye-liner pencils. "Red or blue?"

"Did you steal those from Mary again?"

"The word is borrow, thank you very much. … Bit harder now that we're out of school."

"But you still make it work," Remus smirked, before pointing at the left pencil; "Blue."

"Oh good. Then that must mean the red is for you."

It incited a small scuffle, in which Sirius had bent himself so far over Remus with the red eyeliner that Remus nearly toppled from his chair. James ignored them, nervously fretting on his unplugged guitar, while Peter had sat in his own corner, drumming his sticks against an empty desk and tuning the rest of them out. (He had also popped a Valium, courtesy of his mum's medicine cupboard, but they'd all taken one and were pretending that it didn't count.)

"C'mon, Moons! Just a bit under the eyes!"

"Piss off!"

The classroom door flew open, and Trish wobbled in, eyes alight and both hands cradling a beer. "Christ, it's an absolute rocket out there! Opening act's a bit mince but they're holding the crowd well enough. You lads should see it—think ye've got about a hundred people waiting to see you play."

"A hundred?!" James gasped, while Remus shoved Sirius off and sat up in his chair.

"Give or take."

James turned ashen and Sirius whirled on him.

“Don’t you dare throw up in here! It’s too small, it’ll reek! Go take the air if you need it.”

Trish, who was busy guzzling from her pair of pints, nodded as she brought the lip of the beer can down again. “Reginald and Bum-face are out back already if you wanna go see them. I’d avoid taking the front door though. Saw a few girls out there that looked pretty off their heads, if ya ken what I mean.”

Setting his guitar aside, James wobbled past her and Remus followed him to the door.

“Can ya believe the price of a beer ‘round here, Remington? Guy wanted thirty-pee just for a fucking can.”

“You know if you tell them you’re with us they’ll just give ‘em to you. We’re not making a wage for this so Sybill promised free beer.”

“I ken,” Trish laughed. “But Crouch paid. Just thought it would be funny.”

With her double-beers in hand, she slipped out after James and Remus turned to holler at Sirius, who was struggling with his eyeliner in one of Lily’s tiny compact mirrors.

“Gonna go have a fag before the show.”

“Hold on,” Sirius called, “can you help me with this first?”

“Ask Pete, he’s got a steadier hand than me.”

“Yes, but once Pete’s done touching up my makeup, I can’t very well give him the homoerotic kiss a moment of that calibre deserves.”

“Relationships between the drummer and lead singer rarely work out anyway,” Peter confirmed, snidely.

Remus groaned, letting the door fall shut as he meandered back toward Sirius. Grinning with victory, Sirius handed him the eye pencil and hopped up onto one of the desks, clapping his thighs as a means to beckon Remus in close.

“Be gentle, Moony. Eyes are the windows to the soul, you remember.”

“Shut up, ya bloody prat. And hold still.”

Sirius smiled, tipping his head back and looking toward the ceiling as Remus drew a blue line across his lower lashes. He struggled to keep the pencil steady, a task not made any easier by Sirius' incessant chattering.

“Don’t forget to smudge it a little with your pinky! Mary says it looks sexier that way."

"Is that right..."

"Oh yeah—it's the 'post shag' look. The sort that leaves you walking funny.”

“I told you to shut up,” Remus grumbled, doing as he was bid. He didn’t say it, but seeing Sirius with those long lashes of his now tinged in messy blue, he was almost inclined to agree with Mary. “Did you check the phone messages before we left today?” He asked, mostly to keep his head on straight.

“Mm-hm,” Sirius mumbled, as Remus moved to do the second eye. "I think Sheila's getting impatient with us. Careful, don't call her back soon and she might disown you."

Remus pinched him.

"Ow!"

"I meant—besides her."

Finished with his make up, Sirius sighed and looked down again. “And nothing—but who cares? We don’t need Spectre. That dickhead wouldn’t know ‘phenomena’ if it clapped him ‘round the arse.”

Remus tried not to be disappointed. It was easier, after nearly two weeks of nothing. In the wake of Lottie’s wedding, a part of him had still been holding out hope that someone at Spectre Records would see their tape and chance it a listen. Then he’d considered that maybe they had. And that maybe they’d just decided that Marauders weren’t worth their time.

Not good enough.

“Don’t look so pathetic, Moons,” Sirius told him, leaning in to kiss the tip of his nose. “Tonight we play London College. Tomorrow—who knows? Maybe Madison Square Garden.”

“And just what happened to four years?”

“Eh. I’m rounding down.”

Remus rolled his eyes, but the smile had already worked its way onto his face anyway. As Sirius began to tease him once again with the threat of Red Rocket eyeliner, Remus leaned in for a kiss. Eventually Sirius had him by the collar, two pairs of eager hands roaming southward in search of a convenient zipper. They were cut short when Peter threw one of his sticks at them.

“Oi, no shaggin’ in the dressing room! … Don’t want it to reek.”

Not five minutes later, Remus had managed an escape for that desperate cigarette. Pushing past the horde of sweaty university students, he wandered through the hall, bobbing his head along to the opening act and nodding genially at whoever happened to look his way. He stopped to pick up one of the room temperature cans of lager, and off to the side, managed to spy Lily sitting around a circle of milk crate bar stools with Sybill and several other girls. No Marlene tonight —she had a night shift at the women’s shelter—but Mary had arrived with them and spotted him straight away, promptly striding over with a black garment bag slung over one shoulder.

“Reeeeeemus!” She simpered—practically yelling to be heard over the sound of the opening band. “Where’s that boy-toy of yours? I brought him that pair of trousers he’s been whinging about.”

“First room off the hallway there. And don’t call him my ‘boy-toy’.”

Mary blew him a kiss, before pinching his bum quite rudely and rushing off. No one seemed to notice, and so Remus took his beer and began trudging his way toward the exit. Bodies parted indifferently around him, paying little mind and mostly just interested in the music. It was a diverse enough crowd for the area; he found hippies with their media arts degrees, philosopher punks aiming to start the next revolution, suits with undergraduate business degrees scheming for their chance at the Wall Street shuffle, and foreign students just looking to take it all in. The Disciples of Wonder were holding their own well enough with an electronic rendition of “Paint it Black”, but even then Remus could tell that the crowd was hungry. Was it for Marauders? Would they even be to their taste? One could only hope.

The air outside was the warmest it’d been all April and for once it wasn’t raining. Tapping a cigarette from its carton, Remus stood back against the hall’s exterior wall and set himself to the task of people watching. Most other students were on break from classes for the Easter holiday, but that didn't mean they weren't going to coalesce on the school quads to share a round of scrumpy and other illicits. Across the pavement he'd spotted a girl wearing a velvet blazer, its collar bedazzled with small crystal skulls. The flashy outfit was hard not to notice, and he paid for it when she caught him staring and returned the look in kind. But Remus was neither interested nor desperate enough for conversation. Adjacent to her, James was standing amongst a circle comprised of Regulus, Trish, and Barty. He was attempting one of Remus' very own lighter tricks, which he sorted eventually—though at the risk of his own eyebrows.

"Wait until you get a load 'a this one," James said after, before whipping out a fifty pence coin. "Learned it in scouts when I was eleven."

"Was that before or after they taught you how to bore people to death?" Barty asked, earning him a sharp pinch on the side from Trish. Regulus merely watched on, holding a beer in one hand and nibbling absentmindedly on his opposite thumb nail. Remus wondered if James would still be so friendly had he known about the obvious crush Regulus had on Lily.

"Alright, now keep your eyes on the coin, everyone!"

Who was he kidding, of course James would still be friendly.

With a quick flourish, the coin had vanished from James' hand only to reappear a few seconds later behind Trish's ear. She giggled, most likely due to the fact that she was at least five beers deep already, and James did the same to Barty, who flinched away and swatted at his own ear for good measure. Afterwards James turned to Regulus, but before he could reach out, Regulus had grabbed his arm by the wrist and revealed a second coin hidden inside the cuff of his sleeve.

James puckered, clearly put out to be caught in his own act.

"You're not supposed to touch the magician…"

"Magician, or court jester?" Regulus snarked, flicking the coin back at James' head. It made Remus chuckle. He might've gone to join them—stopped eavesdropping long enough to test out his own rusty sleight of hand—had the dark-haired girl from earlier not sidled up to him against the wall.

"Bum a fag?" She asked, with a voice as sweet as sugar cane. He passed her one, as was the generosity of addicts, and she leaned into his lighter while drawing her long, oil slick hair behind one ear. “I’m Christine.”

“Er—Remus.”

“Never seen you around here before. First show?”

“Not exactly.”

“You a fan 'a the band then?”

“Yeah, I guess you could say I know 'em pretty well.”

“Well, I’ve never heard of ‘em, to be honest with you.” Smiling, she gestured back to the group she’d broken off of. “My girl there, Nell? She saw them playing in some pub in South London. Said they were brilliant. Practically forced me along tonight.”

“Not your usual scene then?”

“Oh no, I love it actually. Nights like these make for fine enough company.” She took a drag, and Remus didn’t miss the sideways glance. “Nell’s mental though. Straight bloody fell in love with the lead singer, didn’t she?”

She said it like they’d known each other all their lives. Understanding dear Nell’s plight, Remus smirked to himself.

“Yeah, well… He is pretty good.”

"She came hoping she could get his number, but no one's seen him around really."

"He's probably just warming up." Remus raised his fag. "You should know though—pretty sure he's... compromised."

"What, like he's got a girlfriend?"

"That's it."

"Do rock stars even have girlfriends?"

Remus bit his tongue, and Christine eyed him over the end of her cigarette.

“Oh well. Too bad for Nell." She dropped her arm, exhaling. "Say, what’d you say you studied again?”

“I didn’t, actually,” he replied, rather sarcastically. “Or that is, I don’t. Recently unemployed as well.”

She fell silent for a moment, as though she were weighing any positive qualities he might have had against the more glaring drawbacks. Before she could decide, a whistle cut through the air from James. He and the others were standing by the door now, looking at him expectantly.

“Moons, opener’s finished! It’s our turn, now are you coming or is Crouch, here, gonna have to take your place on stage?”

Barty didn’t appear so eager, and while he went on to nail James in the ankle with the toe of his boot, Remus turned back around to Christine, who was gaping at him in realisation.

“Sorry, got to go. Hope you enjoy the show though.”

His smirk was obvious by the time he’d ground out his cigarette and sauntered over to the doorway. James and Trish had already hobbled on, and that only left Barty and Regulus behind to wait on him.

“What’s got you looking so smug?” Barty asked. “What, arrange to meet that barmy girl out back after the show?"

"None of your business, Crouch."

"Gee, for someone who dresses like a frigid librarian, you’re quite the slag, Lupin. Am I gonna have to tell Black?”

Remus raised an eyebrow. “Go for it, Barty. Only means more fun for me.”

He flexed his tongue at him, and Barty scowled while Regulus turned his face to hide a smile.

Inside the ballroom, the mood had shifted. It could’ve been that the Disciples of Wonder had run out of steam and the crowd had grown bored, or maybe they were just looking forward to seeing what would come next. Weaving his way through the lulling mob, Remus made a beeline for the front of the room. There he found Sirius waiting by one of the refrigerator-sized speakers with a pair of shot glasses in hand. There was no real lift to the stage, but a grimy carpet had been rolled out in preparation for the show, now weighed down by a scattered mixture of equipment.

“Have you seen these?” Sirius demanded, using one of the shot glasses to gesture toward the heavy black blocks that made up Sybill’s monitoring system. “Bloody going to be able to hear my own heart thumping in my chest.”

“Almost makes us look like professionals,” Remus replied, taking one of the shots and knocking it back. Sirius smirked at him and then did the same, giving Remus a chance to take in his state of dress. He was wearing a white vest with an anarchy logo he’d painted on himself, only to slice down the middle. Shirt cut deep around his chest, he had Mary’s trousers on again as well. They were leopard print, and flared out at the bottom to show off the black boots he wore on his feet. They had to have been the tightest pair of trousers Remus had ever seen him squeeze into.

“Dunno how anyone could move in those things without losing all feeling in their bits.”

Sirius set his shot glass down on top of the stage speaker and winked. “Easy. You just don’t wear any pants underneath.”

He turned toward the microphone with a cheeky ‘Don’t tell Mary’ and that was what started the concert as far as Remus was concerned. By the time he was slinging his guitar strap over his shoulder, all he could think about was Sirius peeling himself out of those skin-tight leopard trousers at the end of the night. It was their first real show outside of the Shoestring, and suddenly all Remus wanted was for it to be over. Too bad they owed Sybill two sets.

It was great fun, being up there. Even ten years later when the Marauders had reached their peak, Remus would never get used to all the feelings that came with fame—but being on stage with Peter wailing upon his drums and James singing backup for Sirius while simultaneously blowing kisses to Lily in the wings—yeah... That was something that was always going to make sense.

“We’d like to dedicate this next song to all of you other disappointing good-for-nothings out there in the audience,” Sirius called. “And to my mum and dad—fuck you!”

There were several intense cries of agreement, and they quickly followed it up with the opening to “It’s Hard to Be a Teen”. As Sirius began to sing, Remus spotted two girls, Christine and who must've been her friend Nell, fighting their way to the front of the crowd. They waved at him excitedly, already mid-shriek, and just like that the previously sceptical audience had gathered its courage. Hands were cupped to mouths—lungs began to holler—whistles cut the air—and James' rough down-tuned power chords did exactly as they were meant to. It was the whole show really…

Just one big wake up call.

"Do you ever feel like you're hanging by a wire—
Don't move too fast, or else your luck just might snap!
Isn't there anyone left for you to admire?
Someone to put your hopes in—to give a crap?!"

It was a good song to rally the troops with; no monotonous synth-noise, no wailing punk or flavourless folk rubbish. Just pure, solid rock.

"My teachers say I've got no clue!
My parents don't approve of you!
I'm a rebel with a cause,
I think I'm fucked because—
It's hard to be a law-abiding teen!"

A beer can soared across the room, clattering near the foot of the stage; but it wasn't a foul, it was a congratulations. A compliment for rousing them—these law-abiding students—from their mindless, mechanical law-abiding routine.

"Yeah, it's hard to be a teen, hooked on cheap nicotine,
Your body's growing up while your brain's bringing you down!
Your shoes are too tight and your hair is never right,
You'd rather stay in bed, got no urge to get ahead!"

Near the back of the room, Barty had raised Trish onto his shoulders—or rather, Trish had forced him to catch her after launching herself off of one of the stacks of empty beer crates. Remus couldn't see Regulus at first, that was until Lily had taken his hands and forced them up into the air with her own.

"My teachers say I've got no clue!

My parents don't approve of you!
I'm a rebel with a cause,
I think I'm fucked because—
It's hard to be a law-abiding teen!"

It was amazing to hear Sirius relayed back toward them through the monitoring system. He sounded good—more than good! He sounded like he was having the time of his life… Though all Remus would've needed was a single decent eye to see that. Sirius bounded around the stage as usual, playing to every person who dared look at him as though they were the only two people in the room.

"I ain't got no clue…
Good thing I've got you!"

The crowd ate it up. Every time someone got too close to the band, Sybill or one of her fellow committee members would usher them back into their place. The only one who dared cross them was Mary, who stepped up to Sirius on the edge of their red carpet and wrapped a purple silk scarf around his neck mid-song. He kissed her cheek for it, and Remus saw Nell swoon in the front row. Understandable. Remus felt a bit like swooning too.

"My teachers say I've got no clue,
My parents don't approve of you,
I'm a rebel with a cause,
And I think I'm fucked be-CAUSE—
IT'S HARD TO BE A LAW-ABIDING TEEN!"

The song finished with a final flourish—as well as several deep thrashes on the guitar from James—and just like that Remus was breathless and sweating. It took him several seconds to realise that the roaring in his ears wasn't just the feedback from the monitoring system, or Peter tapping his hi-hat; it was the crowd. They were chanting.

Chanting their name.

"MA—RAH—DERS! MA—RAH—DERS!"

It was insanity. Never, in his entire life, could Remus have imagined such a feeling. So many people losing their minds—becoming this excited over something they'd created. Something they'd done!

Remus turned to his left to find Sirius already staring at him, chest rising and falling laboriously. He was grinning—his entire face had come alight.

They love you, Remus mouthed.

No, Sirius replied; They love us!

And it must've been true, because when Sirius grasped his microphone again and asked if they'd like another, the entire room began to shake with cheers.

They did several more before they were finished, including a sped-up cover of "Jailhouse Rock" in which Sirius unravelled his entire thirty feet of microphone cord by leaping into the middle of the crowd and dancing swing-style with any girl bold enough to approach him. Seeing their hands all over his chest and shoulders, Remus suddenly felt a lot more greedy.

When the song ended and Sybill brought up the lights again everyone, he grabbed Sirius by the arm and led him straight back toward the dressing room. At the mouth of the hallway, one of the girls meant to keep anyone from sneaking off to do less than savoury things in the empty classrooms gave them an odd look.

"Sorry," Remus said; "Wardrobe malfunction."

She let them go, whilst simultaneously discouraging any new and curious fans from following. Remus had never been so lucky. The door had no lock, and so he threw a chair against it to ensure they wouldn't be walked in on. As he did, Sirius meandered back toward one of the desks and leaned against it. His legs looked so long in the tacky leopard-skin trousers, and the cheeky way he'd crossed them at the ankles surely wasn't helping.

"Well," he hummed, smugly; "you've successfully spirited me away. Now just where is this wardrobe malfunction of yours?"

"Here." And then Remus whirled around, grabbed the front of Sirius' vest, and ripped it straight down the middle.

For a moment both of them were stunned—Sirius by his sudden nakedness, and Remus by his own sexually-starved brashness. He didn't think it would be so easy if he were being honest, but the flimsy white fabric had practically disintegrated under his brazen fingers.

"You fuck!" Sirius gasped, amused and equally full of disbelief. "This was my only shirt!"

"We'll find you another one," Remus groaned, and just like that he had Sirius up against the desk, those long leopard-clad legs wrapped around his waist. Normally Remus could control himself after shows—Sirius' flirtatious stage presence was mostly fanfare away—but there was only so much a sane man could take. Someone had started the stereo up outside, and the music shook the whole building with fervour.

> > >

"You're so fucking sweaty," Sirius groaned. "Take off your shirt already."

Remus obeyed, and clutching beneath Sirius' thighs, pressed himself even deeper against him, as though he could have fused the two of them together by their chest cavities. Sirius' hands were in his hair as he kissed him, nails scratching against the base of his skull while his tongue traced scorch marks across his lips and teeth. There came a little hitch in both their breathing as Remus began gliding his hands up the smooth planes of his boyfriend's back. His fingers were rough and swollen from the unyielding strings of his bass, and he imagined it might tickle if not for the fervent grip driving every touch. At one point Sirius had slipped the silk scarf Mary had given him from his neck and rather than throw it away, wrapped it around Remus' neck instead, knotting either end around his palms and pulling them taut.

"I do believe you're propositioning me for sex in this very here dressing room," he cooed, when they'd broken apart long enough to breathe. Ignoring him, Remus leaned in for another desperate kiss, but was evaded when Sirius turned his mouth away and pulled on the scarf like a warning.

"More of a classroom, really," Remus replied stubbornly, voice husky with tightness and need.

"Isn't that a bit scandalous for an ex-prefect?"

"Take off those trousers and I'll show you something really scandalous.”

“Naughty.” Sirius’ tongue darted out to wet his lips, but before Remus could chase it Sirius had lifted one hand and pressed his thumb past his lips and teeth. He traced every inch of the inside Remus’ mouth with it, thumb nail dragging across his palate and sending sharp little shivers down the back of his throat. Growing impatient, Remus had just about slipped his fingers beneath the waistband of Sirius’ impossibly-tight trousers himself before Sirius had either wrist in hand.

“If I take off these trousers now, Lupin, I’ll never get them back on again.”

“Good. It’s about time I got a private show.”

Sirius’ eyes flashed; “Very naughty,” but he released Remus’ hands and cupped him round the throat again, bringing their mouths back together. The whole thing made Remus feel bold, so bold that when the doorknob rattled behind them, he almost didn’t stop.

"Occupied!" Sirius hollered. It made Remus' heart seize up, and they pulled apart long enough to stare at the classroom door. Whoever outside must've heard Sirius' shouting, as the rattling quickly ceased. With no way of knowing whether they'd truly gone or were just hanging around outside hoping to snag a peek, Remus reluctantly freed himself from Sirius' long legs and crept over to the door. There was a curtain drawn down over the glass window which he used to peer out of.

"There's no one there... Must've fucked off."

"Or they could just be waiting to catch us," Sirius pointed out.

Remus shrugged, letting the curtain fall shut. "I guess if they are, we can always escape out the window—"

When he turned around he found Sirius completely shirtless, with his zipper open, leopard trousers peeled away at the crotch and showing off two sharp hip bones as well as a trail of dark hair and—

"What was that about the window, Moons?"

Remus had already forgotten. After kicking the chair to make sure it was in place, he strutted back up to Sirius and spun him around until he was trapped between him and the edge of the desk. From there Remus was able to run his hands down the flat of Sirius' stomach, past those dagger-like hip bones and into the cinched fabric hiding the rest of him. It made Sirius' breath come out in a little hiss like music to his ears.

"You sure are eager today..."

Remus pressed his face into the back of Sirius' neck, feeling the perspiration there. With his fingers he forced the trousers down still, until he could take Sirius in his hand.

"They were touching you."

"Ngh—Who?"

"The girls."

Sirius chuckled. "Pretty, right? And so soft."

Remus bit down over the soft flesh of Sirius' shoulder—not hard enough to do any damage, just enough to elicit a tiny whine from deep within Sirius' throat. He could feel his hands all over him—Sirius reaching up and behind as his nails scrabbled for purchase along Remus' hair and neck. Eventually he thrust them forward, and with his thighs trapped against the edge of the desk, Sirius had no choice but to fall further upon it—his bare arms the only thing left to keep him upright while Remus continued attempts to get him off.

Inside, his guts were a tangled mess of arousal. He thought back to the concert; of watching Sirius imitate the moves of those rock stars they'd admired their whole lives while simultaneously doing a better job of it. He didn't know if that was because Sirius was this new-age Mick Jagger come to life, or if Remus was merely eternally biased, but he got the feeling that the two were not so mutually exclusive.

"Moons," Sirius was saying, "Moons—wanna touch you... Feel you."

"You sure?" Remus breathed, nibbling along the shell of his ear; "You were feeling those girls just fine earlier."

Sirius made a noise of irritation.

"Prick."

It was enough for Remus, who flipped them around until they were facing one another. From there Sirius began grappling with Remus' belt and zipper, which both admittedly required less effort considering all Remus was wearing was the same simple pair of jeans he wore every other day. At least now they could kiss each other again though, a fact Sirius took full advantage of as he stuffed one hand down the front of Remus' pants. With the other, he reached for that devilish purple scarf and began slowly wrapping it around the centre of his palm.

"Imagine it," he cooed, squeezing both hands temporarily and drawing a shudder from Remus' mouth, "you, me... backstage at a real concert —a hundred thousand people waiting on us."

He tried. All that came out was—Sirius. Sirius.

"You're insane."

"Maybe. But I ain't letting you go." Sirius pulled on the scarf, forcing Remus face downwards until their mouths were hovering a mere hair's breadth from each other. "No, Moony... I'm gonna fuck you."

If Sirius hadn't kissed him just then, Remus was half-sure he'd have bitten clean through the middle of his own tongue. They weren't novices at this by now—they knew how to get each other really going, and better yet, they knew what it took to finish in a way both of them liked. It'd been wonkier in the beginning, mostly a lot of nervous chittering and unsteady hands—Does this feel alright? Are you okay? Tell me if it hurts. Tell me what feels good—but eventually they'd gotten it. Now Remus knew Sirius' body like the loops and lines of a map. He laid down a jacket for him and made sure, even in their impatient haze, that neither of them were ever racing ahead of the other. Instead it was like a dance—only that sounded too cheesy so he never said it aloud. Instead he just followed Sirius' lead, waiting for his turn to cup his body like a precious thing and carve out a place for himself within him.

Forever, he thought, with Sirius' arms around him. He wanted to do this forever.

"I'm never gonna get used to it," he panted, "their hands, all over you —wanting you."

"Yeah, but you have me."

He did. He really did. Sirius was everywhere. And as deep a place Remus had made inside of him, the hole Sirius had opened up within his own body was just as full. Now he couldn't live empty anymore.

"Love you," Sirius moaned near the end. He always said it like that—heh, love you—like he was waiting on some snappy retort, which he often got because Remus was almost always feeling cheeky when he said it. Today was no exception. He slid his hand up the side of Sirius' neck, thumb pressing against his bottom lip, close.

"Eyes on the prize, Padfoot."

"Prick." Sirius sucked on the digit. "Hold me tighter."

Remus did.

<<<

They emerged later twice as sweaty but more satisfied than they'd been when the audience was cheering their name. Luckily for them, they hadn't been forced to make use of the window; Peter had arrived to fetch them around the time Sirius was forcing himself back into the skimpish trousers. ("Don't tell Mary.")

“If you’re gonna sneak off and shag, could you at least do it with a few less eyes watching?" Peter let out a heavy sigh. "You’ve got about a dozen girls lined up outside wondering where you went.”

"You could always tell them the truth, Wormtail," Sirius said blithely, "give Sybill something to really print in that zine of hers."

Peter threw a beer can, which rattled across the floor at their feet. “Just hurry up! Second set starts in ten.”

The door shut, and Remus turned on Sirius again—shirt off and silken scarf still wrapped securely around his throat. Sirius thumbed it a moment, looking half-fucked and completely devastating.

"Still got ten minutes," he murmured, "we've managed with less."

"You're talking about a second round?" Sirius tutted. “I just got these trousers back on. And unless you'd fancy another Wormy visit...”

Remus groaned, wrapping his arms around Sirius' bare torso in protest. “We should’ve never formed this band. It's a complete waste of time.”

“You’re right. Perhaps we should quit—get a job at one of those sex shops in Soho. Much more conducive to shagging.” He pulled on the scarf cheekily, and Remus shook his head, feeling a very real blush flood into his cheeks.

“Mm, yes, how tempting." Stepping back, Remus watched as Sirius fit his boots on again. His shirt was still torn, and as Remus began looking around for a replacement, Sirius nudged him and said not to bother.

“I think it suits me, don’t you?”

A fresh wave of jealousy had washed over Remus by the time he was watching Sirius stroll past those girls waiting in the hallway outside their dressing room. He'd returned the white anarchy vest to his body, only now it was torn down to his navel, somehow showing off even more skin. After squeezing through the crowd, they met their friends by the hastily assembled bar where James was already waiting with a beer and a knowing look.

“You two just couldn’t help yourselves, could you?” He mused, thumbing Sirius’ torn shirt. "Jesus, Moony. You're an animal."

"Damn straight," Sirius grinned.

“Mind your own,” Remus told James, taking a seat on one of the rickety stools ahead of the counter. A sort of circle had formed around them, made up of other students keen on ogling, but not brazen enough to assume that they could actually be a part of the group. Remus, who was only used to being revered for the pranks and tomfoolery they’d pulled at school, glanced around anxiously. It felt as though he were waiting for the ball to drop; like soon the only sane person in the room was going to materialise just to tell them off for being awful during their last set.

Down the bar, Lily made herself comfortable on James’ lap, while Peter and Mary seemed to be heavily engrossed in a conversation of their own.

“No Moira?” Mary was asking. Her question made Peter squirm a bit.

“Seeing her tomorrow. You know rock shows aren’t really her thing…”

“Where’s that brother of mine?” Sirius pondered aloud. “The drum kit’s empty—I was gonna dare him to play something. Think he could manage all of ‘Moby Dick’.”

Sirius’ cheeky remarks aside, no one had an answer; Regulus and the others were missing, presumably off on their own somewhere. Perhaps they were back to bumming smokes outside, or else locked in the toilet while one of them puked their guts out. Remus was hoping for the former, but Sirius didn't seem too worried.

"Ah, well. S'not like they can get into any more trouble than we did," he smirked, elbowing Remus suggestively.

"And just how much trouble would that be?"

The question came from further down the bar, where a stranger Remus might've mistaken for one of the more domineering business students was sitting on his own and sipping from a bottle of lager. Juxtaposing the cheap beer, he was wearing a cream-coloured suit jacket and what appeared to be a very nice watch. His hair was a dark auburn and he had the tell-tales signs of a four o'clock shadow sprinkled across a handsome jaw. Certainly no student. A tutor, maybe?

"You boys put on a good show," he said, before gesturing to the empty bar stool on Remus' far side. "May I?"

Remus shrugged; "Do as you like," and the stranger moved down towards him, leaving his lager behind. After sitting, he tapped two fingers on the bar top and it was instantly replaced by the bartender, who said nothing as he moved along to serve other waiting customers.

"Gideon," the stranger said, offering Remus his hand. "I've been watching you guys."

"In a good way or a weird way?" Scoffed Sirius.

"Not much difference in this industry, is there?" Gideon jutted his chin toward Peter. "I liked your drum solo on that last song. You could give Mitch Mitchell a run for his money. And you—" He pointed to James; "Play any harder and you'll break all five strings."

James baulked; "Well, I—"

"I once watched Johnny Ramone break three strings in less than five minutes, and he couldn't do half of what you just did."

James and Peter shared a glance, clearly floored by the generous compliments, but Remus was getting a bad feeling. He'd heard this sort of name-dropping before, and it'd almost cost them everything. Thankfully he wasn't the only one getting suspicious.

“Can we help you with something?” Sirius asked.

“To be determined.” Gideon smiled, then he turned to the bartender and handed him a fresh note. “Four beers, and two of those sparkling mezcals for the ladies.”

“I’ll take a beer actually,” Lily said, eyeing Gideon suspiciously.

“Fuck that, I’ll take the cocktail.” Mary cracked the tab of the admittedly prettier drink, sipping it prudently. “So Gid—can I call you Gid?”

“Only my friends call me Gid,” Gideon said openly. Mary gave him her best ‘hook, line, and sinker’ smile.

“Brilliant. Well—Gid—I hope you don’t take this the wrong way, but you don’t exactly look like the average university student. Are you just visiting?”

“Ah, good, I like savvy women. And it appears you’ve caught me, Miss…?”

“Mary.”

“—Miss Mary. You see, I don’t get out to these school shows that often, but a little birdie told me that tonight might just be worth my while. And well—” He raised his lager; “looks like my little birdie was right.”

“Where are you from?” Remus asked.

“Plymouth, originally.”

“No, I mean, why are you here?”

Gideon sipped from his drink, though his lips were a smile around the bottle rim. “Suppose I should finish introducing myself.” Still looking smug, he set the bottle down and began reaching for something inside his suit jacket. “My full name is Gideon Prewett, and I represent what could very well be the best business decision you boys will ever make.”

“Right,” James scoffed. “And I suppose you work for EMI?”

“Oh, ha. Not quite.”

With two fingers, Gideon held out a single business card stamped with gold leaf. Remus took it, turning the card over as Sirius leaned his nose in to see.

Gideon A. Prewett, it read; A&R Manager, Spectre Records Ldt.

“Spectre Records?” Mary echoed, when the card finally made it to her; “What’s that?”

No one answered. Instead Sirius snatched the card from her, then the beer Gideon had bought for them—free beer was still free beer, even from a possible scammer.

“How do we know this is real?” He asked, holding up the card. “You could just be lying.”

“Been given a lot of fake business cards, have you?”

Again, no one answered—too embarrassed to admit the truth—and Gideon tilted his head scrutinizingly before ultimately shaking it.

“Whatever. If you must know, your first guess wasn’t all that far off. I used to work for EMI—me and my brother got on as office assistants back in seventy-one. We both wanted to break into management but EMI’s stingy like that. Too much red tape, too many suits to get through to get anything done. It’s why they missed the boat on punk. But you see, Spectre took a chance on us, and we haven’t let him down yet. So I’m hoping… that maybe you’ll help me keep up that winning streak.”

They were confused until Gideon reached into his opposite pocket and pulled out a very familiar looking tape.

MARAUDERS, APRIL 1979

Gideon smirked.

“I hear you boys are fans.”

The penny dropped, and suddenly all of them understood; this was for real. This guy wasn’t just interested in playing them compliments, he wasn't just offering promises.

He was offering them a deal.

“Holy fuck,” James babbled. “Does this mean Gaz Spectre actually listened to our demo?"

" 'Listened' might be being a bit generous," chuckled Gideon. "Let's just say he heard some of it, and what he heard was enough to send someone out to scout you. Namely—me. Which is a pretty big deal, I might add. Usually we just send an intern or something. But plenty of bands can sound half-decent on tape, and it's the top one percent that can do it for real that I'm interested in. So I volunteered to come myself."

"And you think we can do it for—for real?" Peter stuttered, practically slack-jawed.

"Who gives a shit what I think?" Gideon replied automatically. "It's the audience that's gotta care, and judging from what you just did, I'd say you're off to a pretty good start."

It was not the answer they'd been expecting.

"You mean you're not even gonna ask us anything?" James prattled. "Like, who writes the songs or what 'image' we want to portray?"

"What, are you crossdressers or something?"

They shook their heads. Mary stuck a finger out.

"Well, Sirius could almost pass for—"

Sirius clapped his hand over his friend's mouth, silencing her. "How much money do you want up front?"

Gideon scoffed. "None."

None?!

"You think if Queen had had to pay the record company that we would have ever gotten something as great as 'Bo-Rap'?"

Gideon's answer felt different from anything Fletcher had tried to sell them on, and not just because he wasn't asking for money. Their own naivety had done half of Fletcher's work for him, but it was the way he spoke that had really done them in. Fletcher had never let them get a word in edgewise, and Remus knew now it was so there was no time to sort out how not a single thing he said made any sense. He'd sold them a dream with a hidden price tag and then ripped it away the moment he was done with them. Now that they knew the game a bit better, it was obvious that Gideon wasn't going to make it so easy.

"So what," Sirius said, "you wanna sign us on for nothing…? Just like that?"

"No, that's not how this works." Gideon scooted his stool closer, hands moving rhythmically as he spoke; "Look at it this way, say we sign you before you have time to prove your worth and turns out I'm tone-deaf and don't know a grammy winner from a budget wedding band you put together with your mates as a side gig. Well, then the company's stuck with a four album contract that'll never sell and I'm out of a job. Rest assured, Spectre'll take on the initial burden, right—put you up for a few shows, maybe a short stint 'round the bigger cities. No big stadiums or promotional budgets, but if you can prove to us there that you can hold a crowd's attention for a few hours every other night, then maybe you'll have a chance of getting that contract."

"You're talking about a tour," James nodded. "You want us to tour the country—for real?"

Gideon smiled again. "How'd you guys like to play the Roundhouse?"

It was like asking if they'd like to win the lottery.

"Ooh, I know that one!" Mary chimed in first. "I used to do ballet at this little studio right up the road."

Gideon winked at her, then nudged Remus fondly, as if to say 'see?' But something about the manager's offer irked him; it only took a few seconds to work it out.

"Hold on, the Roundhouse has been empty for months now—Subway Sect just cancelled a show. They say the roof's caving in. Care to explain that one?"

Gideon nodded pragmatically. "You're right. No one's used the venue since last summer when Siouxsie and her Banshees nearly brought the roof down. Literally. The whole thing's needing a good refurbishment, but luckily for us, I know the bloke that used to manage it. His name's Jeff Gilbey—he's a good guy. Bought the place when it shut down and worked on the roof himself all summer, only now the floor's rotting and it's basically a write-off. Reckons he's gonna sell it for the land to make up for his losses, but I got a couple other groups interested in playing there first. If you're willing to share the stage for a night then there's a small chance I could get you in, but only if you're interested."

“Is that safe?” Lily asked.

The manager smiled. “Who ever said rock and roll was safe?”

Before anyone could reply, Sirius leapt up off his stool;

“Band meeting!”

Despite several bystander’s sudden interest in the going-ons of the group, the four boys were able to segregate themselves off in a corner where they bent their heads together to parley.

“I dunno,” James started. “It sounds a bit too good to be true, don’t it?”

“It’s always gonna sound too good to be true,” Sirius rebuffed, “it’s the chance of a lifetime.”

“But he’s so charming and good looking. Aren’t you even a little bit suspicious?”

“Paying close attention to his face, were you, Prongs?” Peter drawled. James rolled his eyes, but the rest of them were already sniggering.

“I see he’s already charmed your girlfriend well enough,” Remus added keenly. Back across the room, they could see Lily and Mary giggling at something Gideon was saying. They each had a can of seltzer now and were sipping them as the fancy A&R manager leaned one elbow on the bar.

“Can’t very well blame her,” James grumbled.

The look Sirius gave his best friend read as bewildered, but before he could question it, Peter had already jumped back in;

“I think we should do it.”

“You do?” Remus asked.

“Yeah, he can’t be lying.”

“And how do you figure that?”

“I mean, it’s obvious, isn’t it? Gingers can’t lie.”

“ ‘Gingers can’t lie?’ Where the fuck did you hear that from?” Sirius demanded.

“Sim. He told me once—it’s like a rule or something.”

“A rule that only applies to gingers? What are you—four?”

"Shut up!"

James snorted into his palm. “Pete, mate,” he laughed, “I think your brother might’ve lied to you.”

Peter grumbled unkindly, cheeks turning red, and Sirius slapped him on the back. “Forget the gingers,” he said. “Moony, what d'you think?”

Remus pulled on his neck with both hands. “It’s an opportunity for sure… I think we’d be kicking ourselves later if we let it go just because the guy’s a bit ‘too suave’.”

“Oh, so you think he’s hot too, huh?”

"That's not what I meant and you know—"

"Yeah, yeah, I get it." Sirius sucked his teeth. "Right. I know my track record isn’t perfect, but I also think it’s a good idea. Like, that was our demo back there, and if those stinkin’ sods at Spectre Records liked it, then maybe this is it! Maybe this is exactly what we’ve been waiting for.”

“Sure, but not many bands make it at nineteen,” Remus mumbled pessimistically.

Sirius took his arm. “We’re not just any band.”

That was true, he supposed. It had to be.

"So?" James echoed. "What's the verdict?"

Soundlessly, the four Marauders looked at each other, and one-by-one, each nodded in full agreement.

“We accept your offer,” Sirius announced when they’d returned to the bar; “Just tell us what day we’re meeting Spectre.”

Gideon set down his can of seltzer, already primed with a laugh;

“Oh no, you’re not meeting Spectre. Gaz doesn't have time for every college band who manages to get a demo into his postbox. Nah, you guys are gonna play a show at the Roundhouse—a more than generous offer—and later, if I decide you're worth it, then I'll pass you onto Spectre. Deal?"

They couldn't very well say no. If nothing else, Gideon was right; a show at the Roundhouse was an unbelievable opportunity.

Standing up from his stool, Gideon shook each of their hands while Lily and Mary clapped happily.

"This is so exciting," Mary said. "Our very own band of losers—about to become an even bigger band of losers!"

"C'mere then," Sirius cooed, "give this loser a fat snog."

She squealed, batting him away at first only to later take his face in both hands and leave a cherry-red kiss mark on the centre of his cheek. Just then Sybill reappeared, promptly congratulating them on the good news and henceforth scolding them for being late to start their second set.

"Look at you four, already in demand," Gideon gloated. After giving his hand another excited shake, James and Peter promptly scooted back toward their set-up at the front of the hall. Sirius followed a moment later, muttering something about needing to take a leak, but did linger long enough to watch Gideon finish his beer.

"You're not gonna regret this," he told the manager; "Marauders is gonna be the biggest band in the world, you know."

"Yeah? And who said that?"

"Me. Just now."

"Well then. Let's not jinx it." And Gideon knocked his beer against Sirius' in agreement.

Afterwards, with Sirius gone to piss, the only one left to see the big-shot A&R manager off was Remus. He walked him to the door, where Gideon clapped his shoulder genially.

"Sorry I can't stick around for your second set. The Allman Brothers are flying into Heathrow tonight and I'm to meet them at the airport. It's their first UK tour since the hiatus and Gaz wants 'em treated well."

"Right, but about the Roundhouse—"

“Relax, kid! It'll take a short while to sort everything out, but it'll happen. Just gotta be patient... In the meantime you lads got my card. Got yours too." Already backing towards the hall’s doors, Gideon pulled their demo tape from his pocket and waved it through the air. “Good luck, lads. Here’s hoping guys like the Allman Brothers are opening for you one day.”

Remus wasn’t so much an Allman Brothers fan, but he couldn’t deny the small thrill he felt as he watched Gideon leave the hall.

“You helped make this all happen, you know,” he told Lily when he returned to face her at the bar.

“Did I?”

“Yes. You got us the gig with Sybill. You’re the reason Gideon came at all.”

"You don't think he would've found you at the Shoestring?"

Remus shrugged. "Jesus, Lils, I'm only trying to say thank—"

“You're welcome, Remus," she cut-in fondly. "Anything for the object of my dearest affections. But I will be expecting a dedication at the end of your first autobiography.”

He hugged her, absorbed in her warmth, and when they pulled apart again Lily tapped his nose with her finger and continued sipping on her cheap cocktail. Somewhere between Sirius’ bold claim and Gideon’s subsequent departure a swift drum beat had kicked off from the front of the room. Figuring it for Peter, Remus didn’t pay the noise any mind until Mary reappeared on Lily’s far side, a look of astonishment plastered across her face.

“You guys so aren’t going to believe this.”

And maybe they wouldn’t have, had neither of them witnessed Rat Scabies’ temper tantrum back at the Electric Ballroom. Admittedly, Remus was still surprised. Based on the way Regulus had snapped at Sirius and James for yammering over the feat the entire drive home, he would’ve expected Regulus to never play a single note in front of them again; yet there he was, set up behind Peter’s drum kit and smashing away. Trish and Barty stood behind him looking thrilled, if not completely inebriated. Regulus himself would not look up at all; he kept his head bowed as if his long hair were blinders meant to block everything out.

“Bitches! Why didn’t anybody tell me Regulus could play the drums?” Demanded Mary.

“It’s a new thing!” Lily practically shouted so she could be heard over Regulus’ barrage of sound; “He didn’t tell anyone—not even Sirius!”

“Well, he’s good! More than good, if they’re anything to go by…”

She gestured toward the small crowd of students who had amassed next to the stage. Most were just bobbing their heads along to every thundering sixteenth note, but as the solo went on, more and more gathered, some even cheering and raising their drinks.

“Blimey,” Mary said, as Regulus began slamming on his hi-hat and crash cymbals; “Maybe you guys should put him in the band.”

There was no time to stew on Mary’s little joke. Already Remus spotted Peter as he stormed over to them with an apprehensive-looking James close on his heels.

“Moony, go on over there and tell Sirius’ baby brother it’s time he got himself back into line. If Gideon overhears this mess, it could ruin everything!”

“Gideon’s already long gone,” Remus blabbed. “Why haven’t you asked him to just stop?”

“I’ve tried! The cheeky cunt blew me off!”

“I dunno, I think Regulus is just playing around,” James reasoned. “Look at him—he’s clearly drunk or something.”

“Drunk enough to play that?” Peter wailed, gesturing to the cacophony of noise. “He’s acting like Keith Moon if he were half-bladdered on Adderall.”

Coming from another drummer it might’ve been a compliment, but Remus knew it wasn’t. Above all, what Peter admired in his own drumming was strict precision. He looked up to guys like Neil Peart and Buddy Rich—those known for their flawless technique. He didn’t care for showy solos or insane speed rounds, and for the most part the other Marauders had never complained. A drummer’s job was to keep time, a hard thing to do when based purely off of instinct. Peter had spent hundreds of gruelling hours nailing down every one of their compositions, often having to bend at Sirius or Remus’ every whim. He was a good team player when he wanted to be and probably deserved more compassion, but as it was, Remus was still riding the high of Gideon's offer. He didn't quite want to be brought back down to earth yet, and so instead he said;

"It's just a drum kit, Pete."

"Wrong!" Peter spat. "God, you don't get anything, do you?"

He stalked off, and Remus and the others were left to flounder in his wake.

"Where's he going?" James whined. "Sybill will murder us if he just leaves—we still got a whole 'nother set to do!"

"We'll go get, Peter," Lily offered, taking Mary's arm. "In the meantime you two idiots might want to think about getting Regulus off of Peter's drum kit."

It felt like getting a scolding in primary school. While James shifted his weight uncomfortably, Remus scanned the crowd for any hint of Sirius, of which there were none.

Regulus was still going by the time they'd made their way behind the drum kit toward Trish and Barty. A few girls had crept closer to the kit the longer Regulus played and appeared to be trying to speak to him. As far as Remus could tell, Regulus hadn't said a word in reply—hadn't even looked up. Luckily for him and James, Barty was all too willing to gab.

"Saw Puny-grew throwing a fit," he simpered. "Poor bloke. Must be hard feeling so second-rate in your own band."

"Shut your mouth, Crouch," snarled James. "I know you were the one who put Regulus up to this, and it's Peter's drum kit."

Barty raised his arms in mocking surrender before gesturing to Regulus in a 'go ahead' motion. Glancing warily at Remus, James moved forward.

"Regulus?" He shouted, leaning in only to swing his face out of the way when Regulus went for his crash cymbal. "Regulus! Edge—it's me! James! Can you… I mean, could you stop for a moment?"

The crowd was booing before Regulus had even stopped, but he did—slowly, like he was caught in a trance.

“You good?” James asked.

“War Pigs…”

“Huh?”

“I said the song’s called ‘War Pigs’! Fuck, le'me alone!”

He was talking to James like he was one of the pestering girls, Remus realised. It was hard to tell if James had come to the same conclusion though; rather he looked almost hurt.

“Regulus, mate?” Remus called, coming in close. “Are you feeling alright?”

Regulus ignored him, slashing at the snare while tapping his foot against the pedal of Peter’s bass drum; thump-thump-thump-thump!

Remus turned to his friends; “How much has he had to drink?"

“Only about twelve beers,” yawned Trish. “And a little pinch 'a weed.”

“Isn’t that a bit excessive?” Griped James.

She shrugged. “Lollyhead almost never smokes it. He asked for some after your first set. Couldn’t think of a reason to tell him no.”

“Yeah? I can think of about twelve different reasons,” Remus scoffed. By now James had Regulus by the shoulders, and was slowly easing him out from behind the drum kit.

“There you go, champ,” he smiled, wrapping an arm around his shoulders. “Let’s get you some water.”

For the most part, Regulus appeared agreeable to this, but then some girl who’d been watching him play came up to his other side and took him by the arm. She’d only said about three words before Regulus was wrenching himself free, his expression similar to a kid who’d just stuck his fingers in a light socket and gotten burned.

“Sorry,” James apologised, “he’s a bit out of sorts right now.”

The girl stepped back disappointingly, but by then Regulus had recognised just who it was who was leading him.

“Potter…”

“That’s my name.”

“Get… gerroff.”

“Don’t be difficult, Edgie. Just gonna get you some water and then we’ll all be right as—”

“I said—get off!”

The cry was viscous, and James released Regulus before he could take a drumstick upside the head.

“I don’t need your help,” Regulus warbled. “Don’t… Don’t touch me.”

“Right,” James huffed, “you wanna tell me today’s date then? Or even your name? ‘Cause you look higher than a kite, mate.”

“Fuck off. Why don’t you just go find your perfect little girlfriend and leave me alone for once, you stupid prick!”

A few nearby watchers sniggered, and Remus got the distinct sense of deja vu.

“What are we, back at school?” He grumbled, walking forward. He took the drumsticks from Regulus, who didn’t fight, and then pushed him by the shoulder. “Walk on, ya bastard, or I’ll carry you.”

The look Regulus gave him could’ve curdled milk, but Remus didn’t care. He pushed him again, lightly, and looked back at James. “Sorry, Prongs. How ‘bout you just go find Peter and the girls? I’ll be right back with this one.”

James nodded, glancing once more at Regulus, who did not return the look.

“And you two—” Remus pointed at Barty and Trish; “Any more trouble and you’re sleeping in the rain.”

Trish blew him a kiss—as did Barty, though his was of the more crude variety.

Back at the make-shift bar, Remus sat Regulus down at one of the empty stools and pushed a cup of water toward him.

“James was just trying to help you out. You didn’t need to bite his head off.”

“Yeah? Well, Potter can get fucked.”

Remus rolled his eyes, tapping the drumsticks against the bar top in irritation. “You know, just because you have a small thing for Lily doesn’t mean you get to be a dick to James whenever you want.”

Regulus flung his cup over, nearly soaking the front of Remus’ trousers.

“What the hell—”

“You say anything like that again and I’ll take your eyes, Lupin!”

“Jesus… Where’d you even hear that—an Al Pacino movie?” Remus found a stack of old newspapers in the bin to his left, which he used to begin sopping up the water. “You’re going back to school in a few days,” he muttered, “are you sure you wanna leave on such a sour note?”

“Piss off.”

“You should really work on regulating that temper of yours. You’re starting to sound like a broken record.”

“Don’t psychoanalyse me. I pay people for that.”

Remus shook his head. Tossing the wet newspapers aside, he gestured for another glass of water. “Are you at least glad you came?”

“No, your first set sucked.”

“Cheeky prat… I meant London. It’s only been four—five bloody weeks since you got here.”

Regulus fell quiet, contemplating his water. “Sirius is worried,” he said after a while. “I can see it every time he looks at me.”

“ ‘Course he’s worried. You’re his brother.”

“No, he’s worried I’ll go back to school and end up doing everything our mother wants of me. He’s worried I’ll turn out just like the rest of our family—horrid.”

Remus turned his head away, disguising his obvious wince with a gentle scratch to the back of his head. He hadn’t anticipated any confessions.

“Well… will you?”

He felt stupid for putting it so plainly, but couldn’t come up with any other way to phrase it without beating around the bush.

“I don’t want to,” Regulus said. “And I… I don’t want to go to university either.”

It was a surprise to say the least, especially for someone as smart and talented as Regulus. But then again, Sirius had been the same way.

“Got any plans then?”

“No."

"None at all?"

Regulus mumbled something.

"What's that?"

"I said—that I… may like... being in London…”

“Oh?!” Remus tried not to sound smug. “Really?”

“Yes, but that’s not a plan.”

“Who says? You think we moved out here with jobs all lined up and the perfect flat just waiting for us? Nah. We figured it out as we went along, just like everyone else. We had help of course—Sirius’ inheritance, James and Peter’s parents—heh—Lily. But we did it. And you can do it too, if you’d like.”

Regulus rolled his eyes. “I hate your pep talks.”

“Yeah, I know.”

By then the bartender had come round again to offer Remus another beer. He abstained—for once—and instead asked for a water. When the guy brought it to him, he raised it to Regulus.

“To figuring it out.”

“You’re not really going to make me cheers with you, are you?”

“Go on, do it. Otherwise I’ll tell James you fancy his girlfriend.”

Regulus glowered, but reluctantly raised his cup and knocked it into Remus'. Feeling well pleased, Remus sipped from his cup—tipping it back just in time to glimpse Sirius bounding toward them from the back doors.

"There you are!" He cried, wrapping his arms around Regulus from behind. "Edge! Have you heard the good news? Your big brother's gonna be headlining the Roundhouse."

"Congratulations," Regulus hissed, already pushing him off.

"It's shit you're gonna miss it."

"He'll catch other shows," Remus said. "Won't you, Edge?"

Regulus rolled his eyes, picking up his water.

"Shut up, Lupin..."

* * *

"My teachers say I've got no clue! My parents don't approve of you!" I first heard the lyrics in a little pub over in South Bank. When I started hearing it again in my head weeks later, I knew I had to go back. A week more and I was scribbling their name on every scrap receipt I could find. I paid a kid four and a half quid to write the lyrics on the walls of an Underground station, then I snapped a photo. It's still in my wallet now, soon it'll be printed on the front cover of this magazine.

MARAUDERS. It must be love.

It's 1979 and punk is dead. "God Save the Queen" – the Queen is saved. There ain't no more British pop and Bowie's jumped ship to drop acid with Iggy in New York. All that's left is new wave speed and inconsistent E flat shock chords. Not that anyone's told MARAUDERS that. With melodic songs and near impeccable manners, this four-man band cannot claim to be the new Kings of Punk, nor do they care to. They are something else entirely. Something old, something new, something borrowed—full debut.

Can you hear them?

Remus lowered the copy of Sybill's Slasher Chick fanzine. He'd lost count of how many times he'd read it since she'd dropped it off yesterday morning, but it wasn't nearly enough. According to Sybill they'd already pawned off almost a hundred copies since their show just four days ago. They weren't the only subject—she'd also managed to snag an interview with one of the Ramones' ex-roadies and there was a controversial opinion piece on page nine titled "My Vagina's No less 'Holey' than Yours" critiquing the Catholic church's view on abortion—but there was no denying that the Marauders took front page. There wasn't much way of devising who said what thanks to the way Sybill had penned the interview, save for the fact that Remus had actually been there. Reading it back now, he could picture every word perfectly;

Sybill: How old are you?

Sirius: Twenty-one!

Peter: He's lying, we're nineteen.

James: Eighteen, in Pete's case. He's not nineteen until September.

Peter: Wanker.

Sybill: What have you been doing in London lately?

Sirius: Shagging as many hot women as possible, naturally.

James: No, don't print that.

Remus: Potter's worried his mum might read this.

Sybill: You can say what you want. We're not aiming at the general public anyway.

Sirius: Yeah, that was a joke, but we say what we like…

Sybill: Now that the Pistols are through and the Ramones have gone back to New York, there's a lot of curiosity about the London scene and what'll come next… Do you expect to be next?

Peter: I wouldn't say we represent the entire scene…

Sybill: Who do you represent?

Sirius: The sexy people.

Remus: You're going to sound like a twat.

Sirius: mimicking R You're going to sound like a twat.

Sybill: How do you feel about New Wave?

Sirius: No comment.

Sybill: Are you old school then?

Peter: Nah, we're new school.

Sybill: Do you have any dreams to be distributed in America one day?

James: Oh, sure!

Remus: But we'd like to be distributed in the U.K. first.

Sybill: Any other groups in London you feel are any good?

Sirius: The Damned are the only one with a clue. It's why they got left behind.

Sybill: How about the American bands?

Peter: Didn't we just talk about the Ramones?

Remus: Iggy's good, but his band sucks. And he should stop partying with Bowie – selling self-destruction as art doesn't suit Bowie, and Iggy's better on his own anyway.

Sybill: You've heard about Patti Smith?

Sirius: Yeah, and she talks too much.

Sybill: Takes herself seriously.

Sirius: Oh, course! She's an artist.

Sybill: Do you think of yourselves as following the tradition of rock 'n' roll or going against it?

James: What's the tradition of rock 'n' roll again?

Remus: Dying at twenty-seven.

James: Oh…

Peter: Against. Definitely against.

Sybill: What will your music be like in a few years?

Sirius: Interview us in a few years.

Sybill: Are you guys comedians or something?

(No answer.)

Sybill: Mods or punk rockers?

Peter: Mockers.

Sirius: You stole that from Ringo.

Peter: Sod off.

Sybill: Is this the worst interview you've ever done?

Peter: It's the first interview we've ever done.

Sybill: You're playing at the Roundhouse in a few weeks. How does that make you feel?

James: Don't ask unless you've got a bucket.

Sybill: You each come from substantial backgrounds. Do you see this as a hindrance or an advantage?

Sirius: You said there's no chance of our mums reading this?

Sybill: It's not likely.

Sirius: Bollocks.

Remus: Right, we know what we look like. Four shit-eating toffs who've never done a hard-day's work in their lives. And maybe we haven't – we've been granted a lot. But we're not looking to tell anyone how it is, or what it is they should believe in.

Peter: Lots of people have talent, just not the means of funding it.

James: That's right. Not everyone could afford to do what we did. Sometimes it's all you have just to wake up and put food on the table.

Sirius: We're not claiming to be the most self-aware. We were given a head start, we see it. Mostly we're just here for the art.

Sybill: And what would you say to those that might say you haven't suffered enough for the art?

Sirius: You haven't met my mother.

Peter: And art isn't just suffering.

Sybill: What is it then?

Peter: It's everything. It's part of everyday life.

Sybill: So you're not just posers?

Remus: Everyone's a poser. You think Jesus wasn't posing on that cross? We don't just write what we know, we write what we feel. If they're gonna hate us then that's life, innit. Everyone hates you.

Sirius: Now who sounds like a twat?

(R shoves S.)

Sybill: Lupin, you write the lyrics, don't you?

James: Is it that obvious? Our little Shakespeare.

(R shoves J.)

Sybill: Last question – If you could say one thing to London's youth to wake them up, what would it be?

Sirius: That getting your prick sucked feels better when you're awake.

They'd made fun of each other for hours afterwards—" 'everyone hates you, that's life, innn-it, Lupin?"—and in the end James asked Sybill for an extra copy to send to his parents.

Now it was late April, and Regulus and his friends were due back at school so that they could pass their exams and get on with their lives. Remus wasn't sure what would come after, but Regulus had an open invitation to their couch, and—should he so choose—an offer from his big brother to support him at whatever university he should choose. With their first big-time show at the Roundhouse just on the horizon, it was all getting very real, very fast.

For now though, it was time to say goodbye.

“You’re sure that’s all of it?” Remus asked, while setting the last of the bags down by the front door.

“Should be,” Regulus replied, checking his trunk’s clasps. When he’d arrived the trunk had been relatively light. Now it was heavy, packed full with clothes, music magazines, and records Sirius had insisted on sending his brother back to school with. Culture, he’d called it.

“Excited to be going back?”

Regulus shrugged. “Where’s Sirius?”

“Still upstairs, I expect. I’m sure he’ll be down soon.”

This time it was a nod, and then Regulus let his gaze drift out the front door. Trish and Barty were already standing on the pavement with their bags, waiting on the taxi Lily had been kind enough to call for them. They were arguing about something—Trish making a face, Barty rolling his eyes. She’d just grumbled something very Scottish at him when Barty reached a hand toward her face, only to have his fingers slapped away viciously.

“Crazy bird! You had dirt on your collar—I was only trying to brush it off!”

“Brush your own dirt, Bawbag!”

“Bleeding Christ, you’re infuriating.”

“Wow, that’s a big word for you. Can you even spell it?”

Remus touched his thumb to his lip. “Are those two really…?”

“God, I hope not,” Regulus grimaced. “There’ll be no living with them.”

He smiled, then fit his fingers into his mouth for a whistle. "Oi, MacDuff! Got something for ya!"

Down on the pavement, Trish turned around and Remus tossed her the small object. Instantly Barty had crowded in to see what it was, but she answered with a cry;

"My hag stone!"

"Gloine nan druidh," Remus corrected, almost certainly butchering the pronunciation. "You were right. Turns out it is lucky, after all."

"Not 'lucky'," she scoffed, before setting a hand over her eyes. "Don't you want it?"

"Do me a favour and hold onto it 'til the next time I see you."

It drew a smile from her, and she clutched onto it. When Barty curiously reached out to touch, she swatted his hand. It would've been endearing, were it not Barty Crouch.

"God," Remus scoffed, turning back to Regulus. "What did you even manage to do with Crouch? Can't believe I'm saying this, but he might actually be less of a little dickhead now."

“If you think I’m about to take all the credit, you’re daft.”

Chuckling, Remus reached out and pat Regulus on the shoulder. He rethought the gesture the moment Regulus began veering away from him, and rubbed his hands together afterwards to hide the awkwardness.

“So… We’ll be seeing you in the summer then?”

“Only if Sirius doesn’t come to his senses first.”

“He means it when he says he wants you here,” Remus promised. “And you’ll like London. It’s not exactly the city of dreams or anything... but it’s got some decent opportunities if you know where to look. You’ll say hi to Sheila for me in the meantime, yeah?”

“I didn’t know she was your godmother,” Regulus said. “It explains why she talks about you so much.”

Remus pressed his lips together, staunching a smile. “I’m gonna go get Sirius,” he told him, patting his arm once more—quickly this time, so that Regulus couldn’t avoid it. “Don’t go anywhere, Edge.”

Before he could even wink, Regulus had flipped him off, and Remus began backing towards the stairs. On the above landing, he ran into James, who was coming out of his and Lily’s room with a small tin under one arm.

“The others still here?”

Remus gestured back down the stairs in confirmation. “Those from your mum?”

“Yeah. I told her that Regulus really liked the kheer she’d made, so she wanted to send him back with some baking—you know, like how she used to do for us. Is Sirius down there?"

"Nah, looks like he's hiding out. I'm gonna go get him right now."

"Ha, bloody coward."

"Don't be too hard on him," Remus smiled. "I think he's just sad his brother's leaving."

James began backing down the staircase. "I swear, Moons, had you said that to me a year ago I wouldn't have believed you."

"I wouldn't have believed me either, Prongs."

Leaving James to it, Remus ascended the narrow set of stairs leading up to his and Sirius' bedroom. He was half-expecting to find Sirius pacing the room nervously, and was fully ready to commit to his usual pep talk, only, when Remus walked into the room, it looked as though a bomb had gone off in one of the wardrobes. Clothes were strewn everywhere, carpeting the bed and floor with an unnerving amount of leather and spandex.

"Sirius, what are you doing?"

"What's it look like?" Sirius grunted. He was on his hands and knees before their wardrobe, digging through the bottom of it as though it were a skip bin and he'd accidentally thrown out a box of takeaway that was still good.

"Dammit. I put it in here so I wouldn't lose it, and now I can't bloody find it!"

Stepping over a stray boot, Remus sat down on the corner of their bed, feeling the mattress sag beneath him. "Wanna tell me what it is you're looking for?"

"My leather jacket—the old one. I had Wormtail update it for me. Wanted to give it to Reg as a going away present."

"Stunning. 'Cept it's sitting right here."

Sirius sat up so fast he smacked his head against the wardrobe's door handle. After cradling his scalp for several minutes, he ceased his moaning and finally crawled back over to the bed, where Remus had unearthed the old jacket from beneath a pair of horrendous tartan trousers Sirius had procured over at the Spitalfields Market.

“You’re brilliant, you are,” Sirius said, giving Remus a quick peck as he stood up and raised the jacket. “Think he’ll like it?”

Remus didn’t get the chance to reply; instead Sirius turned the jacket around to reveal the name “EDGE” slashed across its back in white paint. A tiny “made in London” took up the rest of the space toward the bottom, painted in all the colours of the Union Jack.

“Do you like it?” He grinned. “Glows in the dark too.”

“Do you want my honest opinion?”

“Okay, so it was mostly a joke,” Sirius admitted, folding the jacket over one arm. “Just wanted to give him a reminder that he was here.”

“I don’t think he’s likely to forget.”

A beat passed, and Sirius had leaned back in for another kiss. This one was slow, thoughtful and nostalgic. When they broke apart again Sirius had shut his eyes and leaned their foreheads together.

“You know… When I found out Alphard had left me that money, I figured it would be for the both of us. He probably thought leaving it to me was the easiest way to keep Mum and Dad from getting their hands on it, but later, when Reg and I fell out… Well, just started thinking he didn’t care for my help anyway.”

Remus reached up, tangling his fingers in Sirius’ hair. It’d gotten even longer in the past year and was now hanging below his collarbones. He could still remember the time they’d been out Christmas shopping for Lily, and Sirius had been mistaken for a girl on his way out of some fancy boutique. Sirius had been embarrassed at the time, but puffed right back up again when Remus told him they only stared because he was so pretty.

“You worry too much,” Remus told him, kissing those pretty lips again. “Five quid says he wears it the entire train ride home.”

Sirius’ face became a grin. “I’ll take that bet.”

With a cheeky shove, he had Remus on his back on the bed, the jacket trapped between them as Sirius shimmied his way up Remus’ torso to straddle his legs. There was a rhinestone belt digging in between his shoulder blades, but it took a back seat to all the feelings of Sirius’ mouth on his. Tongue-n-tongue, they stayed that way until a distant honk had Sirius sitting up in alarm.

“Shit. Already?”

“That’ll be the taxi,” Remus nodded, wiping his mouth. “You should go on down, say your goodbyes. Maybe you can make him swear he’ll come stay for the summer.”

“Yeah… Yeah, alright! You go stall him."

"Why?"

"I left a pair of drumsticks sitting around and now I think I’ve lost them in all this mess.”

“How typical.” Kissing Sirius once more on the cheek, Remus picked his way back through the clutter and started down the stairs. Arriving on the first floor landing, he could hear voices coming from the front door.

“I’m sorry for snapping at you last night,” Regulus was saying.

“Don’t worry about it,” James replied. “You were drunk.”

“Yeah, but I didn’t mean it. What I said.”

“It’s cool. I told Lily, and she forgives you too.”

“Oh. Great…”

Inching down the stairs, Remus paused. The two were standing across from each other in the entryway; Regulus had Effie’s tin of baking in one hand, and was staring down at it dubiously. Was this it then, he wondered? Had James caught on to Regulus’ little crush on Lily at last?

“Sirius really enjoyed having you here,” James said eventually. “Sorry we’ll be missing your birthday.”

“It’s fine.”

“Well… You totally blew us all away at The Damned show! Last night too, before you stopped, that is. I’d never seen anything like it.”

Regulus glanced up, and Remus didn’t miss the hopeful look in his eye.

“Yeah?”

“Totally! I still think you could form your own band, that is, if you really wanted to. Sirius might have a heart attack—it’s always been his dream, right—but I’m sure he’d come around eventually.”

Regulus shook his head staunchly; “It’s just a hobby. I’ve got no interest in dreams.”

“That’s too bad,” said James. “You’ve sure got a lot of nerve. You could probably do whatever you wanted. All it takes is a few seconds of bravery. Sirius told me that once.”

“Bravery? Really…? ”

“Why not? It’s like—back at the concert, that was one of the bravest things I’d ever seen, yeah? You got up there when no one else would—it was mad! So, say all it takes is a little bit of madness, and boom—everything you want can come true.”

“So now it’s madness,” Regulus chuffed.

“They’re related,” James grinned. “But I find that when you want something, you can’t just wait for it to come along on its own. You just gotta do something a bit mad first to make it happen.”

And this was perhaps the moment Remus would be kicking himself over for many, many years to come. So far off the mark he’d been, that when Regulus pressed up onto his toes to kiss James on the mouth, he’d had the gall to be surprised.

A credit to James’ character, he did not leap away in shock. Instead his eyes bulged, and he reached up to grasp Regulus by the shoulders. This seemed to spur Regulus back to his senses, and he pulled back, his cheeks a violent red.

“I’m sorry, I… I just needed to do that. Just—Just once.”

And then Regulus was gone, scooping up his trunk and darting out the front door, Effie’s baking tin clutched tightly to his chest. It was clear James was dazed; when Remus finally descended down the rest of the stairs on rubbery legs, he turned to face him with an open mouth.

“Moony, did you see…?”

Remus nodded.

“But I–I didn’t—”

“I know, Prongs.”

James deflated, arms hanging limp at his sides. Down on the pavement, Barty was helping Regulus shove his trunk into the taxi boot. He harped at him, mostly complaining about Trish—not that Regulus seemed to be paying any attention. After muscling the trunk inside, Regulus slammed the boot shut and glanced back up at the flat. He must’ve seen them staring, as he quickly turned away and hurried into the back seat of the cab.

“I should probably tell Lily,” James said in a hollow voice. “That’s what you do, right? You’re supposed to—to tell ‘em.”

“It could be worse,” Remus gulped. “I mean, he kissed you.”

“Yeah. That’s right, he did.” A beat, then; “But maybe… don’t tell Sirius.”

Remus glanced at him, surprised, but before James could begin explaining himself, Sirius came thundering down the stairs.

“Useless cunts! What're you doing letting them leave?!”

He pushed past them and ran down to the street just as Barty and Trish were getting into the cab. Regulus rolled the window down for him, and Sirius shoved the jacket and drumsticks inside before taking a moment to lean both arms on the edge of the cab’s window edge. Remus couldn’t see Regulus’ face with him in the way, but he’d have bet a lot more than five quid that he wasn’t looking Sirius in the eye.

“You think he’d blow his top if he knew?” Asked James.

“Uh…”

“It was only the one time,” he went on babbling; “And it ain’t gonna happen again, so… Shit, Moons, will you please not say anything?”

Remus was at a loss. It felt wrong to be keeping such a secret, especially when everything was just starting to make sense. Of course Regulus had a thing for James— of course! Honestly, he was a proper spanner for not picking it out sooner.

“We don’t need anymore drama for the band,” James reasoned, mostly with himself. “And Regulus is going home now. So I suppose, what Sirius doesn't know won't hurt him. Right...?"

Great, Remus thought; now he'd gone and jinxed it.

"Sure, Prongs..."

James looked at him. "Shit. Please, Moons?"

Remus pinched his forehead, trying not to look at Sirius' back as he leaned over the cab. Maybe James was right—it was only a kiss after all.

"Alright, James. Whatever you say."

Visibly softening with relief, James grabbed him by the shoulder. "Thanks, mate. You're a good friend. I'll see you downstairs for a bit of practice, yeah?"

"I'll holler when Peter gets back."

Nodding, as if to psyche himself up, James let out a breath and then slipped out the front door, heading towards the exterior stairway that led down to the flat's basement. He didn't dare look at the taxi when he passed, but made sure to wish the others a safe trip back to Scotland and gave a genial wave. Even while watching, Remus couldn't tell if Regulus had waved back.

After several minutes, during which they'd surely racked up a decent idling fare on the taxi meter, Sirius rubbed his brother's hair and stepped back from the window to see them off. He remained there until the car had turned a corner at the end of the street, hands pressed into his back pockets.

"You okay, Moons?" Sirius asked when he strode back through the front doorway of their flat. "You look like you've seen a ghost. Say, you haven't seen Sybill's little magazine lying around anywhere, have you? Think I'd like to have it framed…"

Chapter End Notes

New character alert!! (I love Gideon Prewett) Also hello Regulus???? Boy moves in crazy ways. So proud of him actually.

'Mince' means like rubbish.
'Scrumpy' a strong cider drink.
A 'vest' is the same thing as a man's undershirt.

Mitch Mitchell was the drummer who worked with Hendrix in the Jimi Hendrix Experience.
An 'A&R manager' is someone who negotiates and signs new artists for record labels and music publishers.

Parts of their Sybill interview were borrowed from a The Damned interview in Issue 1 of “Slash” Magazine, May 1977.

Chapter 106: The Roundhouse

Chapter Summary

The Marauders play to their very first concert audience.

Chapter Notes

No CW's for this chapter apart from brief mentions of addiction.

I use (as in Sirius sings) two songs in this one. The first is one I wrote to the melody of "Dazed and Confused" by Led Zeppelin (though I ignored 02:06 - 03:29 where Plant is just moaning while I wrote it) and "Five to One" by The Doors. Feel free to play both while reading.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Buddy you're a boy, make a big noise,
Playin' in the street, gonna be a big man some day!
You got mud on yo' face, you big disgrace,
Kickin your can all over the place, singin'—
We will, we will rock you!
We will, we will rock you!

- "We Will Rock You" Queen, 1977

Sunday 6th May 1979

The first time Remus had ever laid eyes on the Camden Roundhouse it'd reminded him of a wary and dilapidated version of Albert Hall, or perhaps a more industrialised rendering of some ancient Greek pantheon. Since then its exterior had changed very little, what with the chipped pavement and worn-out car park all chockablock with rain puddles and potholes. Piles of old roofing tiles had been mixed in with abandoned stage pieces at the far end of the property, all discarded from the venue's previous life as a performing arts powerhouse. It was a huge building, originally built to house turntables for steam engines—but like the telephone box in Marlene's beloved Doctor Who, its vast cement walls gave very little indication of the sort of volume it contained within. Now standing in the middle of the annular hall, Remus stared up at the surmounting set of glass windows at the roof's peak and imagined a fall from that height would kill anyone. And they were supposed to play there, he thought? He wasn't confident his ruddy little amp could fill a room half this size, let alone be heard over an entire crowd. But there they were; no going back now.

"You'll be happy to hear that I've made the executive decision to have Marauders round out the show," said Gideon. "Get it? Round as in Round-house? God, I just kill myself."

He sniggered as he strolled over to them, continuously tapping a clipboard against one hand. He'd yet to write anything on it, and Remus got the feeling he just held it to look professional. Not hard. His suit was pure-white with a navy shirt underneath and he looked a bit like a ginger-fied Marlon Brando, minus the cigarette and Sicilian accent.

"Also, just as a little tidbit," Gideon threw in, "you should know that it's a sold out show. Turns out Gaz was feeling generous. He put out a little advert in last week's edition of 'Sounds'."

He said all this very keenly. The Marauders, meanwhile, had yet to pick their jaws up off the floor. Even the girls, who'd come early to witness their soundcheck, hadn't a single quip to split amongst themselves.

In a shocking turn of events, Moira had turned up to show her support for Peter, making up for the loss of Lottie, who was still off on her glowing honeymoon with Roger. She had managed to find the time to send a postcard though; Congrats! Guess you idiots managed to prove Dad wrong after all. Love from San Sebastian!

"The Do Nuffin's will warm-up the crowd, get everyone nice and loose," Gideon said, pausing long enough to direct a set of stagehands rolling in a soundboard the size of their bathtub back home. "You'll be following Modern English at nine-thirty. Show ends ten-to-eleven. Any later and the city'll fine us for violating noise limits. Considering you lads don't have much in the way of a cab fund, I wouldn't risk it."

"Cool—Cool…" James stammered, acting decidedly not cool. "Any other advice then?"

"Yeah. Don't fuck it up."

That was what they got: a wink and a warning not to ruin their first ever chance before it even started. Remus knew that by putting them up at the Roundhouse, Gideon had effectively given Marauders his personal stamp of approval, which meant that any chance of failure also ran the risk of marring his own industry name. And yet Remus couldn't help but feel that they still stood the most to lose.

Despite Gideon's warning, the soundcheck was a disaster. News of a sold out audience had turned any budding anticipation into full-out dread for the four concert-newbies. Thanks to the Roundhouse's tiny modular stage, there wasn't enough room for each of the band to have their own set up, which meant that sharing was the only way forward. They'd agreed to use Peter's drum kit, but the amps and pedals were being provided by Modern English, a new-wave band from Colchester that sounded more akin to Genesis than they did Aerosmith or Led Zeppelin. Hearing their soundcheck, Remus thought the songs went too bad—no different from the verse-chorus-verse one might hear on the radio those days—but something about the band's stage presence or general lack thereof felt unnerving. Mostly they just swayed ahead of their synthesisers, a style Sirius later mimicked during their own practice. He paired it with a droll rendition of the band's only single, "I'm Drowning", shambling ahead of his microphone like a zombie;

" ' I'm drowning… dun-DUN-dun-DUN! Going underrrr… I'm drowning… '"

He only stopped after Peter threatened to strangle him with his own microphone cord, lest the other band overhear him. They were already usurpers; it'd been clear from their first meeting that neither band wanted much to do with their new pals. The Do Nuffin's had already been playing together for years and were therefore much more established on the local scene than Marauders could ever hope to be. Adversely, Modern English's recorded single painted them as serious musicians with a real shot of making something of themselves. Though neither group was popular enough to be making any real demands, no one made a secret out of the fact that Remus and his friends were complete novices, and thus had swooped in on what could've been a big and very real opportunity for the rest of them.

"Tough," Sirius said later, busy admiring his arse in one of the dressing room mirrors. "Suppose the hotter bird gets the worm."

Dorcas tutted. "You say that now. Just wait until some hot young dish sweeps in to steal your limelight."

"Impossible. No one's that good-looking."

They ragged him for a little while, but Sirius' confidence had always been a bit contagious, and glancing around the tiny dressing room, Remus was quite sure they'd take what they could get just then.

With a bit of help from Mary, Sirius had turned out a show-stopping new look, complete with eyeliner, black velvet pants and red lamé matador's jacket—of which he wore nothing underneath. He'd spent the better part of The Do Nuffin's set complaining that the outfit would've looked better if he'd just had a few tattoos underneath—comparing ideas with Marlene and Peter—but Remus disagreed. Sirius looked already like a rock star. He looked like Jagger.

"Hope you're ready, lads!" Gideon called, sticking his head in the dressing room's door. " 'Cause you're on in five minutes."

He was gone a second later, just in time to miss James standing up from his seat, his face having turned a horrible ashen grey.

"I think… I need a bucket!"

"I'm starting to wonder if this isn't a medical condition we should be worried about," Lily winced, patting her boyfriend on the back.

As James made a mad-dash for the bin, Peter put down his empty beer bottle and gave a loud belch.

"I can feel it," he rasped, still expelling air; "Tonight's gonna be a perfect show. A ten out of ten! Right...? What d'you think, Moony?"

"I say ten too," Remus replied, barely glancing up from his bass guitar. Peter cheered.

"And you, Sirius?"

"Ngh—Eleven!" Sirius bellowed. He was across the room, doing a poor attempt of a hand-stand against a wall covered in faded Jimi Hendrix posters.

"Can you stop that?" Remus scoffed. "You're going to break your neck."

"I'm trying to evoke a natural rush," Sirius said, his face already flushed. "Wouldn't have to if someone—ngh!—hadn't refused the sound guy's offer."

"This is literally the most important show we've ever played," James moaned, cradling the plastic bin to his chest. “You’re not allowed to be high for it.”

Sirius grunted, folding forward off the wall. “Aren’t you excited, Prongs?” He simpered, creeping closer to James and his bin. “Just think of it… All those people out there, anticipating the show. Waiting for you—cheering our names! Just—Potter, Potter!”

James thrust a finger out. “I will vomit all over you, Black!”

The sound of a thumping fist came from outside the dressing room door, making them all jump and signalling that it was time to take their places. The girls shuffled out first to join the audience near the front door and afterwards, Sirius reached an arm down and hauled his best friend to his feet.

“Well!” He grinned, smacking James on the back; “Go on—get it all out now, mate, ‘cause for the next two hours, you’re not even going to have time to breathe.”

It was chaos outside the dressing room. Remus had never seen so many people running around in one place, save for maybe that time they’d snuck backstage for The Clash. Two weeks ago he’d been astonished by Sybill’s ability to gather a mere hundred people or so, and now—between those working the show and those attending it—there had to be at least a thousand bodies packed between them and the front doors. Apparently anyone who’d brought their copy of Sounds with the show’s advert in it had gotten in for free, and the draw of getting to see three bands for the price of none was well worth it. Even if they were complete shit, Remus doubted many in the audience would care.

But it wasn't just about playing their songs correctly, he reminded himself. This was about proving to blokes like Gideon that they were worth the shot in the dark. That Marauders could be the best band in the world. That they were not complete failures...

“For a bunch of sops, those Essex bastards sure can move a room,” Sirius said, peeking out to admire all the people hanging out on the upper balcony. One of the venue’s swivelling stage lights caught him dead in the eyes as he did and he flinched, only to turn back around with his hair glowing blue under the light and a beaming smile on his face.

“Holy shit.”

Remus nodded. “Holy shit.”

“Get it together man,” Peter was busy telling James. Like a little christening, they’d each been given a shot of whisky and a firm handshake when they approached the ramshackle staircase that led up to the stage. There they found Modern English finishing up their encore to the sound of roaring applause. It appeared as though their minimal stage presence was of little consequence to the exuberant crowd—not that James seemed to notice. He was too busy pulling at the collar of his ringer t-shirt and trying not to hyperventilate.

“Does anyone see Lily and the girls?” He wheezed, covering his mouth to force air in through his nose. The answer was no; it was nearly impossible to pick out anyone amongst the sifting crowd. If they wanted to see their friends, then they were going to have to get out on stage.

“Gear’s almost ready,” Gideon said, appearing out from behind a set of stage monitors. “You lads looking forward to your first big show?”

“Do you always do this?” Sirius asked instead. “You know, play babysitter for the bands?”

“Playing babysitter for spoiled little rock star cunts is my job. It’s not always glamorous, but it has its perks. A house in Costa Rica, for example.”

Before Gideon could brag any further, a man in all black with a headset on came up and nudged him from behind. He gave him the okay, and Remus felt his stomach hit the floor.

“The stage is all yours, gentlemen,” Gideon grinned. “You do remember what to do with it, right? Which end of the guitar is up?”

In answer, Sirius reached for the microphone a waiting stagehand had been cradling for him. “Best get that contract ready, Prewett,” he called, already walking up the stairs. “Wouldn't want another agency to beat you to the punch.”

Looking back on it, Remus would consider that instant as the moment Sirius Black sealed the deal on the rest of their lives. They didn't know it, but Gideon Prewett had already decided that very first night he’d seen them play that they had what it took to be a good band. Still, it was Sirius’ confidence—his no-fail attitude—that was what made Marauders truly great.

The lights were down when they walked out on stage for the very first time. As the audience swayed gently in anticipation, Remus focussed hard on trying to remember the set up; Peter's kit toward the back, a microphone stand at centre stage, and a keyboard on the far right for Sirius' piano bits. His cheap Teisco bass would be waiting for him next to the stack of amps on stage left. There he felt for it until his fingers hit the strings in the dark. There was a faint rippling sound from the attached amplifiers as the low notes slithered through their stage monitors. Somewhere nearby Remus could hear the faint ticking of an amplified metronome, ready to count them in.

Tick–tick–tick!

He swung the bass's strap over his head. This was it.

Tick–tick–tick!

Adjusted his E string. This was fucking it!

Across the stage, in pitch darkness, James Potter fit a guitar pick between his teeth and strummed down. Amp feedback echoed.

The crowd got loud.

Behind them, Peter Pettigrew drew a stick along the edge of his crash cymbal.

Tick…!

Remus Lupin struck a chord. Felt the sound tremor in his feet.

Tick…!

And Sirius Black wrapped the microphone cord around his wrist.

… Tick!

"Do any of you remember what magic feels like?"

The lights stayed low, anticipating the eager roar of the crowd as Sirius spoke into the mike. Remus felt every word like a caress over the skin of his arms and neck, but there was no time to be caught up in all of Sirius' sensualities. With a gentle flick he began the descending bass line he'd built the song around. It was a love song in a way, and also a curse. He'd come up with the melody ages ago—admittedly during some stupid spat between him and Sirius he couldn't even remember the reason for. But the drama was there, the lust was there. And when Sirius sang…

“ ‘I know that they’re here and we’re supposed to play,
A song that I wrote for you in happier days;
Sweet little mama, I’m caught under your spell,
Black magic woman, I fear I ain’t well!”

The lights went up with a great whoosh, and suddenly Remus felt like he was being blinded by a supernova. James’ guitar shrieked and whined—turning their ominous love song into the curse Remus had meant for in his anger. He felt stung and abused, scorned and what for? Sirius Sirius Sirius—but there was Sirius, with a single hand on the microphone and blowing out his entire chest;

“ ‘You knoooow it can’t be no more—
I think this man outta leave,
Ain’t got no more answers, baby, but you taste so sweet;
Run me around in a dark room—
Don’t know where I am,
Yeah, draw me in, baby, my heart’s growing weak!”

It was like dropping into the punch instead of dodging it. Peter kept them in line with the gentle tap-tapping on his snare and clash, while every shuttering twang of James’ guitar rocked them right back again. The audience ahead of them were hypnotised—they didn’t know whether they should be moaning or crying. James had called it the Zeppelin effect; seeing how their mouths dropped open and their eyes glazed over like they’d just been shown the white gates of Heaven. Sirius had that effect on people regardless, but his voice changed when he whined. It turned raspy. It turned them on.

“ ‘If being lost is a crime, then a sinner I’ll be,
I still love you, baby, you’ve got magic up your sleeve;
Praying for a woman shouldn’t be too much to need,
Can’t it be now, baby—
Please don’t leave me to grieve!”

Sirius tossed his hair back;

“ ‘Please don’t leave me to grieve!”

Peter brought down his sticks.

“ ‘Don’t leave me to grieve!”

James slashed his strings.

“ ‘Don’t leave me!”

Remus took a breath.

“ ‘DON’T LEAVE ME!”

Before Sirius had even finished his final scream, James had moved to the centre of the stage, rocking his hips forward as his fingers chased themselves up and down the strings. With Peter at his heels his song soared across the hall like a siren, and the wave of people down below surged up to meet him, crashing over the lip of the stage with desperate and longing fingers. All sound fell away except for them—and they didn’t know what they were doing, they’d made it up! The words were made up, the melody was fake—none of it mattered apart from listening to each other! Their first song at their first real show and it might as well have been one they’d never even heard before. It could’ve been—didn’t matter. The Marauders knew each other well enough to make any strange thing feel familiar again.

“ ‘I know that they’re here and we’re supposed to play,
I’ll make love to ya, baby—thinking of happier days;
And sweet little mama, I’m still caught under your spell—
Black magic woman, I’m gonna send you to hell!”

It was as though he could feel Sirius’ hands on him now. The microphone cord was wrapped around his throat, squeezing and squeezing until all that was left was that airy feeling that kissed your brain before you passed out. Maybe they shouldn’t have started with “Black Magic Woman”; they’d ascended and now there was nowhere else to go but back down.

Oh well…

Might as well make it a party then.

By the next song the crowd had been broken from its trance and with every slam of Peter's drumsticks, and eventually their mindless thrashing had returned. Come the third song, Remus could no longer feel his fingers. It was an odd sensation—not the fingers, the captivation—but the audience had not acted this way for The Do Nuffin's or for Modern English. They had played their music and struck a few cords but this was different. This was a carnal need for something more. Remus would've given it to them all night if he could, only the Marauders didn't have enough of their own material to cover an entire hour and a half-long set. But they did have two things:

Sirius Black.

And Jim Morrison.

" 'Five to one, baby—
One in five;
No one here gets out alive, now—
You get yours, and baby,
I'll get mine;
Gonna make it, baby—
If we try!"

Sirius hadn't wanted to sing any covers, but there was something to be said for a song an audience could sing back to them. The people may have liked the originals, but they hadn't had the time to get to know them yet. Jim Morrison had been dead for almost a decade, and dead Americans sometimes made for pretty decent art. Memorable art, anyway.

" 'The old get old—
And the young get stronger…"

The rasp was back like a growl, and Sirius kept both hands on the mike as he slid toward the floor at the front of the stage;

“ ‘May take a week—
And it may take longer…”

Eventually his velvet knees had hit the stage;

“ ‘They got the guns,
But we got the numbers…”

His head tipped back;

“ ‘Gonna win, yeah,
We’re takin’ over—
COME ON!”

Sirius draped himself across the black vinyl floor, arms spread open like he could absorb every inch of the madness tipping their metaphorical scale. Remus looked at him and he wanted him but there was something else too. He’d noticed it before that last bridge—and now James was playing again and he’d forgotten.

Remember!

Remember, dammit!

Remember where?

There…?

No—there!

Across the room, near the back bar and lit up by the black lights. He’d picked out Gideon by his white suit and hair, but it was the man standing next to him that Remus was really interested in. He’d only seen him the one time outside that corner shop along Denmark Street and now there were lights in his eyes, blinding him—but he was sure!

“It’s Gaz!” Remus shouted over the music, moving toward Sirius as he swung himself up from the floor of the stage. “By the bar—it’s Gaz Spectre, he’s here!”

Sirius’ eyes flashed greedily—hazily—but he saw him. Remus could tell by the way Sirius fit his microphone back into its stand that he'd hit whatever reset button existed within him. To change one's tune mid-song was always a gamble, but Gideon had lied to them and brought Spectre anyway. If there was ever a time to finish with a bang, it was now.

" ' Your ballroom days are over, baby," Sirius growled;
" 'Night is drawing near…"

" 'Shadows of the evening," Whined;
" 'Crawl across the years…"

" 'Ya walk across the floor with a flower in your hand," Moaned;
" 'Trying to tell me no one understands…"

" 'Trade in your hours for a handful of dimes—" Keened;
" 'Gonna make it, baby—in our prime!"

The sound disappeared, and slowly, the crowd began to whisper;

Come together… one more time.

Peter's bass drum thumped; ku-tss!

Get together… one more time.

James eased his slide down the strings;

Get together… one more time.

Remus held his breath.

Get together… one more time!

With a single deafening crack, Sirius kicked the mike stand over and slammed into the floor.

“GET TOGETHER—ONE MORE TIME!”

And that was all there was for it. They were together—the entire room was with them. Remus looked and looked and he couldn’t see Lily, but he knew instinctively that she was there. Her and Mary and Marlene and Dorcas. Could they feel it too? Remus thought so.

By the time they were thundering off stage, Remus felt like a million pounds that’d just been run over with a train. His ears were ringing—whose idea was it to not invest in ear plugs?—and he definitely couldn’t feel his legs.

“Good news!” Shouted James, despite the fact that he was standing right next to them. “I don’t have to throw up anymore!”

It was around this time that Remus realised James had lost his glasses. Maybe it'd helped—not being able to see the audience—but there wasn’t any time to look for them.

“Spectre!” Remus gasped, slamming Sirius in the centre of the chest and nearly winding him all over again. “He was by the bar—let’s go!”

But they were not allowed. Either because they were worried about their newest stars causing a riot out front or because they meant to hussle the four of them into the back to very violently coerce them into signing their lives (and future pay cheques) away for their brief five minutes of fame, the stage hands and small team of security Gideon had hired to work the event began ushering the Marauders back toward their dressing room.

“Alright, we’re bloody going!” Sirius snapped, before his mood shifted again and he was bounding forward to wrap his arms around James’ shoulder. “Holy FUCK—that was amazing. Did you hear us? I mean, did you fucking hear us?!”

“I don’t think I’ll ever hear anything again!” Peter shouted, apparently suffering from the same ringing in his ears as Remus.

They made it to the dressing rooms and Sirius burst through the door like a jack rabbit on speed. He only paused when they came face to face with Gideon, smiling around the lip of a cigarette as he leaned back against one of the dressing room tables. He said something that was probably very sly, but Remus could hardly hear anything over the ringing in his ears and James' shouting;

“WHAZZAT?!”

Gesturing, Gideon snapped his fingers and the door was yanked shut behind them.

"Let's talk, lads."

A few minutes later they’d all peeled out of their sweaty stage gear and were given several rounds of whisky and a cool towelette to drape over their necks and eyes. It felt like overkill, but when Remus began to notice the spots in his vision from the stage lights he acquiesced to the pathetic little towel and leaned back in his chair with his face covered.

“You boys did great out there,” he overheard Gideon profess. “Blew the roof off the joint. Almost literally.”

“I thought I saw a few ceiling tiles falling into the audience,” James snickered.

“And Spectre?” Sirius asked boldly. “We saw you two by the bar.”

“That’s a keen eye you got there. But I’m ‘fraid Spectre’s loooong gone. Sorry, boys. I tried to keep it quiet to avoid any possible disappointment.”

Remus didn’t have to lift the towel to notice that the disappointment was already in the room.

“I assume that means he hated us,” grumbled Peter.

“On the contrary, Pettigrew… Gaz says he wants to sign you.”

It was astonishing enough news to stump all of them for several seconds. Before Remus had even swung upright in his chair—towelette flying off his space at warp speed—Sirius was already on his feet.

“Are you serious?” He shouted. “He actually wants to sign us!?”

“Yes, sir.”

“You’re not just having us on, are you, Gid?” James babbled; “ ‘Cause if you are, one of us ain't gonna be leaving this dressing room in one piece.”

Gideon tipped his head forward in a chuckle. “No, Potter. In fact, I am happy to report that Marauders is officially the latest and greatest signing of Spectre Records Limited. Save a few pesky contracts, of course. You blew more than just the audience away tonight—you impressed Gaz. He thinks you could be exactly what you say you are, and he’s willing to give you a chance, so…” And then Gideon stood up from his chair, arms wide. “Welcome to the family, lads.”

It was an instant celebration. Peter threw his sticks in the air while James swooped in from behind and lifted each of them straight off the ground in a great bear hug. They embraced Gideon too, but Remus barely noticed. He’d already grabbed Sirius.

“We did it, Moons!” Sirius gasped, holding Remus’ face in his hands. “We got a record contract—we did it!”

Sirius was right—they did do it!—and like with every other major milestone they’d shared so far, Remus cupped Sirius around the back of his neck in a reflex and kissed him full on the mouth.

It took them a few seconds to realise what they’d done, and by then it was too late. Sirius sprung away from Remus as though he’d given him an electric shock, and they both found Gideon staring at them with a bewildered look on his face. For a while no one spoke, until finally James stepped up to Sirius.

"Yeah, whoo! We did it!" He cheered, before attempting to grab Sirius by the face and lay one on him. He never got so far; Sirius was pushing James away by the cheek before their lips got within feet of each other.

"Quit taking the piss, Potter!"

"I ain't! I'm cel—e—bra—ting."

The bold attempt to cover up for Remus' mistake still didn't stop Sirius from pushing away like a kid worried about catching cooties. Peter, meanwhile, had his head in one hand, staring at the floor as though he were questioning every decision that'd lead him up to that point.

"Valiant effort, Potter," Gideon said, before pointing between Remus and Sirius. “So this a thing then?”

“No,” Sirius answered, at the same time Remus replied with, “Yeah.”

Shocked, Sirius whirled around and Remus felt a small stab of guilt for being the one to go against him. He tried to make Sirius understand with his eyes—they were only safe as long as they decided who knew—but Gideon had his answer.

"This is gonna require some serious PR coverage," he mumbled, scratching his chin. He thought a moment longer before letting out a casual sigh. “Well, good thing PR’s my entire job.”

Sirius scoffed, like he didn't believe it. "You mean you don't care that you just agreed to sign a band of poofters?"

"I have a girlfriend," Peter said, raising his hand. It made Gideon smirk at least.

“What? You think you’re the first benders I’ve ever worked with? That’s a laugh. Nah, we’ll sort it. Get ‘chu girlfriends or something—you know, for show. Everyone does it.”

“Everyone…?” Peter gaped. “Even like—Led Zeppelin?”

Before anyone thought to answer him, a knock came at the door. One of the hired security stuck his head in.

“Oi, Gid, got some girls here to see the band. They all got passes…”

“Speaking of girlfriends!” James cheered. He rushed forward just as Lily and the other girls piled into the room, hair stuck to their necks with sweat and already yammering their praises.

“You were fantastic!” Lily cried, throwing her hands around James. “Ohmygod—it was spectacular!”

"Wonderful!"

"Truly amazing!"

"Next time you should all be shirtless."

Remus was still dazed. Eventually Gideon had wandered over to him and passed him another shot of whisky.

"Don't sweat it, Lupin. We've all got our vices. One and done—you got it out of your system. Now just make sure you play it smart and I'll make sure that none of this ever blows up in our faces."

His words gave Remus the distinct feeling of deja vu, but still—he clinked his whisky shot against Gideon's anyway, and told himself that he'd never make such a blatant mistake again.

As Lily embraced James and Moira raced to congratulate Peter, Remus set the shot glass aside to smile at Dorcas, who was striding forward with Marlene.

“I think you’ve actually managed to get better, Lupin,” she smirked, before delivering a cheeky punch to his bicep. “Guess getting fired from the shop was a blessing in disguise after all.”

“Funny how that happens,” Remus grinned.

“Just you wait,” said Marlene, “soon they’ll be whisking you off to posh places in fancy limousines and cars with blacked-out windows.”

“Yeah, you’ll be checking into the Savoy under pseudonyms just so your crazy fans don’t come breaking down the door," Mary cheered, her arms locked around Sirius' neck and lipstick marks now decorating both of his cheeks. Before she could give him another, Gideon was swooping in.

“That day might be closer than you think, ladies.” Then he broke the news to the girls for them, and was even kind enough to call for a bottle of champagne in celebration.

“You should come down to the office this Friday. You’ll have a meeting with Gaz, and he’ll decide where it is we go next. Don’t quote me, but I think he’s gonna get you on a tour.”

The boys all shared the same look of disbelief. James had both hands clasped over his head like he was going to puke again, and Sirius was about one glass of champagne away from doing another hand-stand. It was amazing! A whole tour? Suddenly their heads were being filled with ideas of where it was that they'd go. North—South—the whole country? But then Gideon made snide mention of 'America' and it was as though the Marauders could no longer think straight at all.

America...

Holy fuck.

In all their excitement, they'd somehow come to the conclusion that this was news far-deserving of a second round. It took some prodding, but eventually Gideon agreed to take them over to the Roundhouse's club and bar. Most of the crowd had dissipated by now, but there were surely a few left who'd recognise them.

"And remember, don't go around bragging about the record deal," Gideon warned them. "It's bad luck to count your platinum records before they've gone gold."

"Yeah, and we ain't even officially signed yet anyway," said James. Sirius smacked his arm for it.

"Don't jinx it, Potter!"

As they all turned for the door, Remus felt a tug on his sleeve.

“Remus, hold on. There's something you should know.”

It was Lily. She kept hold of him by the sleeve, nibbling anxiously on her bottom lip.

“What is it, Lils?”

“We weren't sure whether to say anything or not, but I know you'd want to know. It's... Well, Tomny. He was here—he... I guess he came to the show.”

Suddenly all the noise in the room evaporated.

“Tomny…?”

“Mhm,” Lily nodded, as Sirius and the others turned on them. “He was watching your guys' set.”

Suddenly Remus felt jaded. “Yeah, and the Queen was on the balcony,” he scoffed, unwilling to have his good mood ruined by whatever game Lily was playing at. Before he could pull his arm away, Lily was shaking him.

“No, really, Remus! I swear—I know it was him! He was standing right near us. We only noticed toward the end.”

“She’s telling the truth,” Marlene insisted. “We couldn’t get any closer, it was too packed."

"Where'd he bloody go then?" Sirius asked.

"I dunno. We lost sight of him after the lights went down."

It was a boot to the stomach. Remus’ heartbeat had begun to race again, different but not unlike the way it had up on stage. Desperate, he turned to Sirius.

“What are you waiting for then,” Sirius told him. “Don’t you want to see him?”

Now Remus didn’t care who was around. Heart swelling with pride, he leaned in and captured Sirius’ lips in a kiss a second time.

“He was by the east doors,” Mary called, as Remus threw the dressing room door open afterwards and nearly slammed into the back of the pair of security posted up outside.

“Wait, hold on!” Gideon barked. “You can’t go out on your own. Lads, bring him back.”

Ignoring his new manager’s wishes, Remus shoved past the bodyguards and threw himself down the hallway before he could be stopped. It was stupid to hope, especially considering he had no idea where he was going or if Tomny would still be there. Maybe Lily had made a mistake. Maybe it wasn’t even him after all. There were plenty of other blonde, scruffy-looking guys in London.

Weaving his way through the confusing hallways of the Roundhouse’s backstage area and out into the lobby, Remus began to imagine a stranger in Tomny’s place, stuck wondering just who this “Remus” idiot was and why four barmy girls were bothering him. Get a load ‘a them, he’d say, they think I know—

"Tomny!"

Bursting out the front doors, Remus found himself standing on a large piece of pavement. Cars and taxi cabs zoomed past on the dark street and crowded groups of people mulled around as they often did after concerts got out, smoking and sipping out of the occasional beer can.

Remus felt embarrassed for shouting. It’d garnered him several looks, a few of which were beginning to transform in front of his eyes. He began to hear the whispers;

No way.

Is that really…?

—I think it is!

“Hey, man, will you sign my shirt!?”

Remus jerked away, only to end up backing into another girl and accidentally trodding across her foot. She yelped in offence at first, but after looking up to see who it was, promptly forgot all about her scuffed boot.

“Hey, aren't you with the band?” She asked.

Frazzled and completely disoriented, Remus backed the other way and felt someone grab his arm.

“You’re with the band!”

“You’re in the band!”

“Hey—guys, look! He’s in the band!”

Fuck, fuck, fuck!

People began to press in from every direction. They didn’t even know his name, not that it mattered. They were undeterred by his height or general unfriendliness—desperate for whatever golden luck he had to rub off on them for even a moment. Looking into their many faces, Remus began to wonder whether crowds like this could smell fear.

“Sorry—I’m sorry,” he winced, trying to push his way through; “Please, just—just let me through! I’m looking for someone, alright—”

The words died on his tongue when Remus finally spotted him. He was standing off to the side, staring. Same sandy hair, same white t-shirt split at the collar, blue jeans—

“Tom!”

“It was so cool how you shredded the guitar at that part—”

“Do you really know Modern English?”

“Tomny!”

“What’s your name?”

“Are you going backstage?”

“TOM!”

The fans were packing in even tighter—with those on the outside unsure of who it was they were even fighting to see. Nearby a waiting police car whooped its lights, temporarily spooking them and causing Remus to lose sight of his friend. With no patience left, he began forcing his way through the wall of bodies before him. They followed, naturally, and what had started as an accidental run-in became a small chase. Was this how the members of Led Zeppelin felt?

It took a while before he was alone again, and in that time he'd circled all the way back to the venue's far side and had found himself severely out of breath. He couldn't see Tomny, nor had he spotted him again while eluding his—fans? Admirers? Insane groupies?

"Shit."

Remus covered his face with his hands. He might've started crying out of sheer frustration, had a hand not come out of nowhere and slammed itself up against the back of his head. After practically face-planting into the dirty pavement, Remus spun around expecting a fight. But then—

"Yer lucky… That was my left."

For a moment Remus thought he was going out of his mind. A chill came over him.

"Tom?" He echoed, breathlessly. "You… What're you doing here?"

Tomny did not smile at him. Instead he crossed his arms over his chest, looking more irritated to be dealing with Remus' shit again than anything else. The skin beneath his left eye was yellow like the leftover remnants of a black eye, and there was a split in his top lip that had scabbed over. His old scar had opened up again.

"Came to see the show, ain't it obvious?"

"Yeah, but... why? How'd you know?"

It was that boyfriend 'a yers," Tomny said. "Sent me a ticket."

"Sirius…? You're saying Sirius sent you a ticket?"

"Innit." Tomny glanced up at the stone wall that led almost fifty feet up to the Roundhouses' roof; "His note said you were getting up to sumffin big. Gotta be honest though, didn't expect it to be this big... Shit, you're like a real rock star now."

Remus felt his ears begin to burn. "We're not making any money from it," he mumbled, "it was just something we did to see if we could get a record deal."

"Well? Did you?"

"Er… Yeah. Yeah, I think so."

"Good. Reckon any bastard who tells you no would've have to be fucking deaf."

It was nice; nicer than he deserved. Remus felt his resolve begin to crumble again. Tomny must've seen it in his face, as he immediately waved a hand through the air.

"Nah, none 'a that weepy shit. I didn't come to watch you blubber."

Remus wiped his face, embarrassed. "Then why—" He cleared the whine from his voice. "Why did you come?"

Tomny pressed his hands into his back pockets, sucking on the inside of his cheek.

"I guess… because I missed my best friend."

There was no stopping the tears then.

"Augh!" Tomny moaned, tipping his head back as Remus furiously scrubbed at his eyes and cheeks. "Stop it! 'Ere, enough—cut it out."

He thumped him again, upside the head and again on the chest.

"Don't!" Remus moaned, embarrassed. "Piss off."

"Make me, ya little shit."

Another smack, this time across the face. Remus shoved his hands away.

"Stop it!"

"And jus' what you gon' do 'bout it, princess?"

Tomny hit him again, and this time Remus came back with a swing of his own. He cleared the air before his nose, but Tomny was too busy gloating at the near-miss to notice the second set of knuckles heading straight for his jaw. It landed with a crack of teeth and Remus felt a small twinge of satisfaction, which only lasted about as long as it took for Tomny to recover and drive his fist into his stomach. From there it became a test of endurance, with both of them grappling for each other's middle. They nearly had each other on the ground by the time the cop car pulled up and flashed its lights.

Tomny hauled him up; "Shit—go!" And together they took off down the street.

They ran until they'd made it around the corner of nearby Regent's Park Road, where cars zipped through the intersection and people continued to pass them with no interest or inclination of who they were.

"Yeah... Yeah, I needed that," Tomny panted, half-collapsing into the graffiti-coated brick. Remus followed, leaning his back up against the mucky wall and breathing hard. He pressed a hand against his rib cage and the gesture alone forced out a groan that left Tomny chuckling in amusement.

"Did I hurt you, hot stuff? You used to be able to hold your own when we were kids."

"I've been going through it a bit lately, if you must know," Remus grunted. "Hurt myself falling off the edge of your old balcony, right."

"Is that supposed to be you bragging?"

"Fuck off, Tom."

There was little bite in it, and Tomny just ended up chuckling again as a cab motored past, flashing them with its headlamps.

"Stupid sod… What'd you go back there for?"

Remus found a crack in the pavement to glare at. "You. What else?"

Tomny pressed his tongue to the inside of his cheek.

"And uhm—Lee, did he…"

"He threatened to kill me." And not for the first time.

"Shit." With a haggard sigh, Tomny ran one hand through his hair. "Look, if I had'a known you'd go back there then I would've—"

"What, picked up the phone?"

"You act like you were burning a hole in the phone-box."

“Well, I was doing more than you, wasn’t I?”

This one did have bite, for which Remus was instantly sorry for. They both hung their heads—guilty—and eventually Tomny pulled a box of cigarettes from his pocket. He offered them to Remus first, who accepted only to place the cigarette behind one ear. Tomny didn't say anything.

“Skylar came by our place last month."

“Oh, aye?”

“She couldn’t find you.”

“That was sort of the idea.”

Setting a cigarette between his lips, Tomny began fumbling with his lighter. It only sparked, and finally Remus reached over and took the lighter. The flame caught a second later, and Remus capped the lighter with a crisp clink.

Tomny inhaled. “I ain’t proud.” Exhale. “Ran out on my girl when she was days away from having a baby, didn't I.”

Remus fiddled with the lighter, sheepish. “Where'd you go?”

“Oh, you know… Hung around.”

“And is that how you got all this?” Remus gestured to the black eye and the fat lip.

“Huh? Oh, nah. Got that when I went to visit Mum.”

“Your mum?”

“Mhm. She’s got herself a boyfriend, I guess… Fat ugly prick.”

Remus was astonished. “I don’t get it. You never talk about your mum. I didn't even know you found her.”

“Wasn't hard. She was still out in Plaistow, jus’ like I thought.” Tomny chuckled humourlessly. “Guess I’d somehow gotten it into my head that she should know about the baby, right? Shit, had this whole plan… She didn’t want to see me though. Jus’ took a sec to figure that bit out.”

"Jesus, Tomny... Why didn’t you just go home?”

Tomny pulled the cigarette from his lips. All they had in the way of light was a single buzzing street lamp, but even then Remus didn't miss the way his bottom lip quivered.

"I dunno, Lu. I just don't know..."

Remus was grateful for the dark street when he pulled Tomny in by the head, hiding whatever frustrated tears he may be shedding into his shoulder. He wasn't expecting Tomny to cry, much less hug him back, but his arms were fierce as he lashed them around his back.

"I fucked up, Lu."

"S'okay, Tom."

"I should never have left, innit... Now m'a piece of shit, jus' like my ol' man."

"That's not true. You went back. Skylar called me."

There was a pathetic snivel. "Had to, didn't I? S'my kid…"

"Yeah. Yeah, it is."

Tomny squeezed even tighter, and with an ache in his ribs, Remus' eyes turned downwards. Eventually he spotted the still burning cigarette now lying abandoned on the cement.

"Tom… You know I'm proud of you, right?"

Seconds ticked by, and slowly Tomny released him, keeping just one hand on his shoulder. Remus matched it, fisting him by the shirt.

"I'm sorry for what I said before," he told him. "I'm sorry to you, and to Skylar. I'm sorry that I'll never understand what it's like. And I'm sorry for ever looking down on you. Even—Christ… even when I didn't mean to. No—especially then. I was supposed to have your back, and I let you down."

"Shaddup."

"No," Remus insisted. "I fucked up, right? I was a proper cunt to you and Sky. But I swear, Tom... I've never been anything less than proud to call you my friend."

It was the honest truth. When he was a kid, Remus had bragged to anyone that'd listen how cool and amazing his friend was. He didn't know when that had changed, and he was sorry for pissing off when Tomny had clearly needed him the most.

"You're a sop," Tomny told him. "And you ain't my friend."

Remus dropped his eyes.

"You're my brother."

The weight coming off of his shoulders was indescribable. Remus made a noise like he'd been punched again, and Tomny compensated by tapping him fondly on the cheek.

"I have sumffin for ya," he said, reaching into his front pocket. The 'something' in question was small, silver in colour and about the size of a poker chip. Remus nearly dropped it when Tomny flicked it toward the centre of his chest. He held it up to the light.

" 'To thine own self be true'," he mumbled aloud. "Twenty-four hours."

"S'been a bit longer than that." Tomny smiled bashfully. "Few more days and it'll be a month. Not a single hit in all that time—I promised Sky. It was the only way she'd agree to let me back in the house."

"She must've really changed you then. You never did well with ultimatums."

"You should talk."

Remus chuckled, passing the sobriety token back; "I'm proud of you," he said again, meaning it. It earned him a smile as Tomny returned the chip to his pocket. Nearby a series of honks drew Remus' attention. He wondered what time it was and if his friends were still waiting for him. And Sirius… He'd sent Tomny the ticket. So much good in his life, and he had Sirius to thank for it.

"There's one more thing, Lu," Tomny said, drawing Remus' attention back. He had something in his hand again. It was a photograph.

"Jus' thought you'd like to see your goddaughter."

At less than a day old, the baby in the photo had a face like a potato, with a gummy mouth and the faint wisps of fair hair coming out of the top of her ill-shapen head. Remus could have counted every baby he'd come into close contact with in his full nineteen years on one hand. Seeing her—photo alone—he was absolutely bricking it.

“She… Holy shit. She’s… beautiful, Tom.”

“Eh, looks a bit like a smushed pumpkin to me,” Tomny said. “Don’t lie! I can see you thinking it too. Skylar damn near kicked me out of the delivery room for saying the same, but it’s the truth.”

“No, no,” Remus laughed, creasing up all over. “She’s beautiful, really. Reckon she’s got Skylar’s eyes.”

“You think? I sorta thought she had mine.” Tomny sighed mockingly. "Doesn't look all smushed now though. She was born back in April. April twenty-second, at nine-oh-nine in the morning... Most mental day of my life—just about hit the floor seeing her come out."

"Shit. Don't blame you."

"We named her Emma too. Emma Louise.”

“That’s a nice name.”

“Yeah, Sky wanted something simple, innit." Tomny pressed his hands into his pocket, looking almost nervous. "She was pretty set on Emma early on, but I… mayyyy … have told her a lil' sumfin about my favourite ‘Great Aunt Louisa’...? 'Bout how she made such a difference in my life, and how I always swore I’d name my first kid after her... Mm? Yeah, it was good though, she was totally sold after that.”

He should've caught on; Tomny was all but giving him the elbow and sly wink. As it was, Remus just turned the photo over. “I didn’t know you had a great aunt.”

Tomny smacked him over the head.

“Ow—!?”

“Honestly, for someone as smart as you, you sure are thick!”

“Right, so why d'ya hit me?”

“I don’t have a Great Aunt Lou-i–zah, you toff. Are you really gonna make me spell it out for you?”

It probably took longer than it should’ve, but slowly Remus began putting two and two together; Louisa... Louise... Louis... Lou—

“You’re shitting me.”

Tomny ran his tongue along grinning teeth. Standing across from him in disbelief, Remus smacked him in the chest.

“You actually lied to your pregnant girlfriend about some fake great aunt just so you could name your kid after… After—”

“If you said anything I’d deny it.” Tomny gave him a long look, and Remus felt himself soften.

“Look, Lu, I don’t got a dad to name no kids after. And I ain’t naming ‘em fucking ‘Thonas’, that’s for sure. You’re all I got… You're all I want. And now I reckon yer in it for life, sucker.”

"For life?"

"Innit."

Remus could have cried.

“Will you come back with me?” He asked. “I think the others would like to hear the good news.”

Tomny shrugged, hands in his pockets. “Eh, why not. Skylar’s already gonna take my balls just for being out so late—Emma’s a shite sleeper. What’s a few more hours?”

Endlessly pleased, Remus turned and together they began making their way back up the dark street. The pavement had since cleared out for the most part, but he doubted anyone would have recognised him as a Marauder now. The smile on his face was much too sappy.

“You can keep that one by the way,” Tomny said, gesturing to the small four-by-four photograph Remus was still clutching in his hand. “And you should come and visit. Sky’s invited you over and Emma—she deserves to meet her godfather.”

Suddenly Remus was bricking it again.

“Fuck. You know, it actually sounds mental when you say it like that.”

“You think that’s bad? Try Dad.”

* * *

Remus knew they were in for it the moment James had appeared downstairs with his hair combed. They'd all woken up on time that morning on time, and had even spent breakfast going over a game plan of what to do should Spectre decide he wasn't interested in signing them after all. (This mostly involved telling the award-winning producer where he could stick his gold records and slamming the door on their way out.) But however well-prepared they felt, it was hard to predict one's van breaking down in the middle of one of the biggest thoroughfares in London.

"Switch gears, Pete! Switch gears!"

"I'm bloody trying, Potter!"

"Come on, Minnie. Hang in there, old girl!"

The van gave a lurch, shooting forward like a hoover that'd sucked up its own cord. Remus knew they'd been in trouble ever since Paddington when the engine had started acting up every time Peter pushed it over thirty miles per hour. Spectre's office was in Barnsbury and now only a few short minutes away by car, but they'd gotten cocky with how much extra time they'd had—dawdling by the front door like they were The Rolling Stones and it was written into their contract to be fashionably late for everything.

"I told you we shouldn't have stopped for those bloody sausage rolls!" James wailed, as the van's engine gave yet another jarring shriek.

"They were having a two-for-one!" Sirius shouted back, offended.

Wiping the sweat from his brow, Peter lowered the van into first and let it putter along like a dying animal as other frustrated drivers on their way to work honked and swerved to get around them. Finally there was no use for it anymore, and they were forced to admit defeat after the van sputtered and died just two streets over from King's Cross.

"This is just great!" Sirius hollered, after James had opened the van's rear-engine cover and was hit in the face with a cloud of grey smoke. "The one time we let Pettigrew drive, and the van keels over in the middle of the road!"

"Me?" Peter snarled. "Why's it always my fault—Moony's the one who bought the damn thing!"

Standing further up the pavement, Remus fit a cigarette in his mouth; "I suppose this isn't a good time to play the 'Lily made me do it' card."

James shut the engine cover with a sigh, standing up and dusting his hands off on his trousers. "Well, lads, guess we're walking."

"How long's that supposed to take?" Asked Peter.

In answer, Sirius reached out to a passing man, who'd stopped to let his terrier piss on a nearby tree.

"North Barnsbury, huh?" He echoed, scratching beneath his flat cap; "Well, you're not far, lads. It's only about a mile's walk from 'ere."

"A mile?"

"Give or take. Should only take you about twenty minutes."

They all glanced at James, who'd pulled back his jacket sleeve to check his watch.

"We have fourteen minutes."

Shit.

"How is it we're always fucking late?!" Peter moaned, as they each broke off into a sprint.

It was not an easy sprint. James, naturally, had no problem, and Sirius' one-track mind helped him forget about the fact that he'd done little else besides smoke and drink for the last eleven months, but along with Peter, Remus eventually began to lag behind. His lungs were on fire before they'd even made it over Regent's Canal, and he was only now discovering that the right heel of his trainer was not fully attached to the bottom of its sole. They made it with scarecely a minute to spare, and James stopped long enough to thump a palm on both Remus and Peter's backs as they approached the front doors of the building.

"Hang in there, lads," he said. Sirius, meanwhile, wasted no time. He was giving their name to the lobby's secretary when one of the elevator doors dinged from across the lobby, and out stepped Gideon Prewett in another one of his fancy Italian suits.

"Ah, smashing—you're here! Was starting to wonder if you were gonna stand us up."

"Sorry. Van broke down," James said.

Gideon caught on as he glanced between their sweaty faces. "So, you —what, ran here?"

His answer was another ragged wheeze from Remus, and suddenly Gideon was grinning as he herded them into the lift.

"Gaz was really impressed with what he saw at the Roundhouse show," he said, leading them down the long hallway on the top floor. A young secretary leapt into an open doorway just to avoid them, arms full of folder stacks. She puckered sheepishly when Gideon smiled at her, before glancing back to the rest of them.

"I was my brother Fabian who passed your tape along first, you know," he went on. "I thought you sounded like a bunch of Zeppelin wannabes, but he was the one to convince Gaz and I to keep listening."

"So why aren't we here, thanking him?" Sirius drawled.

"Oh, you will be. He's in the meeting. I handle the talent while Fab handles the finances. We're a package deal, see, so do me a favour and try not to piss him off. He's the one who makes sure you all get paid."

The Marauders shared a giddy look. Paid for their music? That'd be the day.

Following closely on the music manager's heels, Remus was surprised when the office with the rock stars' portraits hanging on the wall turned up empty. "Gaz likes to get everyone out of the office when he's meeting with new talent," Gideon explained, gesturing to the empty typewriter desks. "Thinks all the extra noise can be off-putting."

"You should tell him to check in with his staff sometime too," Remus grumbled, still able to recall the rude guy they'd handed their demo tape off too.

Stopping before the door labelled gold with the words 'Gaz Spectre', Gideon knocked once and let them inside. It was a nice office, with deep leather furniture and glass covered bookcases bearing photographs and various awards and accolades. It wasn't as flashy as Remus had been expecting, though admittedly his experience with real music producers was rather null. Fletcher had been putting on an act, and they, in their own naivety, had fallen for it. Gaz Spectre didn't need an act, what he needed was fresh talent, and if Marauders didn't live up to every bit of that expectation then they'd quickly be finding themselves put out on their rears all over again.

"Well," Spectre mused sarcastically, as the four of them trotted in after Gideon, "if it ain't my favourite group of phenomenons."

He was sitting behind a tall desk, rocked back in his leather armchair with a fat cigar balanced between two fingers. His suit was crisp and there were smatterings of grey at his temples, though his moustache and goatee were decidedly black. He could've dyed it to look younger, Remus thought snidely. Behind Spectre, a man who looked almost identical to Gideon save for the closely-shorn way he wore his hair, was leaning up against a bar cart with an empty glass in his hand.

"Gaz," Gideon started, as he began gesturing to the rest of them; "This is Remus Lupin, Peter Pettigrew, James Potter, and Sirius Black. Lads, this is Gaz Spectre, founder of Spectre Records. That there is my brother, Fab."

Spectre nodded at them, while Fabian stood up from the bar cart and poured a generous amount of liquor into the empty tumbler, setting it next to Spectre's ashtray.

"Bourbon?" He offered, raising the decanter. They each nodded timidly, and Fabian went around pouring them a drink. Spectre still hadn't acknowledged his own, and so the Marauders glanced dubiously at one another, wondering if now was the right time to drink.

"Well?" Spectre raised his cigar. "You gonna sit or not?"

They rushed to obey, squeezing themselves into the leather sofa across from the desk. Sirius sat beside them in the remaining armchair, tapping the rim of his bourbon glass with one finger. Remus knew it was an anxious gesture, but Sirius was doing a pretty good job of masking his unease.

"You certainly don't look like today's average rock stars, I'll give you that," said Gaz. "You look about ten years too late."

"Or more," said Fabian.

"You mean you think we're... too old?" James asked.

"Not old—over. I'm calling you over. Finished. Ca-put. You look like you're waiting for the next great Woodstock, and I'm fresh out 'a hippies."

The comments made each of the Marauders look down at themselves. Hardly a cause for alarm, Sirius appeared much the same as he always did in his leather jacket and motorcycle boots, while James looked like an Indian John Lennon with his gelled-up hair and round glasses. Peter had opted for a coat Moira had gotten him as well as a bootlace tie; distinctly un-rock unless you were riding a moped and listening to skiffle. Not used to paying any attention to what he was wearing, Remus had dressed himself little more than a jean jacket and dark trousers, and—as he was now realising—had come out looking like the guy that sold newspapers on the corner.

“Don’t worry, we'd look better on an album cover,” Sirius said, earning himself a short chuckle from Gideon. As Spectre turned to look at him, Gideon leaned over James’ shoulder from behind the sofa and pointed down the line at each of them.

“I promised you rock, Gaz. And you saw it for yourself—these boys can deliver.”

“They can put on a half-decent show, sure,” Spectre nodded, “but that don’t mean they can sell out a stadium.”

“Who do you know who’s selling out stadiums in the beginning?” Peter asked. “The Beatles—”

“Sold over three-hundred million units before you were done wiping your nose, shortstack.”

“The Beatles had no competition,” said James. “The radios were too racist to play anything more than Liverpudlian pop—of course they came out on top.”

“Got something against scousers, kid?”

“No. My girlfriend’s from Liverpool.”

Remarkably, Spectre smiled. Then he pointed at Remus with his cigar and Remus felt his stomach drop.

“You know, when this one flagged me down in the street I thought to myself, ‘here we go, another fucking idiot who thinks his dreams are worth more than the piss on the pavement’. So colour me surprised when Fab, here, played me his tape. Got me thinking to myself, ‘holy shit, maybe he is worth more than the piss’.”

“Generous of you,” Remus mumbled, making Sirius snigger into his palm.

“So they’re clever—so they’re wily—big whoop. Rock’s a liability nowadays, lads. Everyone wants pop, and people ain’t just buying records ‘cause they like the way the music sounds anymore. Now you gotta appear to their ‘wider senses’. You need a show in everything—in the way you dress, drink, and act. If you ain’t covering yourself in shiny little sequins like you're Gary Glitter then they don't want 'cha."

"I don't think that's true," Sirius said boldly. "The Who spent all their time smashing up instruments and Ozzy just covered himself in blood. People still wanted them."

"Aren't you listening, spanner? Those guys are old. They've already secured their success. What do you have?"

"Heart," Peter said.

Remus could see it on Spectre's face; 'Heart'? You've got to be joking me.

"What more do you need than heart?" Sirius said in Peter's defence. "Real bands—real people have heart. You can't put heart into a button you press on a synthesiser. The people know it, they've just forgotten. They don’t know what it is they should be wanting anymore, and it’s our job to show ‘em. So you're right, Ozzy is old. Guys like him don't know what it’s like to be just another face in the crowd anymore.”

“And you do?”

“Sure, we do. Joe Strummer once offered to let Lupin use his toilet after we snuck backstage.”

James reached over and smacked Remus on the arm—“WHAT?”—and Remus waved him off.

“If rock’s so over," he said, "then why’d you invite us here?”

No one said anything at first. Spectre had begun sucking on the end of his cigar. Finally he nodded at Gideon, who leaned over the back of the leather sofa with a delighted sort of grin on his face.

“How’d you four like to go on tour… in America?”

The Marauders' jaws dropped. Looking at each other, they might as well have popped another bottle of champagne.

"For real?" Echoed James. "You're not just making this up?"

"Have you never heard of America, mate?"

James gripped the chair arm next to him, while Peter leaned over and began smacking Remus enthusiastically on the thigh. Sirius had gone very quiet.

"I'll admit it is a bit backwards," Spectre said, dabbing his cigar in the ashtray. "Normally we'd put you up for more shows while we work on getting a single out onto the radio. Then we'd see about a local tour, get you out at the universities, maybe a few shows up north to drum up interest in wider places, but it's like I said—rock's a risk. New rock, anyway. Ain't enough to just throw money at an album—that's a waste. And I ain't in the business of waste."

"So…?" Remus urged.

"So instead we flip the script. I've got a band over in Nevada that needs an opener for their latest tour and I think you're the best ones to do it. Meanwhile, we'll get your demo pressed as an EP—those we'll distribute strictly to the radio stations. See if we can't drum up enough interest for an album... You should know that Warner Brothers just did the same thing for Van Halen last year, so if you sorry sods can do enough to leave those fans foaming at the mouth and racing back to the charts, then I'll put you on a three album contract."

James was practically leaping out of his seat. "Three albums?!" He exclaimed, clasping Gideon by the hand. "You're lying."

"Good news, right?" Gideon grinned.

"Try blinding!"

But then, like an impudent devil on their shoulder, Sirius stopped tapping his bourbon glass.

"And then?"

Everyone whirled on him. Spectre merely scoffed.

"Whatchu mean 'and then'?"

"I mean, what happens when we blow Van Halen and your ruddy little Las Vegas band out of the water? 'Cause we'll want more. Reckon you'll want more, Gaz."

The corners of Spectre's moustache quirked. "Are you trying to sell yourself into slavery, kid?"

"Not at all." Sirius leaned forward on his knees. "Just trying to show you what a real phenomenon looks like." Sirius glanced sideways at his friends and winked. Then he lened forward and placed both hands on his knees.

"We want the Garden."

The words seemed to hang in the air.

" 'The Garden'?" Fabian echoed. "You mean you want to play Madison Square Garden?"

"That's right. In three years."

"Th—! Three years...?"

Sirius shrugged. "Or less. Depends on how well you market us, I suppose."

Gaz tapped the tip of his cigar into the ashtray. "That's bold. In this business 'bold' means risky."

"What's a phenomenon without a little risk?"

Fabian pinched his forehead. "Do you know how few bands make it to a mid-level stadium? What you're talking about is a coliseum—built for twenty thousand people."

"Is that all? Best to put us down for three nights then."

The Marauders all stifled their laughter. They may have been used to Sirius' blithe conviction, but it was clear the music producers were not. Luckily they had Gideon on their side.

"Alright, cheeky," he said, "Prove to us you can work a crowd in Denver, and maybe then we'll talk about booking you into the most famous music venue in the world."

Sirius and Gideon knocked knuckles, and afterwards they all turned to look at Fabian, who was measuring their frontman up for all he was worth. Then he gestured to James.

"You—Potter. Ever tried contact lenses?"

"Uh… no."

"We'll get you some for the tour. Rock stars don't wear glasses."

James scratched the back of his neck. "Seems a bit ableist but alright…"

"Lily loves those glasses on you," Peter remarked kindly, just as Gideon strolled forward and clapped his hands.

"There's this little saying we have in the industry, lads. 'We want the girls in the audience to want to be with the boys in the band, and we want the guys in the audience to want to be in the band'. Can't do that if you're up there looking like Elton John."

"Ha!" Sirius crowed. "Elton John wishes he looked this good."

Eventually they'd all settled back down into their chairs, and Spectre finally raised his long-forgotten drink. "The British Invasion's over, lads," he declared, "you've missed the final charge. All we've got left 'round here is born-again punks and crappy heart-less synthesisers. I'm afraid America's all that's left for you now."

In answer, Sirius raised his glass. "Well then, let's bring on the yanks."

They stumbled back out onto the city pavement with the shock of Spectre's offer still buzzing in their ears. You leave in a month, he'd told them, wrap up any other business before then, and Jesus-fuck, find yourselves something else to wear. American girls are different from English women, they care what your clothes look like before they start ripping 'em off.

"Did that really just happen?" Peter demanded, as a London tour bus drove past and several tourists leaned out its windows to snap photos of them. As the bus drove off, Sirius wrapped a hand around Peter's neck to pull him upright, and slapped him passionately round the middle.

"Yes, my dear Wormy—you just got signed to one of the biggest record labels in the entire country! Time to pack your bags and kiss your mummy goodbye, mate!"

They continued to celebrate, whooping at every bewildered pedestrian who happened to toddle past. James, meanwhile, had moved further up the pavement and was staring very intently into a sewer grate.

“Potter?” Remus shuffled forward, placing a hand on his shoulder. “Potter, are you alright?”

James looked up at him. “Peachy. Just wanted to get a good wiff.”

“Wiff of what?”

“Our shit. ‘Cause it don’t stink no more.”

“I really hope that was meant to be an attempt at a lame joke.”

James’ face split into a grin, and he took hold of Remus’ shoulder in return, just as Sirius and Peter came skipping over. “We did it, didn't we? We actually fucking did it.”

“We did!”

“Holy shit... We did it!”

“Better call Evans.”

James rocked back on his heels in disbelief. Then he threw himself skyward in a single great leap.

“PACK IT IN, BOYS!" He hollered at the sun, "‘CAUSE WE’RE GOING TO AMERICA!”

Chapter End Notes

'Chockablock' means crammed full with something.
'Sounds' was a music magazine that would've been read by fans of the era.
A 'cab fund' is just an account of extra money to be used by the band (usually on drugs, lol).
'Bricking it' means you're so scared you're crapping your pants.
An 'EP' is short for 'extended play'; shorter than a full album, with more songs than a single.
Also Modern English is indeed a real band.

Sorry to have to go back on my word but the final chapter won't be out until Feb 20th! A few days after that I plan to release the tiny epilogue (chapter 108) so please be on the look out for that ＜3 I also have plans to take a complete break from fic and social media once Cadence is completed, but I'll be answering questions about Part 2 and other projects on tumblr for a short while afterwards. Hit me up there if you have questions. (Preferably not - 'omg who ends up with who' tho 😂)

Thank you for coming this far with me. We're in the home stretch!

Chapter 107: Son

Chapter Summary

Well folks, we're ending like we began.

With a series of goodbyes.

Chapter Notes

C/W for this chapter: Discussions of past childhood trauma. It's a hard convo, but it's for the better.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Down at the Astoria the scene was changing,
Bingo and rock were pushing out x-rating;
We were the first band to vomit in the bar,
And find the distance to the stage too far;

Meanwhile it's getting late at ten o'clock,
Rock is dead they say—
Long live rock!

- "Long Live Rock" The Who, 1974

Friday June 22nd 1979

"Moony! Oi, Moony…? Hell, you even up there?"

Remus grunted back;

"Be down in a sec."

There was no need. Sirius came swinging around the bedroom doorway a second later, looking rather outrageous in a velvet-collared frock coat. Seeing him, Remus chuffed lightly.

"You know, most people wait until they've gotten a couple albums out before they start dressing like a gender-queer pirate."

"Is that so? Well, then I feel the need to inform you that most people also wait until their late sixties to start wearing those jumpers with the patches 'round the elbows."

Remus looked down at himself. "Lily said it looked smart. For the party."

"You can take advice from Evans on many things," Sirius sighed, "but fashion is not one of them."

Because he couldn't be bothered, Remus returned his gaze to what he'd been looking at, while Sirius flounced further into the room. “Are you coming then?” He asked, busy fiddling with the cuffs. “Effie’s gonna have our necks if we’re late to our own going away party.”

“Yeah, m'coming…”

Sirius turned his nose up, curious. “Go on then. What’s it you’re looking at?”

There was no need to feel shy. It was only Sirius.

Remus held out the photograph. It was the same one Sandra had given him at the start of last summer; the black and white picture of himself and Hope sitting together on the estate’s parlour floor. The memory had been standing idle on the top of their wardrobe for months now, and Remus had never paid it much attention. Like the old white trunk he'd hauled to school every year, it was enough to just have her nearby. Now that they were going away, his mind had begun to wander.

"I get nervous when you act sentimental," Sirius said. "Usually it means you've done something wrong."

"That is a gross exaggeration."

The corners of Sirius' mouth quirked up and he came to sit next to Remus on their bed. Without asking, he draped both legs over Remus’ lap, sitting upright so that he could meticulously pick a finger through the curls in Remus’ fringe.

“It’s a good photo,” he hummed, peering down at it kindly. “Your mum was proper lush, yeah?”

“Shut up.”

"What?"

"That's my mum."

"Yeah? Well, I'd have still chatted her up. Bet Potter would too… If she were ginger, that is."

Remus turned to him, nose scrunched. "That's enough out of you."

"Shut me up for real then."

Remus didn't need to. Before he could say anything else, Sirius was leaning in to kiss him. It lasted a good while, with Sirius' hands clasped tightly around the sides of his neck, fingers tangled in that silver chain. It was ironic; in every other sense Sirius was electric. He could light up a room with less than a smile—shock you like the unexpected flash of lightning—and yet most of the time, it felt like he was the only thing keeping Remus grounded on earth. He was that rod that kept the rest of him from just... burning up. If it weren't for Sirius, Remus Lupin would've gone up in smoke ages ago. There'd be nothing left save for maybe a few scorch marks on a chair.

"Oh, Moony," Sirius whispered as he stroked his face and hair, "Moony, Moony, my mooning Moony... What's got you feeling so melancholy then, hey? Is it the tour... Mhm... We leave in a few days. Thought you'd be excited."

Leaning away, Remus paused to pick a hair from his mouth—Sirius'.

"It's not that," he mumbled, flicking it away. "Was just thinking."

"Aw. Don't leave us in suspense."

He shook his head. "It's stupid. I was only wondering if… Well, if she'd ever left the country before. Or, hell—been on a plane."

"You mean you don't know?"

The question came out deadpan, and Sirius winced in apology;

"Sorry, dumb question." He cleared his throat. "Couldn't you just—I dunno, ask Giles or something?"

Remus set the photograph back on their set of drawers. He was embarrassed and so he began picking at a hangnail. "Nah, not really. He's sorta weird about it... Reckon he thinks talking about her will upset me. He's probably just afraid I'll turn out like her or something."

"Lush?"

Remus gave him a stern look. "Crazy."

“Oh. Well, I can deal with crazy,” Sirius said, matter-of-factly. “Just don’t start pulling out all your teeth or anything. A guy's got his limits.”

Scoffing, Remus shoved Sirius’ legs off so he could turn himself over, and just like that—had him pressed against the bed. Sirius laughed when his head hit the pillows, and Remus bore down on him with a hand on either side of his head.

“You're saying you wouldn’t love me without teeth, Padfoot?”

“Don’t get all offended, Moons. I wouldn’t love me without teeth.” Sirius smiled and traced his tongue across his front teeth for emphasis.

"And just what happens when we’re old then? When everything starts falling out on its own?”

“I’ll expect you to glue them back in.”

"Right. 'Course."

The bed creaked as Sirius raised both legs and wrapped them around Remus' middle. Remus took hold of a large chunk of Sirius' hair, pinning it to the pillow as if to say, what do you think you're doing? Clearly unbothered, Sirius squeezed with either thigh while simultaneously tracing a hand up the side of Remus' neck. He finally stopped with one thumb pressed against his bottom lip, and Remus felt a breath lodge itself in his throat.

Sirius licked his lips. “God, you’re lush too, aren’t you?”

“Enough. Say ‘lush’ one more time and I’ll—”

“Hush,” he cooed, already pressing the thumb past Remus' lips, laying it against the flat of his tongue. “Keep it a surprise. You know I just love surprises.”

Remus bit down on Sirius’ knuckle, before pulling back and kissing along the inside of his wrist.

“You… You drive me mad, Sirius Black.”

Sirius' lips parted. "Well, in that case..." There was a sudden series of grunts—mostly from Remus—as Sirius pushed up by the shoulders and flipped them over so that he was on top. “—Let's drive to Fiji! Screw the tour, we'll just tell he others to fuck off."

There was no time to formulate a plan of escape. The two had only just begun kissing again when a knock echoed from the corner of the room. The bedroom door was still ajar but rather than walking straight in unannounced, a hand waved itself through the open doorway like a white flag of surrender.

James Potter, it seemed, was finally learning.

“Not that I don’t totally love that cheeky feeling of deja vu, but it’s almost seven o’clock, so could you two please get those randy arses of yours in the car? We're going to be late...”

An hour later, they pulled up to Potter Cottage to find a small line of parked cars waiting out front. Every light in the house was on, and Mr. Potter's front garden was in full bloom. They were met at the door by Mrs. Potter, who smiled as she kissed James and Sirius on either cheek.

“Arey, Remus, beta, you get taller every time I see you," she said, after settling on a warm hug. "Oh, Lily—come here, darling… And Peterbird, you’ve brought Moira! Welcome, welcome. Jai shri Krishna. Come inside, all of you. Everyone’s waiting… And we have such wonderful news to celebrate!”

Fashionably late for their own party, the Marauders walked inside to find a sea of family and friends waiting for them. Marlene and Dorcas were there, along with Lottie and Roger, fresh off their Spanish honeymoon. Simeon was even chatting up Mary in the salon; only Mr. Pettigrew had stayed away, leaving his wife to make excuses for how he was needed in the office that evening. No one bought it, but Peter had put on a brave face anyway, somehow determined to make the most of his good news despite his father’s disapproval.

Effie had pulled out all the stops in her cooking, having converted the dining room into a massive buffet-style spread of all the quintessentially British foods they'd be missing while abroad. "I hope you boys brought your appetites," she said, while loading Remus' plate up with several layers of wellington and chicken biryani. "Mind the raita now, and make sure you leave space for pudding! Jenny's made Banoffee pie."

It was grand. Not to be outdone, Lottie had even found the time to have shirts made, which the girls and Mr. Potter sported around the house gladly. On their front was a large red ‘M’ surrounded in the same tiny footprints Peter had hidden in their band poster, and on the back—Marauders' first American (back up) Tour '79.

"Kinda bummed I didn't get one," Simeon said, observing the girls from his spot along the parlour wall. Remus was with him, having stuffed himself to the bursting point with supper. Now he was just trying not to feel nauseous every time he glanced at the heaping trays of canapés still scattered about the room.

"Lottie did say that she had a few more in the boot of Roger's car," he said, after burping quietly into his fist.

"Did she? I'll have to snag Rog's keys." Simeon smirked into his glass of champagne. "All packed then, Lupin?"

"Mostly. I don't have a lot of clothes. Probably for the best... Sirius keeps sneaking things into my bag."

"Ah. And I suppose this means you officially don't have any plans for university then?"

"Not in this lifetime."

"You sound smug."

Remus shrugged, swallowing the nausea and feeling smug indeed. "This your attempt to talk us out of it then?"

"Me? Never." Simeon finished his champagne, 'ah-ing' the way people often did when they were working themselves up for some big reveal. "Don't tell Peter, but you four have got me feeling particularly inspired these recent months."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"It means..." And Simeon tilted his face toward Remus'. "That I'm dropping out."

'Surprised' wasn't quite the word to describe it.

"You're dropping out of Oxford?" Remus echoed, careful not to let anyone overhear; "Christ—why?"

"Didn't I just say? 'Cause of you." Smirking, Simeon set his glass down on an empty canapé plate. "I haven't told anyone apart from you, to be honest. Might just not... I'm sure my parents would prefer thinking I was living neat out in Oxfordshire anyway, going to school like a good little boy."

"And where is it you'll really be?"

"Just New York."

"Wow."

He shrugged like it was nothing. "A friend of mine's a photographer. Anyway, he knows a guy who works for some fancy scouting agency over in America. He sent him my photos, and now his boss wants me to meet them in New York."

"To what, like—be a model or something?"

"Think I couldn't?"

Remus looked him up and down, skeptical, then; "Er... Never mind."

"Ah, Lupin, you always were a charmer. Here, hold on." Slipping away for just a moment, Simeon returned with two beers; one he handed to Remus before knocking their rims together. "You can blame Sirius," he said, going in for a swig. "He gave me the idea actually—something he mentioned at the wedding. Figured he was taking the piss, but since he usually has such great ideas, I just thought that—well."

"You think your parents are gonna like it?"

"Oh, not a chance! But they've got Lottie, she'll make 'em proud. And hey, Petey will too, in his own way… I'm glad he's blazing a trail with you though. Makes me feel a bit braver." Simeon leaned back into the wall, his blonde hair offsetting the dark wallpaper. "I dunno, Lupin... It's like, I used to think that it was enough to just be clever, right? By an average bloke's standards, a clever mouth might as well make you extraordinary. But here I am, all clever mouth and still just... ordinary."

"We never thought you were ordinary," Remus said. "Not for a second."

"Aw. That's sweet."

"Dick." Remus kicked him lightly on the shin, and Simeon's eyes began to wander.

"Hey, Sim?"

"Mm?"

"You should know that Peter—" Remus hesitated, before sighing. "Look, I know he's never really said it or anything, and the two of you have this—I dunno, weird brotherly-rivalry thing going on that I'll never understand, but he looks up to you, Sim—really."

"You think?"

Remus shrugged. "Well... Yeah. Reckon all he's ever wanted was to be you actually."

Simeon chuckled. "And look at us now, Lupin."

Together, the pair of them glanced across the room in the direction of where Peter and Moira were sitting tight on one of the lounges. It felt wistful, maybe, but at least Simeon smiled, and afterwards knocked the tip of his shoe into Remus' ankle.

“Thank you by the way, Lupin. For always keeping my secrets.”

Remus clinked their beers together.

“Anytime, Sim.”

Not long after Simeon’s confession, Remus found themselves busy relaying the tour schedule to Mrs. Pettigrew, who insisted on repeating everything he said with an air of surprise—“Twelve weeks? Twenty-five cities? Over forty shows?! Oh my…”—when they all overheard the doorbell ring. Like a good host, Mr. Potter went to get up from his sofa chair to fetch it, only to be rebuffed by James.

"Nah, don't worry, Dad. I got it."

"Who could that be?" Peter asked, just before James returned with a giddy smile on his face.

“Moony! Oi, Moony, you’ll never guess…”

But Remus didn’t have to guess. He’d invited them after all.

“Take this, would ya?” Tomny said, tossing the nappy bag at him as he tugged his boots off. He’d gotten good at balancing the baby carrier in one hand while he did so, a talent that less than year ago would’ve had Remus falling over in shock.

“Hello, luv’,” Skylar said, pecking Remus on the cheek as she shrugged off her coat. Remus barely had time to return the hello; before he knew it, the Potters had emerged from the parlour with James and

Lily close on their heels.

“You must be Tomny,” Mrs. Potter said, “and Skylar! Welcome, welcome—you are most welcome. I hope you found the house alright.”

“Hard to miss, innit?” Tomny said cheekily, but his smile said everything. He carefully handed Remus the baby carrier and shook James and Mr. Potter’s hands before allowing Mrs. Potter to pull him into a hug as though they were old friends. Over her shoulder, he winked at Remus, then pointed toward the carrier.

“Best watch out, Lu. Little bugger’s only jus’ stopped crying.”

Remus looked down. Emma was sucking on a dummy, staring around the new place with big brown eyes. They’d been blue like Tomny’s when she was born, but now at nearly eight weeks, her eyes were as dark as shoe leather. It was not the first time the two of them were being introduced; Remus had been there for the christening, just like Tomny and Skylar had wanted. He signed his name on the baptism certificate, and afterwards Tomny gave him Emma to hold. She was so small, Remus had been afraid of hurting her, and most of the photos had him looking like he was one small jostle away from throwing up all over the church floor.

"Remus," Lily chided, "won't you invite your friends inside?"

"They want to see the baby," James clarified, looking to Tomny.

"Have at 'er, mate. I'd keep edgy if I were you, though. One 'a her farts sure can clear a room."

After guiding Tomny and Skylar into the parlour, the Potters celebrated their new arrivals with another grand round of introductions. The girls were instantly enamoured with Emma and sat cooing around her carrycot while Mr. Potter broke out several fresh bottles of wine. He offered the first glass to Skylar, who appeared happy enough to indulge in a glass after nine months of forced sobriety. Tomny, however, abstained, citing a need to drive at the end of the night. Secretly, Remus was proud of him.

"Should probably step outside for one of these though," Tomny said, raising his cigarettes. Mr. Potter stopped him.

"Good idea, son. Smoke's no good for the baby, but I only wondered if I could tempt you..."

Mr. Potter offered a box of his Cuban-leaf cigars, to which Tomny answered with an impressed arch of his brow.

"Shit. Don't mind if I do."

“Oh, aren’t you just the cutest thing?” Mary moaned, as she leaned down over Emma's carrycot. Marlene and Dorcas stood behind her, each of them sporting a beer and a red ‘Marauders’ t-shirt of their own.

“Thought you hated babies, Macdonald?” Dorcas asked sceptically.

“Only when I have to take care of them.” She glanced up at Skylar. “May I?”

Skylar waved her on. “Let me know if she needs a nappy change.”

“Aw no,” Mary went on cooing, as she scooped the baby up. “You’re just darling, aren’t you?”

Just then Lottie appeared in the parlour doorway, having stepped out to powder her nose. "No one told me there was a baby!" She shrieked, rushing forward to tug pointedly on Mary's sleeve. “Go on, Mary, hand the pwecious wittle thing over.”

“Wait your turn, Lot. I only just got her, and just because you went and got yourself hitched doesn’t mean you get to call bags on every toddler from here to Andalusia.”

Lottie pouted, but eventually got her turn and one-by-one the girls passed the baby around for a cuddle each. Emma was patient with them for the most part, sucking happily on her dummy and only grabbing hold of a fistful of Mary’s hair when one of her curls fell into her face.

"Yeah, she's a bit grabby," Skylar said, helping untangle Emma's fingers as Mary moaned; ow, ow, ow! "Doctor's saying she's advanced for her age. Most kids don't even start grabbing things 'til twelve weeks."

Already on her second turn with the baby, Lottie wasted no time in beckoning her husband over.

"Rog! Rog, come here! Come see how adorable she is."

Roger, who'd been previously engrossed in a work-related conversation with Mr. Potter, sighed as he meandered over.

"Yes, very cute."

"Here, try holding her."

Roger didn't appear all that eager, and had to be reminded to mind the baby's head on two separate occasions. To her credit, Emma did not immediately begin to cry, however it only took a few seconds for her to decide that she was done being held, and subsequently spit up all over the front of Roger's fine grey suit.

"Oh, shit—sorry!" Skylar rushed forward, while Roger began to gag into the palm of his hand. The room erupted into giggles despite of this, and Mrs. Potter was kind enough to come forward with a towel to help clean the big-shot up.

"Now, now. No use in getting all fussy, Roger Penrose," she chided. "You're going to have to get used to this, you know."

"Lottie," Mrs. Pettigrew interrupted, "take Roger next door to ours, he can borrow one of your father's suits for the meantime."

As Lottie herded her disgruntled husband out, Remus overheard Peter mutter something to Moira about how if Lottie was smart she'd put off having kids until she was thirty. Moira didn't reply, and eventually Mr. Potter stood up to break the tension;

"Anyone feel like some music?"

He put on a folk album, to which Skylar happily announced that she knew. Humming along, she kept her daughter balanced in one arm while she sipped from her beer, content enough until Lily offered to take Emma off her hands so she could finish her drink.

"N-No, it's alright," Skylar replied, looking suddenly worried.

"You're sure? I really don't mind."

Skylar glanced between her daughter and the beer, before nodding pensively.

"Well, just for a little bit then..."

A 'little bit' turned into a good half-hour, with Lily rocking Emma right to sleep on one of the Potters' fancy ottomans. James had sat down behind her and was whispering things into Lily's ear to make her laugh. Remus could hear it now;

Whaddya think, 'Prongs Jr' for the middle name?

As if, Potter.

“There you are," Tomny called, sauntering up to Remus in the corner of the room. He had a Coke in one hand, courtesy of Mrs. Potter, which he sipped from generously. It was probably a very difficult thing—being sober in a room full of people who had never had to think about where their next drink was coming from, much less all the things they'd do to get it.

"How was your cigar?" Remus asked.

Tomny mimed sucking one back. "Rich. I forgot you aren't supposed to suck 'em into yer lungs. Spent all of ten minutes coughing into the pavement."

"Idiot."

"Met one of those friends 'a yers though. Simeon? He's... posh."

Remus grinned. "Yeah, well, you missed all the fun in here. Your daughter threw up all over Roger. I'll wager he's bent over the pavement right about now too."

"Ah." Tomny sipped from his Coke, looking pleased. "I guess you finally found someone who’s more popular with the ladies than you."

"You mean Emma? Yeah, you should talk, wanker. But I still remember Cheryl, and Donna." He began counting them off on his fingers; "And Tracey, and Libby, and Veronica—”

“Alright, alright—not so loud. I’m a committed man now, I’ll have ya know. Though… suppose you are too, seeing as how Lover-boy hasn’t stopped glaring at me since we got ‘ere.”

Remus glanced across the room, to where Sirius was sitting with Peter and Moira, presumably trying to play nice. It would’ve been more effective had he been actually listening to whatever Moira was going on about and not turned halfway around in his seat to stare pointedly in Tomny’s general direction.

“What can I say, he’s cute when he’s jealous,” Remus replied smugly. He watched as Tomny gave a cheeky wave, and Sirius responded by not-so-subtly scratching his nose with his middle finger.

Remus nudged his friend. “Thanks for coming, Tom.”

“Any time. That Simeon bloke sure had a lot to say about you. Is there anyone here you haven't kissed?"

"You—? Simeon and I never kissed!"

"But you wanted to, didn't you?"

"Ha. Prick!"

Tomny laughed, nudging Remus with his shoulder. "Right, my bad. But I am glad we came. Honestly it was just a relief to get out of the house for a while. Don’t tell her I said so, but I think Sky was going a bit stir-crazy. Emma cries a lot.”

“Aren’t babies supposed to cry?”

“Sure, but Emma cries all the time. We thought she had colic, but the doctor just thinks she's fussy. Mostly it's whenever—"

On cue, Emma gave a wail loud enough to drown out Mr. Potter's second folk album. She was being held by Dorcas, who was quick to pass her back to Skylar, but even as her mother cooed little assurances to her, Emma kept on balling.

“Maybe her godfather should have a go,” Lily suggested, already standing at the ready with her camera. Remus highly suspected she’d conspired with Emma to plan it.

“Aw-right! Can’t wait to get a load 'a this,” Tomny said, as Skylar stepped up and practically dumped her daughter into Remus’ arms. Emma blinked twice, another wail hovering on the tip of her tongue, and then—

Nothing.

“Fuckin' hell,” Peter said, before covering his mouth for the curse; “Sorry. Only meant—she stopped crying.”

“Always does wiff ‘im,” Tomny said, jutting a thumb in Remus’ direction. “I call it blatant favourtism.”

“Who would’a thought it,” Marlene sniggered; “Remus Lupin, the baby whisperer.”

“What? No, I only—” Remus glanced down at Emma, who’d started playing with the chain necklace around his throat, her eyes still damp with tears. For someone who barely had control over her own tongue, she was mighty quick to ham-fist the plastic guitar pick hanging on its very end and shove it into her gummy mouth.

“Oi, don’t swallow it.”

Nearby, Lily raised her camera. “Look here, Emma, darling. Smiiiile, Remus.”

KA-CHSSH!

‘She ain’t got no money,
Her clothes are kinda funny,
Her hair is kinda wild and free!
Oh, but love grows where my Rosemary goes—
And nobody knows like me!’

Once everyone had gobbled down their share of salty canapés and fizzy champagne, and Emma had wowed everyone by blowing a snot-rocket onto Remus’ shoulder, Mr. Potter turned down the music and invited the room to share in a toast.

“I have to be honest, boys,” he started, “when James came to us and said that he was going to give this band stuff a try instead of going off to university—well, a part of me thought it was a mistake. I was worried for your futures, all of you. But you made a promise and kept to your word, and for that alone, we could never be more proud. So to James, Peter, Sirius, and Remus—I only have one thing to say, and that’s cheers to you.”

Everyone raised their glass;

“ ‘CHEERS!’”

“I have some good news of my own too!” James added keenly. “Lily is —”

“OHMYGOD—She's pregnant!” Mary burst out. Turning beet-red, Lily smacked her with one of the sofa pillows as she fumed;

“No, Mary! God, you are so full of it!”

“Geez, alright. One of these days I’m gonna be right though...”

Only looking slightly frazzled, James tossed a sincere look at his mother before clearing his throat;

“What I meant to say… is that Lily’ll be joining us on tour! Once she finishes her term in June, of course.”

The girls gasped in delight, and Roger—donned in a fresh suit—leaned over to smack Peter keenly on the shoulder. “Brilliant! And Moira too, I’ll expect?”

The chatter died a bit.

“Actually I’ll be spending the summer in the Isle of Skye,” Moira answered stiffly. “My grandparents have a house there."

No one said anything, and Moira rushed to clarify;

"But they’ve said that Petey’ll be able to call me from the road. Isn't that right, Petey?”

Peter sipped his beer, nodding firmly. Meanwhile Roger turned to Sirius and gave him a fond shove on the shoulder.

“Suppose you two lads’ll be having the time of your life then,” he said, gesturing to Remus. “You know, plenty of American girls to go around and all that.”

Barely a second had passed before the entire room had burst into laughter.

“Oh yeah, birds aplenty!”

“Getting it in every night!”

“Proper menaces, they’ll be!”

Simeon dropped a hand on his brother-in-law’s shoulder while Lottie pinched her forehead, leaving Roger to look around himself in bewilderment.

“What? Lottie, what’d I say?”

Everyone was still caught mid-guffaw by the time Sirius stood up. “Moony and I appreciate the vote of confidence, Rog,” he said humbly, while reaching into the inside pocket of his oversized leather jacket. “Luckily for us, you’re not the only one who expects big things.”

Withdrawing his hand, Sirius held up a small paper album sleeve, which happened to hold a single red-pressed vinyl EP. It was titled Marauders, and it was their very first.

“Got this from Spectre,” he told everyone. “It’s one of the ones he’s gonna distribute to the radio stations during our tour. But I got him to make an extra, just in case we fail terribly."

"Which you're not gonna!" Said Marlene.

"Of course not! But we all thought to ourselves, who better to have it than the fools who believed in us. So, Mum—Dad… this is for you.”

With a flourish, Sirius dropped down onto one knee and presented the vinyl disc to Effie, who accepted with happy tears in her eyes. Remus watched on proudly, smiling until Emma tried to shove a fist into his mouth.

Eventually the parlour got to be too stifling, even with the windows open, and Mr. Potter opened up the patio doors so that the party could migrate out into the back garden and appreciate the early-evening air. The music carried through the open windows, and Mary had managed to convince Marlene and Dorcas to dance despite not being nearly drunk enough. It was mostly disco, that was until Sirius boldly put on their own EP. Even more shocking—they knew the words.

" 'Hey, have you seen my friends around?
Oh, I swear they’re pretty hard to miss!
One’s yay-high with flowers in her hair—
And the other you’d likely kiss'!"

"Are you ever going to tell Mary you wrote this song for her?" Peter asked.

"Not me," Remus replied. "This one was all Sirius."

Moira took Peter's arm. "Come on, Petey, let's dance."

There was no arguing with her, and so Peter went, and on and on they danced. Even Tomny was up there, Skylar's arms wrapped around his neck as they swayed. It was a bit of a mind-fuck to see them dance along to “Midnight Dancer”, but Remus told himself that it was enough for just to see them enjoy it. This one was his, after all. And he wanted them to be happy.

“You’re so lucky, you know,” he whispered to Emma, as he rocked her on one of the Potters’ wicker garden benches. She blinked at him for a while, and finally answered by knocking the dummy from her mouth with her tongue. Remus was just fitting the rubber nipple back into her mouth when Sirius dropped down beside him.

“Still stuck on baby-duty, huh?"

"Yup."

"And here I was about to ask you to dance. Should we offer Lottie another turn?”

“Can’t. She cries whenever I put her down.”

Sirius narrowed his eyes. “That sounds like a lie.”

“Oh? Shall we test it then?” Remus held the baby out to him, and Sirius instantly veered away. Emma’s chubby legs had only been hovering in the air for a moment before she started to gurgle and whine.

“Take it back—take it back!”

“Told you.” Remus settled the baby back into his lap, adjusting her rubber dummy while Sirius looked on contemptuously.

“Eugh—must mean she just likes you.” He pointed a finger softly at Emma’s nose. “Don’t think I’m not watching you, girl. I know your game. Just ‘cause you think you’re so cute…”

“You’re jealous of a baby now, Pads?”

“For your information, it’s called being smart.” Sirius tapped his head; “Women always have good intuition—even as babies.”

In answer, Emma made a little hiccuping noise that might've been a laugh were she not so fresh out the womb. Then she reached out and grasped Sirius' finger with her tiny hand, and Remus knew it was purposeful.

“Ugh—don’t do that,” Sirius scoffed. “Don’t act cute. You and me—we ain’t friends. You’re only here to take my man away, I know it.”

Emma pushed the dummy out of her mouth, coming as close to a smile as a seven-week-old human could. Sirius kept squinting at her, but did not pull his finger away.

“Have you spoken to Regulus at all?” Remus asked, watching as James spun Lily around the patio like a music box ballerina.

“A bit. He's agreed to watch the flat while we’re gone.”

"Cool. Guess that means he doesn't have any plans to go back to your parents' place then?"

At that, Sirius matched Emma's smile.

"He said he wanted to work. How did he put it... To 'do something for himself for a change'. I think he's just rebelling, myself.”

"About time."

They shared a laugh, and Remus knocked him fondly with his knee.

“That’s good, Sirius. Really.”

Sirius nodded, gently rocking his finger as Emma clung to it. “You all ready for America then? … Flight’s in a few days. I dunno—maybe it’s just me looking into things, but you seem sorta… off.”

“And if I say it is just you?”

“Fine, I know it’s not me. You’ve been… quiet, Moons. Like this morning when you—”

"Yeah, I know," Remus said, finishing Sirius' sentence for him. He took a moment to fit the dummy back into Emma’s mouth again—baby tongues, weird—before nodding. “I’ve just been doing a lot of thinking lately.”

“Ohhhh no.” Sirius leaned down toward Emma. “Watch this, kid—this is the part where he does something stupid.”

“Yeah, you would call it stupid…”

After making a few friendly fish-faces at the baby, Sirius sighed and straightened up again.

“Alright, what is it then? Is it redemption? Are we asking Lee to be our roadie or something? Personally I don’t think he’ll accept but if you're looking for someone to get you in shape for the tour then I'm sure he wouldn't mind going for a few rounds in the boxing ring."

"It's not Lee," Remus replied grimly. "But it is a redemption of sorts."

"Wanna spell it out for me then? I don't actually know what it is you're thinking all the time, you know."

Remus swallowed thickly.

"I just think it's time I go home, Sirius."

"Home like… the flat home?"

"No."

"Oh, good. 'Cause I sorta promised Mary I'd let her show me that eyeliner trick before we leave on tour."

"Sirius—"

"Fine—I asked her if she'd show me. But if you're really tired then I'm sure Effie wouldn't mind if we—"

"Not the flat." Remus took a deep breath. "I mean, I think it's time I go speak with my father."

"… Oh."

"I keep thinking that I should say something to him before I up and leave the country. And there's Giles… Guess, I've got a few people to visit."

"Right."

Remus looked down at Emma, ashamed. "You think it's a bad idea."

"No! S'just… ugh." Sirius reached a hand up to the side of his neck, rubbing it like it was giving him grief. "I just didn't think there was all that much to say to the guy. It's not like his opinion matters."

"Yeah, but he was still my dad for seventeen years."

Sirius pressed his tongue to the inside of his cheek, looking forlorn and distraught. That, perhaps, was the one way they differed when it came to their own respective parental troubles. Sirius wanted to let go —to throw it all away and be done with it. For Remus, hating something had always felt better than hating nothing.

"If you think it's stupid then I'll—"

"No—no. You're right, I get it," Sirius said, dropping the arm from his neck. "To be honest, Moons, I've been thinking about it a lot too. Going home, I mean."

"You mean you...?"

"Not literally." Sirius gave a dry chuckle. "Shit, I ain't ever doing that again… No, it was the safe actually. You know, the one in my father's office. It opened when I put in my birthday—not Reg's, mine—and I dunno. I just couldn't stop thinking about it. Dad and I never got along, see? Even without Mum. So like, did he really mean to do that? To remind himself of me every time he… Or shit. Could he just not be bothered to change the fucking code?"

"I wish I had an answer for you."

"Yeah, me too." Sirius looked up at him, smiling haggardly. "It's stupid anyway. I'm not ever gonna know now, so what point is there in killing myself over it?"

Remus nodded.

"But I suppose… that it's not too late for you to get some answers."

It took a moment for Remus to understand what Sirius had meant. Was that he wanted then—answers? He imagined it was hard to get answers without any real questions, but still—if this was supposed to be their new life, then he supposed making peace with his old one was the best way to go. And if not peace, then at least remission.

"So you'll go with me then?"

"You mean to do this one last entirely stupid thing that might not make any difference in the long run anyway?" Sirius shrugged. "Hey, you know me—I'll get the keys."

Feeling comforted, Remus leaned down to kiss the top of Emma's head. Across the patio, his friends were still swaying; Tomny and Skylar were holding each other close, mouths pressed to each other's ears as they giggled and shared whispers.

Remus smiled into the wisps of Emma's hair.

“Thank you, Sirius," he said. "For everything.”

Next to him, Sirius took his hand.

“You’re welcome, Moons.”

* * *

There are places I remember,
All my life though some have changed;
Some forever, not for better,
Some have gone and some remain;

All these places have their moments,
With lovers and friends I still can recall;
Some are dead and some are living,
In my life I’ve loved them all…

* * *

In the twenty-six minutes that it took them to get from Victoria to Blackheath Hill, Remus had almost asked Sirius to turn the car around three separate times. He was sitting in the passenger’s seat, ripping the skin around his nails to shreds while the radio played its Top Hits. Eventually Sirius reached over and clasped one of Remus’ hands in his to help ease the worst of it, but the thoughtful show of devotion did little to quell the apprehension brewing in Remus’ gut.

He couldn’t help but feel like he was making a mistake.

Perhaps it would’ve been better to just disappear into obscurity, as he’d been doing all year. Let whatever relationship he and his father had fizzle out to nothing. But he was going away. This tour could very well be the first of many nights spent away from London, and he knew that saying nothing would hurt Giles—especially after so many months of silence. Shit... Remus knew what he had to do. If he was going to accept Spectre’s offer of a lifetime, then it was probably time to face his demons head-on.

“Are you sure you don’t want me to come with you?” Sirius asked when they’d pulled to the top of the estate’s long driveway.

Remus didn't answer at first. He couldn't stop picturing the surprise on the gateman's face. He'd done a double-take when they'd pulled up in their rusty purple Volkswagen—a few more months and he might not have recognised him at all. Would he still be Lyall Lupin's son then?

"No," he answered eventually. "I think this is something I have to do on my own."

Sirius tapped his hands along the steering wheel. "Alright. But I'll be right here when you're finished."

Turning around, Remus leaned and left a gentle kiss on the very corner of Sirius' mouth.

"Be right back."

He slammed the car door shut just as Sirius was lifting the sunglasses from his eyes.

"Oi! I love you—you hear me?"

Remus smiled, waving as he started up the estate's steps. A high-pitched honk followed him, and for a second he felt hopeful. But that all fell away when he was faced with the towering front doors of the Lupin estate. There was a tremor in Remus' hand when he knocked, but he was thankful for the familiar face that answered. It was Giles, a little more creased at the edges, but still wearing his favourite waistcoat and cap.

"Hi, Gil."

The old driver looked torn. He probably didn't know whether to embrace him or put him over his knee. In the end he opted for a scolding.

"You—You cheeky—! Do you even know how long it's been?!"

"A while. Give or take a few days."

Giles' nostrils flared the way they always did when he was full of rage. Then he swallowed it. "You… You look different," he grunted stiffly. "You're taller. More—More… Well, you look like a man."

Remus' chin dipped, suddenly bashful. It made Giles chuff lightly, and he grasped Remus around both shoulders as if to admire him.

“Christ—you look like a rock star! You’ve grown… Oh. My little bugger.”

Remus smiled back at him, feeling a sting in the corners of his eyes.

“Speaking of grown, has your nose gotten bigger by any chance?”

Giles clapped him upside the head. “Watch your mouth,” he warned, before taking a deep breath. “Look at me pissing about—come in. We’ll get you settled in for a drink and you can tell us all it is that you’ve been doing this long while.”

Remus was grateful. He knew coming back would be difficult, but he’d underestimated just how happy he'd be to see his old friend again. The house still felt empty; the ceilings too high—the rooms too big. The vastness made him feel small, like he was nine years-old again and being sent to his room on Christmas morning.

After following Giles into the parlour, Remus sat down and allowed the driver to pour him a glass of whatever Spanish brandy he had on hand.

“Here. Since you’re such a big ‘man’ now.”

Remus thanked him. “I shouldn’t stay long though, I’ve got a friend waiting in the car.”

“The dark-haired one. I recognise him."

Remus nodded.

"His hair looks better long," Giles said as he handed him a glass of brandy. "Not all short like it was the first time you brought him here."

It took a second.

"The first time?"

"You remember. That summer you smuggled him into your bedroom."

Remus nearly dropped his brandy. "Giles, you knew?"

"Of course I knew. You may be sneaky, but I'm the one who raised you. I know all your tricks, bugger—there ain't a single thing you can hide from me."

It was humbling, surely, and Remus ran a hand through his hair as he raised his glass. "Fuck—cheers, I guess."

The brandy was foul. It tasted like the stuff Peter used to lift from his parents' liquor cupboard during their Christmas holidays. They used to choke the stuff down in James' bedroom, telling themselves that it was all worth it for the buzz.

"Glad to know you're not fully grown yet," Giles remarked after watching him grimace. He took a seat in his old armchair before starting; "So! Where is it you've been all this time?"

Remus traced the edge of his brandy glass.

"Oh, you know… around."

"Likely story."

"We rented a flat. We... we work."

"Fine. And where is it you're hoping to go next?"

"That's what I've come to tell you actually."

Giles began to stroke his stubbly chin, and Remus knew there was no point in beating around the bush anymore. Sitting forward in the chair, he readied himself for the grand reveal.

"I'm going to America, Gil."

Instantly Giles' entire body fell slack. If he had anything to say, he never got the chance. Before either of them knew it, a loud bark echoed through the parlour, and the door was nosed open by a single scruffy, speckled hound. If Remus had been standing, he would've barrelled him over, but as it was, all Dusty could do was fling his entire body up into his lap.

"Oh f—DUSTY! Jesus—down, boy! Down!"

"Looks like I ain't the only one who's been wondering where you've been," Giles called. Dusty continued to bowl into Remus, pinning him to the sofa chair as he slobbered kisses up and down his face and neck. As jarring as it was, Remus was no less than delighted. It was Dusty, his oldest friend.

"I'm sorry, Dusty," he said, making sure to hug the dog tight. "I'm sorry."

“He’s been waiting for you,” Giles said, however fondly. “You should be glad you came. Had a bit of a scare a few months back, but the doc’s said he’s in the clear now. ‘Course he’s never slowed down… Wilder than a march hare, that one. Your influence, I expect.”

Capturing the coonhound’s long face in his hands, Remus held their heads together, staring into his dog’s deep brown eyes.

“You good, boy?” He whispered. “You alright? I’m so sorry I made you wait.”

Dusty threw his hands off, and celebrated with another frothy kiss. It took a while for Remus to get him off the chair, and afterwards the happy dog laid down by his feet, panting with his tongue out and accepting no less than many—many, head scratches. With his free hand, Remus wiped beneath his nose, sniffling.

“I’d like to take him with me, if I can. I know our place isn’t exactly ideal—it’s got a busy road and a shit garden, but there’s room. I already talked to the landlady. And... well, I’d feel bad leaving him here again.”

“Of course you should take him,” said the old driver sceptically, “but I’m not sure how well a dog like Dusty would do on a plane to America.”

“I can sort it,” he said earnestly. There was Regulus or Mary—and it was just for the summer! But… “Unless you think he’d be happier here with the other dogs…”

Giles shook his head. “Nah, he’s your dog. About time you took responsibility anyway—you know I was just looking out for him while you were gone. And home is where the heart is. It’s why I understand why you’re going off to America in the first place. I’m sorry, Remus, I didn’t realise you’d found him.”

It was like piecing together a puzzle without knowing what the picture was first. It took a while, in which Dusty barked several times and began gnawing on his shoe, but then Remus remembered what Giles had told him while standing on the pavement outside King’s Cross Station.

America—home—found him.

Giles thought he meant he was going to his father. His real father.

“It’s not that, Gil,” Remus said earnestly. “It’s my band—we got a deal. Or—we got this opportunity anyway. There’s a producer. We met with him and he’s agreed to put us up as an opening act for some other band. We’re going to tour America and play our music. We… We leave next week. I'm not just chasing false hopes.”

Giles slouched back into his chair. “Well, I’ll be…”

“I know it sounds crazy, but it’s real, I swear. We’ll be in San Antonio starting next week, and who knows—if we do good on this, maybe next it could be us touring the country on our own.”

“And just who’s driving?”

“Well, I… we’ll be on a tour bus, I reckon.”

Giles nodded thoughtfully. “And I expect you’ll be enjoying yourself on the road?”

“What d’you mean?”

“I’m old—I ain’t ancient! I know what those rock stars get up to in their spare time. All the drinkin’ and the drugs and the women. I’ll bet you’re just sooo excited to get up there and have those girls throw themselves at ‘chu.”

Apparently there were some secrets he could hide from Giles.

"Why does everybody keep saying that?”

“Remus John Lupin, if you dare get a girl pregnant out of wedlock—”

Remus threw both hands up; “Gil—trust me, you have quite literally nothing to worry about.”

“Taken a vow of chastity, have you?”

“Something like that.”

“Huh. I always knew that religious school was gonna be a good influence.”

Remus couldn’t help it; he broke down laughing until he’d fallen back into his chair and Dusty was nosing about to get into his lap again. Just then the parlour door opened for a second time and a man wearing a dark suit and a business-style tie poked his head in.

“Bloody dog,” he was grumbling, “Dusty—here! Heel!”

Remus sat up, holding his dog close by the collar. The man noticed him straight away, and jumped in surprise.

“Giles?”

The driver said nothing in reply, and quickly the butler stepped out.

“That’d be Carsten,” observed Giles gratingly.

“I remember him.”

“He’ll be going straight for your father to tell him you’re here now.”

“That’s alright. Dad and I have some unfinished business. I only came back because I couldn’t go away knowing how we’d left things. And to sort out my responsibilities, I guess...”

He'd started patting Dusty on the head. Across from him, Giles lifted his brandy glass, pointing it in Remus’ direction.

“Careful, you’re almost starting to sound like a man too.”

Remus tipped his chin down again, and went on patting Dusty’s ears.

Not five minutes later, Giles had walked him over to the west wing, where he knew he’d find his father’s office waiting at the very end of the hall.

“Behave,” Giles told him, “and if you can’t behave then—”

“Be good, I know. I remember.”

He left him with a warning smile, tottering off with Dusty in tow.

Remus hoped Sirius wasn’t boiling himself alive in the car. It was getting warmer these days—supposed to be even hotter in America. Peter had already spent days talking their ear off about that one time he’d visited New York with his family, (Remus still hadn’t told them about Simeon,) and James was excited to see the Grand Canyon. It’s almost two thousand miles long! He’d said. According to Sirius, a big hole in the ground wasn’t all that much to sneeze at. The real prize was Los Angeles, where one could surf and play and party from sunrise to sunset. Remus wasn’t sure what he was most excited for. The music probably. He wanted to see some phenomena.

At the end of the hall, the office opened and Sandra stepped out in a sleek white pantsuit. Remus wasn't surprised; he'd been expecting her, and tried not to react when she dropped the door handle and rushed toward him.

"Remus! Oh, I'm so glad you came. Look at you, you're so…" She sighed, squeezing his shoulders. "How have you been? You look healthy. How are your friends?"

"Send him in, Sandra."

It was his father, for once saving him from having to reply. At the sound of her husband's voice coming through the crack in the door, Sandra looked up and gave Remus a warm smile.

"We'll talk after," she cooed, petting his hand. "Go ahead. He's waiting for you."

Remus was half-sure he'd rather hear her say that he was clear to join a bomb disposal squad than know that Lyall fucking Lupin was ready to see him. Still, he picked up what was left of his courage and trudged on. He hoped all the pain was in the anticipation—like ripping off a plaster. But of course, Remus knew better than to count on a hope.

It was bright inside the office with all the curtains open, and there he found his father waiting for him behind his heavy desk. He'd been scribbling something in a leather day-timer and went on with his scribbling even as Remus thudded over the expensive carpet in his heavy boots.

"Remus." Lyall turned the page in the day-timer. "I didn't realise you were coming."

Opposite to him, Remus fit his hands into his pockets stubbornly. "Yeah. Just wanted to drop in… See Giles, y'know."

A moment passed, and Lyall slowly set the pen down, snapping the day-timer shut. "I'm glad you did," he replied stiffly. "It's been too long, son."

And then Lyall Lupin did something Remus was not expecting; he came out from behind his imposing desk and set a hand on either of his son's shoulders.

"You've grown."

Like Giles, Remus didn't get the feeling he meant 'you got taller'. Unsure of what to say, he ground the tip of his boot into the floor until Lyall inevitably cleared his throat and drew away.

"Can I offer you a drink?"

"No, I'm not staying long."

Lyall set out two glasses anyway, surprising Remus again when he loosened his tie and casually leaned back against the front of the desk. He'd left the whisky next to him like an offering, but Remus could still taste the brandy and he felt ill.

"So what is it you're doing now? Are you working?"

"I was," Remus replied, unwilling to admit to having been fired from his minimum wage job at the music shop. "I'm taking some time off now. Me and the guys—we're going away for a while."

"Is that so?" Lyall sipped his whisky. "And where is it you're going?"

"To America."

Whatever recollection he'd missed in Giles' expression, he now saw reflected back at him in Lyall's. He considered letting him believe it, but in the end his pride won out.

"It's for my band. We got offered a contract—er, sorta. But now we're gonna be touring the states. We… Well, shit—we did it."

It should've felt gratifying. We did it—all of it—without you. Except his father wasn't looking at him. Instead Lyall had wandered over to the window, one hand tucked into his trouser pocket while he absentmindedly swirled his whisky tumbler and stared out over the back garden. Remus kept expecting to hear a dog bark, but there was nothing. They were alone.

"I wish you luck then."

Remus scoffed, torn between anger and disbelief.

" 'Wish me luck'—that's all you have to say?"

"I'm being pragmatic. Would you rather me jump for joy?"

Maybe I would, thought Remus bitterly. Or maybe he just wanted him to be angry, to start going on about how he was throwing his life away. It'd certainly have made it easier to shout and scream like he was used to.

"I'm going to America," Remus repeated, as though his father hadn't heard him properly the first time. "We're all but signed to one of the biggest agencies in the country—the Potters threw James a bloody party!"

"And is that what you'd like, Remus?" Lyall turned around. "A party? Here I was, under the impression you didn't enjoy such frivolous things."

"What would you know about the things I enjoy?"

Lyall didn't answer, and Remus felt his fists clench at his sides. He would not break.

"I'd be enough just to hear that you're proud of me. I mean, honestly—couldn't you have ever told me just once, 'good job, son', or 'I'm proud of you, son.' Was nothing I ever did worth that much?"

"Remus, You're only eighteen—"

"Nineteen."

His father faltered then, and Remus might as well have been a starving hound suddenly presented with a steak dinner.

"Remus, I am proud of y—"

"Oh, come on! You just stand there and lie to my face now? Say what you really mean."

Pinching the bridge of his nose in exasperation, Lyall crossed back to his desk, where he picked up his pen and began scratching more notes into the old leather day-timer. It felt like a dismissal, even as he mumbled under his breath;

"You know nothing, you don't understand."

"No," Remus growled. "What I don't understand is why we can't ever talk about it. It's always the same—I'm going to walk out that door with nothing. Only this time, I'm not coming back. You're lucky you have Sandra now, because otherwise you'd be alone and that's on you! So just tell me… Tell me the truth, Dad!"

Lyall sagged back into his desk chair, looking haggard as he squeezed his fist around the gold-plated pen. “You won’t be satisfied.”

“You think I came here to be satisfied? Man, I’m giving you one chance to set all this straight. If you don’t want it, then tell me to piss off and let’s be done with it.”

But despite all the anger and animosity they’d hurled at each other over the years, Lyall did not tell him to go. Instead he set the pen down and clasped his hands over his stomach.

“You have to understand. I cared about your mother—”

“Yeah, I’m sure you did.”

“Do you even want to hear this?”

Remus clenched his jaw to avoid a reply, and returned to grinding the toe of his boot into the rug. Lyall watched him for a moment, but must’ve decided it wasn’t worth the effort.

“Your mother was eleven years younger than me when we got married,” he started. “She left her parents in Saint Asaph and came to live with me here. I knew she had no one, but thought she got on well enough. We never really had that much in common, but she was… vibrant. I could hardly keep up. Some days it was like living with two different people. For a while I thought to myself, ‘this is just how she is—get used to it’. I had no idea what it actually meant. Her mind, she...”

“Bet you blamed her for it.”

“I never blamed her—not once. Not in the beginning.”

“Did you know then?” Asked Remus. “That she was in love with someone else?”

“I knew before we’d even met. At the time it hardly mattered. I needed a wife, and she needed a husband her parents approved of.”

Remus almost asked what about Tad could’ve been so appalling that his grandparents wouldn’t approve, but in the end, he held his tongue —too worried it might derail whatever truth Lyall was finally permitting him.

“I discovered your mother was having an affair a year before you were born,” he went on, turning back to the day-timer with that bloody pen. “She used to take trips out to see her best friend from school—I believe you know the one.”

“Sheila.”

Lyall hummed—scritch, scritch. “Eventually I began to get suspicious, so I hired a private investigator to follow her. You can imagine my surprise when she did not board a train to Glasgow. Instead she took a car to Notting Hill.”

“Why didn’t you do something about it?” Remus demanded. “Why didn’t you just divorce her?”

“It was too late. By the time I was considering the option, Hope was already pregnant.”

It was not the answer he’d wanted.

“That tells me nothing!”

“I would’ve assumed it made perfect sense.”

“But you knew! Even then—you knew I wasn’t yours!”

Lyall stood up from the desk; “Is that right?”

“Yes, of course you knew! You wouldn’t hate me so much if you didn’t.”

“I never asked Hope for a paternity test.”

“Why not?”

There was no reply. Lyall had returned to the liquor cabinet, where he uncapped the decanter and poured himself a second glass. After tipping that back, he poured a third.

“Remus, you’ve no idea what you’re talking about.”

“Oh, I think I do. You did it to save face, didn’t you?”

He stoppered the decanter sharply. Remus seethed.

“You couldn’t stand the idea that someone else had gone under your nose! That your own wife loved someone else in a way she could never love you. Admit it, you wanted to divorce her but you couldn’t stand the idea because the truth is, you’re too afraid to be alone—”

Lyall spun around.

“I didn’t divorce your mother because SHE ASKED ME NOT TO!”

His chest heaved, and Lyall sipped the whisky with shaking hands;

"She asked me not to..."

“How could you expect me to believe that?" Remus threw a hand up. "You fought all the time—I heard you!”

“Believe what you want, but I am telling you now, whatever you think you know about that man is wrong. This is not some fairytale—your mother was delusional! She threw her fits and made me into the bad guy because I’m the one who was here. And when he found out about you, it was over. Just like that—gone!”

“But he sent me Christmas presents.”

“And I suppose that would make him father of the year?”

Remus turned his face away, torn between shame and his own ego.

“You have no idea what it was like,” Lyall spat; “dealing with her.” He paused again to sip from the whisky, still breathing hard. “I told her I would agree to the divorce if it was what she wanted, but that she could not keep you from me.”

“So that’s it—you held me hostage.”

“I kept my family together! I kept Hope safe—me! Even during all the times she’d deluded herself into thinking that a relationship with that bastard would ever work. He couldn’t take care of her, and you were too young, and so I stayed. I stayed because she was my wife, and because you are my son!”

“Then why did you do it?” Remus wailed. “Why did you keep me from going to her funeral—why did you push me away at every possible moment? Was it because I looked like her? Or because I look like him?”

“You are my son,” Lyall repeated, “you will always be my son.”

“Ain’t that the fucking miserable truth.”

Neither of them said any more after that. More-so out of spite, Remus finally picked up the glass Lyall had set out for him and downed it for all that it was worth. He slammed the cup down;

“I have spent so much of my life being angry with you. Even when I’d thought I’d let it go, it was always there—burning me from the inside out. But not anymore… No, ‘cause I have everything now—everything! And after today, I’m going to walk out that door and I won't be angry anymore, do you hear me? Not because I’ve somehow found it in my heart to forgive you, or because your story made any difference, but because I forgive myself. So yeah, Dad… I love my life—and maybe I love it because of some of the things you gave me, but it’s mine. And I’m going to start living it for me, and I don’t care if you think that’s selfish.”

“It is all I’ve ever wanted for you, Remus.”

Liar.

Liar—liar—liar!

You don’t care—you don’t care!

Remus clutched at his head. Not now—christ, not now! It’d been ages since he’d felt himself slipping back into the old habits—the meltdowns. The thoughts and memories always came like lightning, but stuck around for hours like tape caught on a loop. He’d been doing good for so long. His friends’ influence, probably. And Sirius… always Sirius. That’s who he thought of now.

I love you.

Oi! I love you—you hear me?

Eventually Remus was wiping the sweat from his palms on his trousers. Lyall had been very quiet, studying him nervously out of the corner of his eye. Remus knew what he saw.

“Don’t,” he said, “I’m not broken.”

Lyall’s mouth opened, but with nothing to say that would change things, it eventually fell shut again. And so Remus figured he'd gotten what he wanted—answers to the questions he didn’t know he’d had.

“I leave for America next week,” he said to his father. “Just wanted to let you know.”

There was no objection as he turned to leave, but when Remus’ hand came to rest on the office door handle, Lyall Lupin spoke once more.

“Remus."

He stopped.

"You should know that I loved your mother."

He waited for it—the liar!

"Very much."

It did not come.

“Good.”

The door shut behind him with a soft click.

* * *

Sandra was waiting for him by the front door, along with Giles and a woman Remus assumed must’ve worked in the kitchens. They stood close together, acting fond, while Giles kept hold of Dusty’s leash and wrung his cap in both hands. Of them, it was Sandra who approached him first, looking cheerful despite her nerves.

“Giles filled me in,” she whispered kindly. “America—how wonderful. I’ll bet you’re excited.”

“It’ll be interesting, for sure.”

“You’ll make sure to be careful? It's a big place.”

“I'll be careful.”

“Well, at least you’ll have Dusty to take care of you now.” After glancing at the dog, she smiled and quickly kissed Remus on the cheek. “And Remus, you know that you will always have a home here if you want it.”

He nodded, but got the distinct feeling she already knew how this would go. With a tight squeeze, Sandra released his hands and Remus was free to make his way along to Giles.

“Suspect you’ll be needing some of this,” the driver said, gesturing to a large bag of dog feed at his feet. “And Gladys here, fixed you up some leftovers to take with you, as I’m assuming you’re still not much of a cook.”

Remus rolled his eyes, but thanked Gladys as she handed him the food in a paper bag. Afterwards Giles passed him Dusty’s leash, finishing by poking him in the nose.

“Take care of yourself, son. And don’t you be smoking so much.”

“How do you know I still smoke?” Remus queried. “I could’ve quit.”

“Yeah, and I’m the Queen of Sheba.”

They shared a matching grin.

When it was time to go, Dusty was the first out—yanking Remus down the stairs as he struggled not to lose hold of the heavy bag of dog kibble. There they found Sirius, casually leaning up against the side of the van with that morning’s crossword in hand.

“You made it out alive,” he cheered, tucking the paper under one arm and the pen behind his ear. He raised his sunglasses up onto the top of his head next, making Remus’ heart give a little jump. Sometimes it actually escaped him just how devastatingly handsome Sirius was.

“You ready to go, Moons?”

Remus nodded; “I’m ready.”

Sirius stared at him a moment, and then glanced up at the house and gave his arm a little touch—as if to say I’m here.

It was enough.

After Remus had loaded Dusty inside, Sirius smacked the body of the van and ran around to the driver’s seat. “You’re gonna love Reg, boy!” He said to the over-sized dog. “He’s house-sitting the whole summer, and he just looooves dogs.”

Dusty barked as Remus clicked his seatbelt into place. Up above, he could see Giles and Gladys standing arm in arm, waving them off as Sandra blew a kiss. Remus waved too, and didn’t feel the least bit bad about it.

“Music?” Sirius offered. “I’m thinking music.”

He flicked the radio on before throwing the van into reverse. There was a crunch as the tires ground across gravel and stone, and just as Sirius began to veer back down the driveway, Remus spotted a person standing in one of the windows that ran along the side of the house. Again, he didn't feel bad, more like… at peace. Lighter.

Bye, Dad.

Sirius was speeding already—the gateman had just enough time to haul the gates back before they were flying through, the windows down and warm summer air whipping at their faces.

"I'm proud of you, you know!" Sirius hollered. "Now you can be whatever you want to be!"

"You mean that?"

"Sure!"

Remus paused.

"And what if I just want to be your Moony?"

Sirius bit his lip over a smile. He noticed the radio at the same time, and shouted ecstatically;

"Ooh, I love this one!"

"Not exactly hard rock, is it?"

"Who cares? Just turn it up, Moons!"

He did.

'Little darlin', the smile's returning to their faces,
Little darlin', it seems like years since it's been here;

Here comes the sun, doo-doo-doo-doo,
Here comes the sun, and I say,
It's alright…'

"Have you given any thought to it at all?" Sirius yammered on. "Like, what happens if this tour doesn't work out, and we all gotta go back to being like one of those regular cogs in society's system?"

“No. You’re far too mental to be a society cog.”

“And just what’s that supposed to mean?”

Remus shrugged. “You’ve said it yourself, Padfoot. Mental makes art.”

“Oh, shit! Heh—I’m a fucking genius. You could put that in a song, you know! Might have to kick it up a notch though. More like… mental makes love? Nah, needs an 'm'... More like... mental makes magic? Oh shit—yeah, that's it!”

“No way, that’s so cheesy.”

“Wha—? Nah. Dusty don’t think so, do ya boy?”

‘Woof!’

“Told ya.” Sirius leaned over, shoving him fondly. There was sun in his hair, turning it a shimmering shade of silver. “Hey, Moons?”

“Mm?”

“Nothing. Just—love you.”

Sirius winked at him, before dropping the sunglasses back down over his eyes. Already grinning into his palm, Remus mouthed the words back.

Love you.

“What was that? Didn’t quite hear you.”

Remus turned his smile to the window.

“Eyes on the road, Sirius.”

Here comes the sun, doo-doo-doo-doo,
Here comes the sun;
It’s alright,
It’s alright…

Chapter End Notes

Hi guys <3

So that's the end. Insane, actually. Never in a million years would I have imagined we'd be here, seeing an end of Cadence. I want to keep this short and sweet but to all of you who have embarked on this journey with me and Remus, thank you. We've tackled so much in this story and seeing the characters grow as they have has been such a life-changing experience. Really.

For those of you curious about the fate of Part 2, I still fully plan on writing it. However, I have no idea when that will begin, so I'm kindly requesting that you to refrain from asking 'when'. I have other projects I'm going to be working on before I start writing Part 2, so if you're interested those, please feel free to subscribe to my ao3 page.
I also am going to ask that you don't ask me about the ships of Part 2. Like Cadence, it'll be told entirely through Remus' POV and will be a central wolfstar fic. (Other questions/curiosities are totally welcome!)

Someone on Tumblr asked me to compile a list of the songs I have written for the fic so here it is. Some are unfinished and will probably stay that way. I'm still really proud of them.

I have one last epilogue chapter to post and that will be happening this Friday, Feb 24th. This chapter is the END of Cadence, but I couldn't leave a few precious questions unanswered. I'm not going to say anything else about it, except for the fact that the chapter is not told through Remus' POV.

So that's it for now. Hope this was an ending you can cherish. Thank you for all of the comments, kudos, and messages you've sent over these past two years. I couldn't even come close to replaying all the love you've given me, but please know that I'm thankful for every single one of you.

Until next time x
- mot

Note: 'Arey' is a Hindi word often relating to surprise. Depends on connotation. In Gujarati, 'Jai shri Krishna' (or 'Jaishree Krishna') is a Hindu greeting used to wish someone well. It can be translated as "May Lord Krishna bless you." To any readers who might know better, please let me know if I have misused it or if you have a more correct definition!

Chapter 108: Epilogue

Chapter Summary

Raven-haired
Midnight dancer
If I could give you everything
Would you ask for me?

I debated for a long time whether to include this chapter as an epilogue or a b-side, but in the end decided that it was better off here. She was the heart of the story for a long time. And that'll never stop being true.

Chapter Notes

This chapter includes strong references to: attempted sexual assault [not shown], child abuse [including neglect], domestic abuse [not shown], age gaps, under age sex [not shown], drug use/addiction and [minimal] withdrawal, and the mention of bulimia [in a character off-screen].

Please do NOT read if any of this is at all triggering to you. This epilogue is not central to the understanding of Cadence's ending, it's simply for those who fell in love with her the same way Remus did.

(there's probably gonna be mistakes in the French x)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

If you see her, say hello,
She might be in Tangier;
She left here last early spring,
Is livin' there, I hear;

Say for me that I'm all right,
Though things get kind of slow;
She might think that I've forgotten her,
Don't tell her it isn't so…

During a particularly nasty wind storm in April of 1956, Cherie Anne Roberts gave birth to a healthy baby girl in a tiny council flat in the north end of Brighton. She was fifteen. She'd only known she was pregnant for eight weeks.

After the baby was born, Cherie's mother agreed they could stay on the condition that—should anyone ever ask, the baby was adopted. She was only a distant cousin, a friend of the family's—there would be no out-of-wedlock babies in her house. No cheap whores here, no sir.

Torn by guilt, Cherie stubbornly refused to give the baby a name. Or maybe she couldn't. With nothing else her mother called the girl "Ruth." Cherie called her "Baby." This went on for two years, until Cherie's mother died of a sudden heart attack and Cherie and Baby were left on their own.

Evicted from their flat and without a roof over their heads, the pair traveled further into the city, where Cherie would end up moving in with a man named Jack Riley. Jack worked construction, building council estates for the poor just like the one they'd been evicted from for being too poor. He also dealt drugs on the side, and would prove a good enough father to Cherie's baby until 1961 when he was put away for involuntary manslaughter after one of his usual deals had gone sideways.

Following Jack's incarceration, Cherie moved in with another man, also named Jack, who pimped her out to help pay the rent. During this time Cherie had fallen down two flights of stairs outside their building and broken her collarbone. A neighbour who had been partaking from a late-night cigarette on his balcony could've sworn she'd been pushed, but Cherie was adamant that she'd tripped. The nurse then told her that she was nine weeks pregnant, and had subsequently miscarried in the fall.

Six months later Cherie was pregnant again. She was excited for this one—more than willing now that Jack II had agreed to marry her and take the child on as his own. But it was not to be. Despite all Cherie's efforts, the baby was born already an angel. A blessing, in hindsight.

Of all Cherie's children, only the first would remain stubborn enough to make it through early childhood. It had taken some time but eventually Cherie had named her Grace, after her mother—though there had not seemed to be much point to that either.

At six years old, Grace had fallen into a bush of stinging nettle outside their council estate and had to be dragged home by a neighbour when they discovered her hours later, playing in the street while covered head to toe in flaming red welts. The woman had much to say; how could someone let a child get this filthy? Are you even feeding her?

Embarrassed, Cherie stripped her daughter bare in the entryway of their home and spanked her. She called her stubborn—too stupid to cry. Then she washed and fed her.

After the incident with the stinging nettles, everyone inside the estate began to call Baby Grace “Nettles” and Nettles she remained until one day in early spring when the girl that was once a stubborn baby too stupid to cry packed a small suitcase and climbed out the bedroom window, never looking back.

She was two weeks shy of her fifteenth birthday.

In the beginning she’d still gone by Grace. Not after her grandmother, but after Grace Kelly, the beautiful American actress turned princess of Monaco. Ms Kelly had married her prince in April of 1956, the very same month and year Nettles had been born. On April 19th to be exact, but Nettles had been born on the 15th, four days too early. It was her first life-long disappointment.

After becoming Grace again, Nettles moved to Littlehampton, where she started going by the name Tracy, after the glamorous socialite Grace Kelly had played in the 1956 film, High Society. There she dreamed up all sorts of stories for herself; how she was born in St Petersburg to a loving mother and father, but had tragically lost both in a plane accident when they were on their way to Tibet for her father's research on Buddhist monks and their choice to undergo monastic silence. She was then taken in by an evil aunt, who only cared for the inheritance and would lock Tracy in the attic every time she spoke or did something out of turn. Some bought it, while others tried calling her bluff—it didn't matter. She was Tracy Lord from High Society, and they were little people from Littlehampton.

Littlehampton would end up being 'home' for seven months before she ultimately hopped the rail to Portsmouth, leaving behind both an abusive boyfriend and Tracy Lord. It went like that for a while—new city, new boyfriend, new name. In Southampton it was Amy—High Noon. Swindon, Frances—To Catch a Thief. Birmingham, Georgie—The Country Girl. Eventually Nettles had run out of names and cities. She’d been in and out of London for months. Fucked over and used by more boyfriends than rats in St Pancras station. She needed a change. And then it hit her.

Paris.

Maybe she couldn't be princess of Monaco, but surely France was the next best thing? Still, she couldn't be Grace in Paris. And she certainly couldn't be Nettles. She needed to be someone new.

As it turned out, the name 'Tonya' came to her while she was sleeping in the doorway of some pub in Watford. She'd missed the last train and a drunkard was wailing out for his wife, begging the night streets to help him win her back.

Tonya! Tonya! Tonya! I love you, baby! Tonya, baby, come back to me!

With her new name, Tonya hitchhiked down to the port of Dover, where she spent her final few quid on a one-way ticket to Calais.

Growing up she used to have a tape recording of this woman singing in French. She had no idea what she was saying or what the songs were about, and the tape was bootlegged so it didn't have a name or a cover, but there was a little bit at the very end where the woman said something in her pretty accent. Tonya (then Nettles) used to imagine it was a dedication to some lover—that that was who the entire album was for. She could do that, she told herself, all she needed was the accent.

Walking up to the ticket booth, the girl that was Tonya but used to be Georgie who used to be Frances who used to be Amy who used to be Tracy who used to be Nettles who used to be Grace who used to be Baby, put on what she hoped was the best French accent the guy working the counter had ever heard. She held up the line with her sob story of how she'd lost her passport to a pickpocket in Upper Clapton and did her best to sprinkle in the few French words she knew—oui, non, bonjour, poufiasse!

To her luck, the guy bought it. Either it was the end of his shift and he couldn't be arsed to call over a supervisor, or he was just stupid enough to buy the 'poor whimpering French girl' act. He was filling out the form for her ticket when he asked her for her surname and every thought of idiot ticket guys and French love songs flew out of her head.

"Oi, girl. I need your full name."

She looked up, mouth ajar, only to find a realtor's advert pinned to the nearby noticeboard.

Call Benson and Barlow, everything we touch turns to SOLD!

Barlowe, she told him, with an ‘e’. Because that was sophisticated.

He stamped her ticket without thinking twice.

Paris wasn't so bad, once she'd gotten there, that was. She'd managed to stow away on the back of a dairy truck from Calais to Lille and from there was picked up by a band of French hippies that looked about four years too late for Woodstock. Their weed was shite and the guy she was sitting beside kept pretending to fall asleep on her shoulder so he could sniff her hair, but it beat walking. They arrived on the outskirts of the city that evening and from then on it was hustle, hustle, hustle.

Not that she wasn't used to it.

The French are arrogant but they've got big egos. All it took was a few nice words and boom—she had a sofa to sleep on for the night, maybe a shower and something fun to help her not think for a while. That's how she met Alain. He found her passed out on the floor of some strangers' salle de bains after one sleeping pill had turned into one too many sleeping pills. When she woke up, the first thing he said to her was;

"You know, that's how Jim Morrison died."

Actually he said it in French, but she was too busy vomiting a mixture of red wine and Vasparex over his shoes to care all that much.

Despite the vomit, Alain took her home. It was a reasonably nice flat in the Charonne Quarter of Paris where she would end up living for the next nine and a half months. It didn't escape her—afterwards—how nine and a half months was just enough time to have a baby. If it weren't for the wannabe bulimic prima-ballerina living one floor above them who preferred to trade her birth control for laxatives, Tonya could've ended up exactly like little fifteen year-old Cherie Roberts, giving birth alone on the floor of her one bedroom flat.

Nah, she had to give Alain more credit than that. He was a drunk with a bit of a mean streak (who wasn't) but more than that, he was an artist. Three nights a week, he and his band would perform down at some fancy jazz club often frequented by celebrities and all the finest the City of Love had to offer. Some nights Tonya would stay behind, smoking skinny cigarettes while flipping through French magazines (she still enjoyed the pictures) and listening her way through Alain's massive collection of American jazz and rock and roll. He had everything, and was very knowledgeable about it too. Plus he never made Tonya feel like an idiot for not knowing the name of this album or that guitarist. Sometimes Alain would act irritated by her inability understand him in French, but he knew enough English for the both of them, and often Tonya would get the feeling that Alain liked knowing she depended on him for more than just drugs and a roof.

On the nights Alain agreed to bring her down to the club for his gigs, Tonya would sit at the bar and order three dirty martinis with two olives each. No one in Paris drank a martini that wasn't just sweet vermouth over ice, but eventually she got good at convincing the bartenders to make her little American cocktails and let her live her little Parisian dreams while her boyfriend stood on stage and sang about fucking other women in a language she did not understand.

She was painting her toenails by candlelight one evening (between Alain's drinking and her candy habit they sometimes didn't have enough money to pay the electrical) when Alain asked;

"Hey, Tonya, how old are you again?"

Eighteen.

"... Hein."

She asked how old he was.

"Twenty-eight."

Huh.

She'd lied of course. She wouldn't be eighteen for another fourteen months.

Tonya would eventually leave Alain the same way she'd left home; pack a bag, slip out the fire escape window, never look back. Just like back then there wasn't any singular trigger—no big fight or bruise to nurse while lamenting over what to do next. She simply woke up one day and decided that was that. The course was run. Time to move on. She wasn't sure when Switzerland had become the goal. It probably had something to do with it being the closest. Plus the country's reputation of neutrality didn't hurt.

Can't tag me, I'm Switzerland!

Tonya realised her mistake too late when the guy at the border turned her away for not having a French passport. He might've had her arrested as an illegal had she not welled up with tears, claiming to have left it at home. Up until that point, Tonya hadn't considered just how much she'd come to rely on Alain's satisfactory English-speaking skills, and so with nothing else to do she turned around and hopped the first train back to Paris with her tail between her legs.

Never look back, my arse.

She told herself that Alain would believe a story of her getting lost on the subway and spending a few nights at a friend's. (Anyone could be a friend—that bush over there could be a friend.) She even considered telling him she'd been kidnapped but had escaped after kicking her captor in the balls when he attempted to lift her out of the trunk of his car; only, she never made it as far as Paris. Halfway through her train journey the ticket inspector sorted out that she had not exactly paid the fare for entry, and Tonya "Barlowe with an e" was unceremoniously ejected from the train at the nearest station.

She slept on the station bench, and woke up to a woman nudging her shoulder. She was not high this time, and this woman was not some long-haired singer-songwriter with a Jim Morrison fetish. This woman was a nun—a French one, complete with the white collar and black veil and everything.

"Est-ce que ça va, mon enfant?"

Tonya struggled to recall any French she'd picked up from Alain. In the end she managed to tell her that she was cold and hungry and had nowhere to go. The nun said something else in a soft voice, and just like that three more of them appeared. They had a car and they were willing to take her with them. Tonya couldn't fathom a reason to decline.

The nuns belonged to a small convent just outside of Provins, France. They were almost entirely self-sufficient, growing most of their own food and even running a small winery off of the grapes they grew on one half of the church's land. They sold the wine to local restaurants in nearby towns and villages, and even had their own pop-up stalls at a local market. That was what they were doing when they found her; she'd been saved, and all because of a few bottles of Cabernet.

The one who'd found her was called Sister Hélène. She was well-educated, supposedly the only daughter of a good family before she joined the church, and—as it turned out—was quite fluent in English as well. She listened to Tonya's confession—the drugs, the drinking, the men she'd said no to, the men she'd said yes to, her hatred toward her mother for always failing to protect her, her hatred toward the world for failing to protect little Cherie Roberts as well. And afterwards, when Tonya had cried so hard she felt like throwing up, Sister Hélène held her and told her she could stay.

It wasn't easy. The nuns got up early seven days a week and they were only allowed one glass of wine at suppertime. The only man who frequented the convent often enough to be called a regular was an old farmer by the name of Monsieur René who brought them beef and pork in exchange for fresh eggs and a share of the nuns' successful potato crops. Even if Monsieur René was twenty years younger and looking for a quick shag, he didn't speak a word of English. Nor did most of the other sisters.

By her third week at the convent, Sister Hélène decided that all communication in English had come to an abrupt end. It frustrated Tonya, who already struggled to communicate in her own language and was about ready to strangle someone for a fucking cigarette. Sister Hélène squawked sharply at her every time she asked for something in English, reminding Tonya of the chittering jay birds that lived in the beech trees that lined the churchyard, but eventually her French did get better. And the more she spoke, the more her world opened up.

She was not the only woman at the convent who had yet to take any vows. Others dropped in unannounced looking for refuge or a warm bed and meal for a night or two. There were mothers, daughters, friends, and strangers. None stayed as long as Tonya, but all were just as grateful. It was a wayward home. Tonya wondered when exactly it was that she'd started to refer to it as such.

Now it was summer, almost half a year since she'd arrived at the convent strung-out and hopeless. The air was sweet and her hair was shorn short to the scalp, making her neck appear even longer than normal. On the days when they were feeling playful, the sisters called her pet names like 'Mademoiselle Hepburn' and 'Jean Seberg'. When they were scolding her, they called her ‘odd girl’, and ‘mon cher cœur’. When it rained they did chores, and on the days the sun shone they chased each other and took turns playing rounds of croquet on the lawn. They frolicked like they were little girls again, and at night they showed her all of their girlish secrets. A photo of a past lover, a scrap of fabric from their mother's wedding veil, even—under sworn secrecy—a few Camel cigarettes to hold beneath the nose and enjoy on a blue moon.

She never knew what had made them like her so much, they always refused to say. But they'd welcomed her like a stray cat with unwavering devotion, and no matter what she did she would never have earned it. The girls adored her stories, especially the ones she made up, and she had never enjoyed eating apricots in the garden as well as when she was with them.

Perhaps there was something to be said for mothers and sisters after all.

On her fifth month of nun-ified respite, the boy came. He was nineteen—Monsieur René's son, sent on an errand for his father who'd fallen in the field while checking on a newborn calf and had unfortunately injured his back. The boy's name was Françoys, and he was beautiful. By their second meeting they were sneaking off behind the tiny barn to snog each other in between bales of hay. Of course they were discovered, and Françoys was promptly run off property by the offended sister as though she'd just caught Tonya breaking her vows to God.

She'd never agreed to be a nun, she howled. She'd made no vows of chastity. And so in a fit of embarrassed rage, she shoved her few meager belongings into the same rucksack she'd arrived with and announced her leave. Sister Hélène watched with no small amount of disappointment, flitting back and forth like the jays.

"Arrête! Sister Mary Celeste was merely shocked to find you in such a state. There is no need to run off."

'A state'? She was only kissing a boy. At least this one was finally her age.

Hélène sighed and set both hands on her shoulders. "Ma chere, calme-toi. You will explain yourself to Sister Mary Celeste, and all will be as it was."

She pushed the sister's hands away. No—

I think it's time I go.

It was always gonna happen eventually.

Forgive me.

And so she left; back to Paris where she sought out Alain. She only made it as far as the corner street adjacent to his flat before turning around. After that she wandered, considering what her new name would be. But she liked Tonya. People cried out at night for Tonya—missed her and marked the days until she would return to them. No, Tonya wasn't finished, although she did change her surname; 'Belova' after some Russian glamour model she saw on a paper advert for Paris's red light district.

The winter was rough. People tended to be more stingy with their sofas and showers when it cost that much more to heat them. The Summer of Love was over, and Alain had a new girlfriend anyway—an American. No way she was older than sixteen, she looked like a fucking baby doll version of Twiggy. Seeing her should've made Tonya want to claw Alain's eyes out, but all she felt was a familiar seed of self-loathing. She was almost nineteen now—too old to ask for a stranger's pity without expecting to give something in return. Alain was gone, and whatever bridge that had led her to the nuns was now burned. Her fault.

She'd run out of love in Paris, and so with nothing left, she hitchhiked back to Calais and bought a one-way ticket home.

Walking up that familiar path, she wasn't even sure what she'd find. Most of the street had been bulldozed to make way for gentrified city flats and a public rec centre. But she found it. And she found her, sitting outside the front steps of the council flat, smoking the same brand of cigarettes she'd smoked when Tonya had left.

Hey, Mum.

Cherie Roberts had gotten old. She had lines on her face where lines ought not to be, and her body was sunken in so much it looked like her collarbones might punch right through her skin like paper. Tonya wondered if she'd look like that one day; a washed up beauty queen with overgrown roots and dull gold band on a single narrow finger.

"What are you doing here?" She asked, arching a thin brow.

It was obvious wasn't it?

She'd come home.

"Home, huh?" Cherie inhaled her Kim Slimsize cigarette, smoke gliding straight up her nose. Finally she stood up from the steps.

"If you're staying, you're gonna work for it. You ain't just gonna have the run 'a the house no more, you'll have to pay your own way. You hear me, Grace?"

Actually her name was Tonya now.

If Cherie had heard her, she made no indication of it.

The flat was the same. Small, with fading yellow wallpaper and a crack in the bathroom window that turned any condensation to ice in the wintertime. The first thing Tonya had noticed was that in the four and a half years she'd been gone, Cherie had been blessed with another child. Rebecca, a cute little girl with a button nose and curly brown ringlets, spent most of her time in front of the television set, playing with off-brand Barbie dolls and rubbing her snot into the shag carpet. Cherie worked the front desk at a local nursing home and was sometimes called in to do double shifts when they were short nurses. On these days she often left the toddler locked behind a baby gate in the living room, occasionally coming home on her breaks but only if she got one that day.

It wasn't so bad at first. Cherie refused to call her Tonya, but had agreed to let her stay on the condition that she watched over her sister during the day. Rebecca had Tonya's old room now, and with her return the two had started sharing a bed, meaning that Tonya was the one who woke up when Becky started fitting from a nightmare. She would sit and rock her until she stopped crying, feeling the snot seep into the thin fabric of her t-shirt.

Shhh, baby, shhhh. It's alright.

It felt nice to know that someone was calling out for her again.

"I'm pulling a double today so you're gonna have Becky until eleven," Cherie called. Standing in front of the stove, she scooped out the eggs just before they could burn and left the steaming plate on the table while she ashed her cigarette in a leftover coffee mug from the day before. Rebecca immediately reached for the eggs but Tonya distracted her with little bits of toast, wiping her small face with a flannel before any peanut butter could get up her nose.

"Grace? Gracie, you hear me?"

My name is Tonya.

Cherie stuck a second cigarette between her lips. "You gotta watch her today."

But the off-license down the road was hiring. She was going to see if they'd give her an interview.

"As in today? What the fuck—no. I need you to watch Becky, I only took this shift because I knew you'd be here."

There was always Dom. Why not him?

"It ain't Dom's fucking responsibility, it's your responsibility." Cherie lit the cigarette, slapping the lighter down on the kitchen counter as she gestured sharply at the two girls with her long nails. "We agreed when I let you come back here—you watch your sister. Ain't Dom's problem... you hear?"

Yeah. She heard.

"Good. And for Christ's sake, eat something. You're too fucking skinny."

"I think she looks great," said Dom, as he came striding into the tiny kitchen with his boots on. "Not as great as her mother 'a course... Good mornin', darlin'."

"Hi, baby."

They kissed, in which Dom held her mother against the counter top and Tonya did her best to get Rebecca to eat a piece of sliced apple. Cherie had to practically beat him off—giggling like a school girl all the while—and as she rushed off to get ready for her shift, Dom smacked her ass and took a seat at the breakfast table.

"And how are the rest of my girls, huh?"

Dom tugged his plate of eggs toward himself. He pat Rebecca on the head, but the baby girl didn't react. She never did. Hardly even spoke. Not around anyone but Tonya anyway.

Giving up on getting the four year-old to eat, Tonya wiped her hands and stood up from the table. She asked Dom to watch Becky while she showered.

" 'Course, princess. You go on. Oh and—" He took her by the arm, shoving several rumpled notes into her palm. "Buy yourself something nice today, eh? On ol' Dom."

She thought of Rebecca when he smacked her ass, and did not react.

The situation was always bound to break down eventually. Dom was straighter than any guy Cherie had ever been with (as in—he'd never been arrested or charged) and even ran his own garage on the south side of town. He wasn't Rebecca's dad but he put food on the table. And he had friends. Resourceful friends. Cherie's drug of choice had always been the drink, but when Tonya asked him to get her some painkillers Dom had come back with a hundred milligrams worth of hydrocodone. She asked him what he wanted for them, but Dom only smiled and kissed her hair. Anything for one of his girls, right?

But all generosity had its limits.

That night he'd been drinking, but Tonya knew enough to notice the signs. Men like Dom were cowards. Confront them with their own failings and they'll crumble like a stale dog turd on the pavement. When Dom came into the bedroom she shared with Rebecca, Tonya screamed and screamed—threw shit and cursed him bloody. He was already running when she picked up the baseball bat Cherie kept near the front door for the local boys who sometimes came looking for a window or two to smash. She didn't care which neighbours poked their heads out to see; Tonya slammed that bat into the headlights of Don's crappy 1971 Ford Pinto and meant it.

"Crazy bitch! You crazy bitch! You're gonna regret this!"

Go! Get out of here!

Rebecca cried for hours afterwards, but at least Dom was gone. And when Cherie got off her double shift later that night, Tonya came out into the living room fully prepared to tell her everything that bastard had tried to do.

Only... she hadn't expected Dom to drive out to Cherie's work to humiliate her by wailing on about her psycho daughter and subsequently dump her in the middle of the parking lot.

"You little whore! You came onto my man—I did everything for you, I sacrificed my body for you! Let you grow in me like a tumor—you whore! You whore! You whore!"

There was no staying after that. Even if Cherie could see sense, there was no way she'd ever go back. Maybe she should've taken Rebecca with her... But how could she? Tonya wasn't her mum, she could barely take care of herself. She just hoped Rebecca could forgive her someday.

Things got better when she met Tomny.

Of course she never took him seriously. He was just some goofy kid—younger than her by almost seven months and therefore completely unfuckable. But she had to hand it to him, he was...

Charming.

No, that's a lie. He was more than charming. She liked him from the very first moment they met. In another life she probably would've married him.

Sorry.

* * *

Late June 1979

If there was one thing she'd learned, it was that train stations were the same everywhere. London, Paris—no matter the day, now matter how pretty the architecture, all of them still smelt a bit like piss. It was one of life's greatest ironies; you could build a beautiful thing, fill it with all sorts of great promises, and yet even beauty had to yield to the ineffable flick of the cigarette.

It took seven months to sort out her passport. One thing they don't tell you about being born: you need a piece of paper to confirm that you were, in fact, born. Conceived—birthed—shagged into existence. According to this silly little thing called the law, it's not enough to just appear somewhere and say 'hey, I'm alive'. It's enough to die though. You die—someone finds the body—and they write the proper documents right up. How's that make any sense?

In the time it took for the British Consulate of Paris to sort out that she was not a Russian spy (shot herself in the foot choosing a name like 'Tonya Belova', honestly) and instead just a silly girl who'd gotten good at finessing the ticket attendants at her local Port of Dover, Tonya could've almost had another baby. She didn't, of course, which was a good thing considering she spent half that time coming down from her worst withdrawal yet.

Eighteen months she'd spent loving Tomny, and there was not a single day she regretted. She was drowning in herself, and Tomny was the lifebuoy keeping her afloat. But Tomny couldn't be the one holding them up for air all the time. Tomny needed a buoy too. And Tonya was a sinking stone.

She needed to learn how to float.

'If you get close to her... —iss her once for meee. Always re... —spected her, for doin' what she did 'n... gettin' free—'

"Ugh, damn thing!"

Bang! Bang!

"Vas-y, encore une fois. Peut-être que la radio s'excusera."

She huffed, looking up. "You need a new radio, Sister. This one's a piece of crap."

Sister Hélène smiled, and Tonya slowly set the broken radio aside.

"Have you gathered all your things?"

"Oui."

"And you have your ticket?"

"I'll buy it at the station."

The sister nodded. "I have this for you. Sister Marianne picked it up in town. It's in English. Just something for you to read on your journey."

She passed her the magazine, and then cupped her face. She cried—she couldn't help it. They'd taken care of her a second time—une étrangère, their odd girl. Their little runaway.

"S'il vous plaît écrivez-nous, ma chère."

Please write.

“Que Dieu veille sur toi.”

May God watch over you.

Until that moment, a small part of her had wondered if she might stay with those sisters forever. But she had never been so close to God, and she had plans now. She wanted to see all the places she'd lied about. Find 'home' again, and again. Maybe she still didn't know how to float, but she knew one thing; if you've never gotten to spend a summer living at a nunnery in the French countryside, sipping hand-pressed wine and eating apricots under the shade of the fruit trees, then you really haven't lived at all.

Standing in line ahead of the ticket booth, she began flipping through her English magazine. She read the names of all the rock stars Alain had told her about, and the ones she'd come to know on her own. She ogled their photographs, compared stops on their tours, wondering if she could catch a show or two—and it was there, in that little French train station, that she saw it.

It was the photo that caught her eye. She'd never have missed that brooding face anywhere. He was handsome now. Almost a man. He’d probably insist he already was, but that was just the stubborn in him. Oh, how she missed it.

THE CIVIL-MOUTHED YOBS!

THE ROUNDHOUSE, LONDON – “ROCK IS DEAD in Britain”, says Gaz Spectre, Head of Spectre Records and producer for the potential new rock band, MARAUDERS (pictured below), as he stands in the back of the famed venue watching his newest gamble bear it all to a crowd that didn’t know whether they wanted to be punk or rock. The new band, comprised of four members each hailing from London-town, have been slotted into an all-American tour where they’re to support LA-based heavy metal group Saints of the Grave on their third Headlining tour. Without so much as a debut release, Marauders come on the scene as virtual unknowns—a gamble Spectre says he and his company are willing to take.

With Marauders in tow, Saints of the Grave are set to kick off their all-American tour at the Rock Island nightclub in Detroit, MI starting SATURDAY JUNE 20TH. We expect the Marauders to have us all by the balls by the time they reach Hollywood in late September, and according to lead singer Sirius Black, they aren’t letting go until we can sing the words back to them twice as well.

ALSO in your PAGE 24 NME: U2 tease new release with CBS Ireland.

Oh Remus.

Look at you. You're all grown up.

My sweet, sweet love.

“Bonsoir, Madame. Comment puis-je vous aider?”

She looked up, surprised to find that she’d reached the front of the ticket line so quickly.

“Uh... Un billet,” she told the man behind the counter, quickly tucking the magazine away. She smiled; "S’il vous plaît."

“Bien sûr. Et où irez-vous ce soir?”

Where will you go?

She thought. Anywhere. Anywhere. It made her playful again.

“Ce soir? Mmm… Zurich. Demain? … Qui sait.”

“Je vois…” The attendant raised a brow at her. “You are American, yes?”

“Dieu non. Is my accent really that bad?”

“Non, c’est très joli,” he chuckled. Friendly for Paris. “Where are you from, madam?”

She shrugged, flicking lazily through her handbag.

Brighton. A tiny council flat. My mother’s c—

“St Petersburg originally, then nowhere. Then London, and then nowhere again. Most recently, a tiny convent en Provins.”

He eyed her clothing; the white t-shirt that lacked a brasserie, the jeans that hung low on her waist. Lips that had touched many, and surely would touch many more.

“You are a—eh… a nun?”

“If you say so, monsieur.”

She handed him Grace Roberts' passport.

"One ticket to Zurich, please. I'm meeting someone."

Can't tag me!

I'm Switzerland.

“Everything seems to be in order, Mademoiselle,” said the attendant, as he stamped the dead girl’s passport. “If you do not mind my asking, who is it you are meeting? Your husband?”

“Husband? Oh, no.” She took the passport and the ticket, and tucked both back into her tiny handbag. “Actually I'm looking for someone.”

“Who?"

“I'm not sure." She smiled. “But won’t it be so wonderful to find out.”

END OF PART ONE

Chapter End Notes

❤□❤□❤□

Completed: Feb 24th 2023.
Do not post to Wattpad or any other site. This includes Goodreads and the like.

Works inspired by this one

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!